Where a party wall which stands on the land of adjoining owner is destroyed by fire, and is rebuilt by one of the owners, the other owner may use it as a support for his building without making payment for the use. Antomarchi v. Russell, 63 Ala. 356, 35 Am. Rep. 40; Frisbie v. Bigham Masonic Lodge No. 256, 133 Ky. 588, 118 S. W. 359. See also Douglas v. Coonley, 156 N. Y. 521, 51 N. E. 283, 66 Am. St. Rep. 580, reversing 84 Hun 158, 32 N. Y. S. 444. But in Bowhay v. Richards, 81 Neb. 764, 116 N. W. 677, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 883, it was held that where the buildings which were supported by a party wall which stood entirely on the land of one adjoining owner were destroyed by fire, an injunction would lie to prevent the other adjoining owner from using a new party wall which was built on the first owner's premises without first paying a portion of the expenses incurred in building the new wall.

Where a party wall has been so weakened by a fire that it will be insufficient to support a building about to be erected, it has been held that the prospective builder may demolish the old wall and erect a new one in its place on condition that he constructs it in such a manner as to give to the adjoining owner the same support which he received from the old wall; Lexington Lodge v. Beal, 84 Miss. 521, 49 So. 833. And see the reported case. The same rule applies where one of the buildings which a party wall supports has become so dilapidated that it must be demolished, which makes it necessary to tear down and replace the common wall. Partridge v. Gilbert, 15 N. Y. 601, 69 Am. Dec. 632, affirming 3 Duer 184.

In Brondage v. Warner, 2 Hill (N. Y.) 145, it appeared that by deed a person had been granted a right to make a certain wall a common wall. The grantor's building was destroyed by fire but the wall still answered the purpose for which it had been built. In ejectment proceedings brought by persons claiming under the grantor, it was held that they could not recover the ground on which the wall stood, since the rights of the defendants to it lay in grant, and the wall having not been destroyed, their privilege of support from it still existed.

HALL

MANUFACTURERS' COAL AND COKE COMPANY.

260 Mo. 351; 168 S. W. 927.

Trial — Demurrer to Evidence — What Evidence Considered.

In determining whether a demurrer to the evidence should have been sustained or overruled, defendant's evidence tending to show an absence of right to recover cannot be considered, and the demurrer must be tested by the strength of plaintiff's evidence aided by any of defendant's evidence that may help to make out plaintiff's case; plaintiff's evidence and every reasonable inference arising therefrom being taken as true.

Master and Servant — Negligence — Safety of Miner's Working Place.

In a miner's action for injuries caused by rock falling upon him, where there is evidence that he asked the foreman if he thought any more of the roof would fall, that the foreman took a pick, and, after testing the part of the roof which subsequently fell, assured plaintiff that it was sound and safe, that plaintiff was somewhat inexperienced and not familiar with the character of rock in the roof, and, relying on the foreman's assurance of safety, continued to work there until injured, and that if a proper inspection had been made when the foreman made his inspection it could have been discovered that the rock was loose and liable to fall, it is a question for the jury whether the employer was negligent, though plaintiff's evidence tends to show that ordinarily it was his own duty to look after the safety of the roof of his own room.

[See Ann. Cas. 1912B 577.]

Same.

Though ordinarily it is a miner's duty to look after the safety of the roof of the room in which he works and the employer is only required to furnish props necessary for propping the roof, where its foreman undertakes to make an inspection as to the safety or soundness of the roof, it is the employer's duty to exercise ordinary care to ascertain the true condition of the roof and inform the miner of the facts that an ordinarily careful inspection would have revealed.

Contributory Negligence of Miner.

Where the danger of the roof of a mine falling is not so obvious and glaring that a reasonably prudent man would not have continued to work there, a miner is not negligent as a matter of law in continuing work in reliance upon his foreman's assurance that the roof is safe.

Instruction as to Negligence and Contributory Negligence.

An instruction that if plaintiff was employed by defendant in its mine and under the control and direction of its foreman, who had authority to direct the work and the manner in which plaintiff was engaged at the time of the injury, and if it was plaintiff's duty to obey his orders and directions, and if while so engaged the foreman negligently directed plaintiff to clean up the rock and other debris in a room, and prior to such command had assured plaintiff when inquired of whether it was safe to work there on account of overhanging rocks, that it was safe, and if plaintiff, relying upon such assurance, went to work there and was injured by a slab of rock falling upon him, he was entitled to recover, is erroneous, where negligence on the part of the foreman in giving such assurance as to the safety of the roof was relied upon as a ground of recovery and not merely as relieving plaintiff from the effect of contributory negligence or assumption of risk, since it undertakes to cover the whole case so far as defendant's actionable negligence is concerned, and does not require a finding that the assurance as to the safety of the roof was negligently given, but makes the employer an insurer as to the correctness of the information furnished plaintiff.

Same.

The error in such instruction is not cured by a further instruction that if the rock which fell upon plaintiff was in a loose and dangerous condition, and if the foreman inspected and sounded it and found it to be in a loose and dangerous condition and liable to fall, or if by the exercise of ordinary care he could have discovered such condition, and if he assured plaintiff that it would not fall and ordered him to work beneath such rock, then such order was negligently made and such assurance negligently given within the meaning of the instructions, since it merely defines "negligent assurance," a term not used in the instruction authorizing a recovery, and, moreover, it was an attempt to supply facts which should have been required to be found by the main instruction and the incorporation of which in a separate instruction would merely confuse the jury.

Same.

In a miner's action for injuries caused by rock falling upon him, an instruction that though he knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have known, that the place where he was working was not safe, this did not defeat a recovery if he was negligently ordered into such place by the foreman and assured that the rock would not fall, and if the danger from such rock was not of such a glaring and dangerous nature as to threaten immediate injury in case he obeyed the order, is erroneous, as it did not require a finding that plaintiff relied upon such assurance of safety.

Witnesses — Falsus in Uno — Instructions.

It was proper to charge that the jury are the sole judges of the weight and credibility of the witnesses, but that, if they find and believe that any witness had wilfully sworn falsely to any material facts, they may disregard the whole or any part of his testimony.

Instructions — Assumption of Facts — Harmless Error.

In an action for personal injuries, though an instruction that in determining the measure of damages the jury might consider the mental and physical pain and suffering endured by plaintiff in consequence of the injury, the character and extent of the injury, if permanent, together with his loss of time and service, and find for him in such sum as would be reasonable compensation for the injury, assuming that he sustained injury and suffered pain and loss of time, this is unimportant where these facts were not disputed.

Damages — Impotency — Necessity of Pleading Specially.

In an action for personal injuries under a petition alleging that plaintiff's body was severely and permanently wounded, bruised, etc.; that the bones, flesh, and ligaments of his hips, pelvis, legs, and ankle were broken, bruised, etc.; that he suffered great bodily and mental pain and anguish as a result thereof; that he was disabled and prevented from attending to his business affairs, or doing anything towards gaining a livelihood; and that he was permanently injured and crippled for life and had suffered and would continue to suffer great bodily pain, annoyance, inconvenience, and expense—evidence is not admissible that the injuries resulted in impotency, as the petition neither alleged such injury nor contained an allegation of a general nature embracing it within its terms, and, where conditions or diseases will not necessarily result from the injuries, they must be pleaded.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Knox county: STEWART, Judge.

Action for damages. Colby Hall, plaintiff, and Manufacturers' Coal and Coke Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Campbell & Ellison and Higbee & Mills for appellant.

Fugate & Son and Chas. E. Murrell for respondent.

[357] WILLIAMS, C.—This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries received by plaintiff while working in defendant's coal mine near Novinger, Missouri. Suit was instituted in Adair county and on change of venue was sent to Knox county where trial was had resulting in a verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $23,666. That portion of plaintiff's petition charging negligence is as follows:

"The defendant negligently, carelessly and recklessly set him to work in one of the rooms in said Mine number 50, known as room number 4 off the 10th west entry off the main south entry, at a place in said room where the rock, earth and other materials forming the roof of said room were in a loose and dangerous condition and liable to fall at any time; and did negligently, carelessly and recklessly fail and neglect to warn or notify the said plaintiff that the roof of said room, at the point and place where plaintiff was compelled to be in order to perform the work as directed, was in a loose and dangerous condition as aforesaid; but said defendant, its agents, employees and mine foreman did carelessly, negligently and recklessly assure this plaintiff that the roof of said room at the place aforesaid was in a safe and secure condition, and this plaintiff believing said foreman possessed superior knowledge of said roof, relied upon said statement and assurance and set about the work as directed; and this defendant had negligently, carelessly and recklessly failed and neglected to furnish and provide a safe, competent and proper man in charge of said room, and did negligently, carelessly, and recklessly fail and neglect to furnish and provide safe, competent and proper men in charge of said mine as mine foreman, and did negligently, carelessly and recklessly fail and neglect to furnish the said plaintiff with a reasonably safe, sufficient and proper place in which to perform his duties, and did negligently, carelessly and recklessly fail and neglect to warn or notify the said plaintiff of the [358] dangers of working in said room, this plaintiff being then and there an inexperienced miner, and ignorant by reason thereof of the dangers lurking in said roof of said mine, which said facts the defendant well knew or by the exercise of ordinary care could have known."

The petition further alleges that by reason of the negligence and carelessness of the defendant, as above stated, and without any warning to him, a large slab of rock from the roof of said mine fell upon plaintiff. Defendant's answer contained, (1) a general denial, (2) that plaintiff's injury "was due solely to his own negligence and carelessness in not properly taking care of and securing said room and the roof thereof," (3) plea of assumed risk.

Plaintiff's evidence tended to establish the following facts: At the time plaintiff was injured he was working in said mine in a room which was about twenty feet wide and fifty feet long; the roof of the room being a short distance above plaintiff's head. While he was at work picking up some loose rock from the floor of this room, a slab of rock, nine feet wide and about eleven feet long and varying in thickness from a "feather edge" to eighteen inches, fell from the roof of the mine upon him. Prior to the accident, plaintiff had worked in this room about three and one-half days, three days of the time being spent in the work of digging coal. On the day preceding the day of the accident, plaintiff set 33 props under the roof in this room and drilled some holes and loaded them with powder. After he left the mine that day, these holes were fired, as was the custom, by the shot-firers. The next morning (the day that the injury occurred) plaintiff returned to the mine about 6:30 a. m., and after warming himself in the boiler room went down into said mine and to said room. Upon arriving there he found that during the night a considerable quantity of rock had fallen from the roof of the room and that the props had fallen (caused, possibly, by the firing [359] of the shots). It was the custom in the mine that loose rock that fell from the roofs of the different rooms was cleaned up and taken away by special men which the company had in their employ for that work. Defendant's foreman came into plaintiff's room that morning and commented on the amount of loose rock that was down and told the plaintiff to clean out "a couple of cars of coal in front" and that then the company would clean up the rock. To this plaintiff said "all right" and then asked the foreman if he (the foreman) thought any more of the roof would fall. In answer to this question, the foreman took plaintiff's pick and tested the roof above the place where plaintiff was working and after sounding the roof told the plaintiff that it was sound and safe. This was about an hour and a half or two hours prior to the accident. After the foreman left the room, plaintiff cleaned up the two cars of coal and then went to see a Mr. Batley, who was then in the employ of defendant to do the special work of cleaning up the fallen rock from the rooms. Upon being asked by plaintiff as to when he could come and clean up said rock, Batley replied that he could not get to it that day and directed plaintiff to go and see the foreman, Mr. Shaw; about it. Plaintiff thereupon called upon and requested the foreman to get some one else to do the work of cleaning up the loose rock. The foreman made the proposition to plaintiff that he (plaintiff) clean up the loose rock and that the company would pay him "extra" for doing that work. To this plaintiff agreed; returned to his room and started to clean up the loose rock. After having picked up five or six pieces of rock and while he was in the act of lifting another piece the slab fell upon him. The slab fell from that portion of the roof which the foreman had just previously inspected. The slab gave no warning of its breaking away. Plaintiff testified that he did not know that the roof was dangerous; he testified that he sounded the [360] roof and that it sounded solid to him—but it does not appear from the evidence as to the exact time that plaintiff sounded the roof; as to whether it was on the day of the accident, and after the foreman had sounded the roof, or during the three previous days that he worked in the room, or on the morning of the accident and before the foreman sounded the roof, the evidence is silent. Plaintiff further testified that he was not an experienced coal digger; that, while he had worked in the mines about four years at different times and places, most of his work had been driving mules in the mines, etc., and that he had had only about two months' experience in digging coal. He testified that he was not familiar with the character and formation of the rock in this mine and that when the foreman of the mine sounded the roof and told him it was sound and safe, he relied upon what the foreman said, because he thought the foreman "would know, if anyone would." By plaintiff's other witnesses it was shown that there was a defect in the formation of the rock in the roof of this room. The defect was known as a "clay slip" and that this kind of defect made a roof very dangerous and treacherous and that the air would get into the rock formation at this defective place and sometimes in the night and sometimes in a day and a half or two days the rock would loosen so that it would fall, depending upon the kind of rock and the conditions surrounding it. One of plaintiff's witnesses, an expert miner, testified that he examined the rock after its fall and that it was his opinion that the rock in question loosened by slow process and that the air would strike the rock where it broke and it "would gradually break away from the place where it was exposed to the air." Plaintiff's evidence further tended to show that if this rock had been examined one or two hours before it fell by a practical miner its dangerous and loose condition could have been ascertained. That if the roof is loose and dangerous [361] it will sound hollow and drummy, and that if it is solid, it will sound solid. The evidence tended to show that it was the duty of the miners to look after the safety of the roof in the rooms in which they worked. Plaintiff was receiving $2.56 a day for doing the kind of work he was doing at the time he was injured. As to plaintiff's injuries, the doctor testified that one of plaintiff's legs was broken and one foot was broken in the angle joint, causing two or three bones to protrude through the skin; that the bones of the pelvis were dislocated; that some of the nerves of body were paralyzed and that plaintiff suffered severe pain and was confined to his bed about three months and that he considered plaintiff's injuries permanent. The plaintiff testified, as to his injuries, that he had suffered severe pain; that by reason of the injuries received he was confined to his bed thirteen weeks, and after that it was about four weeks before he could use crutches; that he then used crutches three months and after that and from June until October he moved about by the use of a cane and that at the time of the trial he was able to walk without the use of a cane; that the injuries affected his sleep and rendered him impotent and that as a result of the injuries he had practically lost his sexual desire. The doctor also testified that, if plaintiff was impotent, his impotency was, in his opinion, caused by the injuries. Defendant objected to the introduction of this evidence on the ground only that the petition did not allege an injury of that kind, which objection was overruled by the court and defendant excepted. Plaintiff testified that at the time of trial he was making three dollars a day working as a checkweighman; that his duty was to see that the company weighman correctly weighed the coal for the various miners; that during the summer he had endeavored to do some work shoveling on the streets; that he would be able to work one day if the work was not too heavy and would then [362] have to lay off the next day and that finally he had to quit the work because he could not stand it. The evidence on the part of defendant tended to show that it was the duty of the miner to look after his own room. Charles Batley testified that plaintiff came to him the morning of the accident and told the witness that the roof in his room was bad and that the rock was down and wanted him to come and look at it. Another of defendant's witnesses testified that after the accident plaintiff admitted to him that he was fixing a place to set a prop when the rock fell. Mr. Shaw, the defendant's foreman, at the time of the injury, testified for the defendant that he no longer worked for the defendant but was at present engaged in running a drug store. This witness denied that he was in the plaintiff's room on the morning of the accident and denied that he sounded the roof or that he told plaintiff the roof was solid and that the only talk he had with plaintiff on that day was when plaintiff came to him and he employed plaintiff to clean up the loose rock. This witness further testified that when he first showed plaintiff the room (which was about four or five days before the accident) he told plaintiff of the "clay slip" in the room and that the support must not be taken out from under the roof at that place.

Plaintiff's instructions numbered 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5, which are challenged by appellant, are as follows:

"1. The court instructs the jury that if you believe from the greater weight of evidence in the cause: That at the time plaintiff was injured he was in the employ of the defendant company as a laborer in the ground of defendant's mine, and that he was in the charge of and under the control and direction of one D. P. Shaw, as mine foreman in said mine, and that said Shaw was employed by the defendant to act as such foreman; and if you further believe that as such foreman said Shaw had authority, and that it was his duty, to have charge of and direct the work and the manner [363] in which plaintiff was engaged at the time he was injured; and that it was the duty of the plaintiff to obey the orders and directions of said mine foreman as to the place and manner of doing the work in said mine at the time plaintiff was injured; that while so engaged and in obedience to the commands and directions of said mine foreman the said foreman negligently directed plaintiff to clean up the rock and other debris in room No. 4 referred to in plaintiff's petition and prior to said command had assured said plaintiff when inquired of, whether it was safe to work in said room on account of the top or overhanging rocks, that it was safe and that the plaintiff in obedience to said orders, and relying upon said assurance did go to work and commence to clean up the rock and other debris in said room and while in obedience to said orders he was in the discharge of the duty and work assigned him a large slab of rock fell from said top or roof which resulted in plaintiff's injuries then the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this action, unless precluded for some other reason assigned in the further instructions given you.

"2. The court instructs the jury that notwithstanding you may believe from the evidence in the cause that the plaintiff knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care on his part could have known, that the position he was working in, at the time he was injured, in room 4, in question, was not a safe one, yet, this does not and should not defeat his recovery in this case; if you further find and believe from the evidence that he was negligently ordered into this position by the defendant's mine foreman, D. P. Shaw, and was assured by the said Shaw that the slab of rock that fell on plaintiff would not fall and that the danger from the said slab of rock overhanging said place was not of such glaring and dangerous nature as to threaten immediate injury in case he obeyed said order.

[364] "3. The court instructs the jury that if you find and believe from the greater weight of the evidence in the cause that the slab of rock which fell upon and injured the plaintiff was in a loose and dangerous condition in the roof of room number 4 of defendant's mine number 50 on the morning of November 24, 1908, and that the defendant's foreman D. P. Shaw inspected and sounded the same and found the same to be loose and in a dangerous condition and liable to fall or if by the exercise of ordinary care on his part he could have discovered the loose and dangerous condition thereof by said inspection, if the same was in a loose and dangerous condition, if you find that he did so inspect said rock, and assured plaintiff that it would not fall and that after the said assurance on his part he ordered plaintiff to work in said room beneath said slab of rock, then said order was negligently made and said assurance was negligently given within the meaning of these instructions, unless the danger was of such a glaring nature that no prudent person, under the circumstances, would have obeyed the order.

"4. The court instructs the jury that they are the sole judges of weight and credibility of the testimony of the witnesses in this case and if they find and believe that any witness has wilfully sworn falsely to any material facts at issue in this case, then the jury are at liberty to disregard the whole or any part of such witness's testimony.

"5. The court instructs the jury that if you find the issues for the plaintiff, in determining the measure of damages, you may take into consideration the mental and physical pain and suffering endured by plaintiff since said injury in consequence thereof, the character and extent of said injury and its continuance, if permanent, together with his loss of time and service. And you may find for him in such sum as in the judgment of the jury, under the evidence, will be reasonable compensation for the injury, not to exceed [365] the sum of thirty-nine thousand, nine hundred dollars."

I. It is contended that the court erred in overruling defendant's demurrer to the evidence. In support of this contention appellant refers to defendant's evidence which is in conflict with the evidence offered by plaintiff. It is too well settled to need citation of authority, that in determining whether a demurrer to the evidence should have been sustained or overruled, defendant's evidence tending to show absence of plaintiff's right to recover cannot be considered, but the demurrer must be tested by the strength of plaintiff's evidence aided by any of defendant's evidence that may help make out plaintiff's case. And in passing upon the sufficiency of the evidence challenged by demurrer, the general rule is that plaintiff's evidence and "every reasonable inference of fact arising therefrom" is to be taken as true. [Stauffer v. Metropolitan St. R. Co. 243 Mo. 305, 1. c. 316, 147 S. W. 1032.] Proceeding, then, to a review of plaintiff's evidence, we find that defendant's foreman came into the mining room in which plaintiff was the sole worker and that while there plaintiff asked the foreman if he thought more of the roof would fall, thereby inferring that plaintiff had some doubt about the matter. In answer to this question, or request, the foreman took plaintiff's pick and undertook to inspect the roof for the purpose of determining its condition. The foreman inspected the part of the roof that afterwards fell and injured plaintiff and after making an inspection assured plaintiff that the roof was sound and safe. Plaintiff testified that he was somewhat inexperienced, was not familiar with the character of rock in the roof, but thought the foreman would know and relied upon the foreman's assurance; that relying on this assurance of safety, he continued to work in said room and in an hour or two [366] thereafter the slab fell causing plaintiff's injuries. The testimony of expert miners, testifying in plaintiff's behalf, further tended to show that the slab in question became loosened slowly and gradually and that if a proper inspection of the roof had been made at the time the foreman made the inspection it could have been discovered that the rock was loose and liable to fall. The above facts were within the scope of negligence alleged in the petition and were sufficient to make defendant's liability a question for the jury's determination.

It is true that plaintiff's evidence tended to show that, ordinarily, it was the duty of plaintiff to look out for his own safety in the room in which he worked and that the duty of the defendant was to furnish such props as might be required for use in propping the roof. But even though, as a general proposition, this be conceded, yet, when defendant's vice-principal, the foreman, came into the room and in answer to plaintiff's question or request, undertook or assumed the duty of making an inspection as to the safety or soundness of the roof it undoubtedly then (if not before) became the duty of the defendant to exercise ordinary care to ascertain the true condition of the roof and (at least) to inform plaintiff of the facts that an ordinarily careful inspection would have revealed.

In discussing a very analogous situation, involving the care that defendant should exercise in performing an assumed duty, the Supreme Court of Illinois in the case of St. Louis Consol. Coal Co. v. Scheiber, 167 Ill. 539, 1. e. 545, 47 N. E. 1052, said:

"Whether, therefore, it was the duty of appellant (the defendant company) or not to prop the roof, still, if it assumed that duty and undertook to discharge it, and did so in such a careless manner that the roof was thereby loosened and rendered more liable to fall, and the plaintiff was in the exercise of due care for his own safety, as alleged and as necessarily [367] found by the jury, the appellant would be liable. Having undertaken to perform the work it became its duty to perform it in a proper manner, whether bound in the first place to perform it at all or not." (Italics ours.)

The evidence in the case at bar does not show that the danger was so obvious and glaring that a reasonably prudent man would not have continued to work in said room and plaintiff testified that he relied upon the assurance of safety made by the foreman. Under the facts disclosed by the evidence it should not therefore be said that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. [Swearingen v. Consolidated Troup Min. Co. 212 Mo. 524, 111 S. W. 545; Hamman v. Central Coal, etc. Co. 156 Mo. 232, 56 S. W. 1091.] It follows therefore that the court did not err in overruling the demurrer to the evidence.

II. It is further contended that the court erred in giving plaintiff's instructions numbered 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5. (Instructions are copied in full in foregoing statement.)

It will be seen by comparison of the testimony with the allegations of the petition that the only actionable negligence which the evidence tended to support was the negligent assurance given by defendant's foreman to plaintiff as to the soundness or safety of the roof, relied upon by plaintiff and given by the foreman knowing that plaintiff would most likely continue to work in said room, and further perhaps in permitting or "setting plaintiff to work" in said room after giving such negligent assurance without correcting the same.

Plaintiff's instruction number 1 undertakes to cover the whole case, at least the whole case so far as the actionable negligence of defendant is concerned. It will be noticed that this instruction does not require the jury to find that the assurance was negligently [368] given. It does not require the jury to find facts which would amount to a negligent assurance! By that instruction the defendant is made an insurer as to the correctness of the facts disclosed by said assurance without regard to whether the assurance was or was not negligently given. Defendant upon assuming the duty of inspecting the roof was not bound to give plaintiff absolutely correct information about the condition of said roof, but only such information as a reasonably careful inspection, under the circumstances, would have revealed. The negligent assurance, as involved by the facts of the case, lies at the very foundation of plaintiff's cause of action, for if the jury should find that there was no negligence in the giving of the assurance then there would have been no negligence in permitting plaintiff to work in said room under the facts disclosed by the evidence in this case, as discussed in the preceding paragraph. In support of the correctness of his instructions, plaintiff cites a line of cases of which the following cases are fair samples; Swearingen v. Consolidated Troup Min. Co. 212 Mo. 524, 111 S. W. 545; Carter v. Baldwin, 107 Mo. App. 217, 81 S. W. 204. In fact plaintiff's instruction number 1 so closely resembles instruction number 1 in the case of Carter v. Baldwin, supra, as to indicate that the instruction in the latter case was used as a form or model for the instruction in the case at bar. While the instructions in the Carter case were discussed but slightly, yet, it appears from the facts stated by the court in that case that the question of assurance was in the case to the extent only of relieving plaintiff from the effect of contributory negligence or assumed risks and was not the essence of the actionable negligence as in the case at bar. The same is true as to the question of assurance in the other cases cited by respondent. There is quite a difference between the situation involved in the cases cited by respondent and the case at bar and the distinction is important. In the line of cases relied upon [369] by respondent as above stated the matter of assurance was involved and relied upon to the extent only of relieving plaintiff from the effects of contributory negligence or assumed risks, but in the case at bar the primary function of the matter of assurance is to supply the ground or basis of defendant's actionable negligence. It therefore becomes apparent that the authorities relied upon are so different in their fundamental facts as to afford no authority for the correctness of plaintiff's instruction number 1 under the rather peculiar situation involved in the case at bar. It follows that the giving of said instruction constituted error. Neither can we say that the defect in instruction number 1 was cured by the giving of plaintiff's instruction number 3 which undertakes to set forth what facts would constitute a negligent assurance, etc. The terms, "negligent assurance" or that the "assurance was negligently given," are not contained in instruction number 1, and it could not be said that a definition of those terms would make clear the meaning of instruction number 1 which did not contain such terms. Furthermore, even though instruction number 1 had contained those terms, all the facts constituting the actionable negligence should be required to be found by this instruction which attempted to cover the entire ground of actionable negligence. Instruction number 3 was not an attempt to define, as is usually done, such abstract terms as "negligence" or "carelessness" but it was an attempt to supply facts which should have been required to have been found by the main instruction and when incorporated in the separate instruction would serve to confuse rather than to aid the jury.

Instruction number 2 is subject to criticism in that it fails to require the jury to find that plaintiff relied upon the assurance of safety. See instruction covering [370] same proposition in case of Swearingen v. Consolidated Troup Min. Co. 212 Mo. 1 c. 537, 111 S. W. 545.

There was no error in the giving of instructions 4 and 5. It is true that instruction 5 assumes plaintiff's suffering, injury and loss of time which would make the instruction vulnerable had there been a contested issue in the trial court as to whether plaintiff in fact did sustain injury and suffer pain and loss of time. But where, as here, the fact of his being injured, etc., is not questioned or disputed the defect in the instruction becomes unimportant.

III. Plaintiff was permitted to prove that the injuries he received resulted in impotency. Defendant objected to the introduction of this evidence on the ground the petition failed to allege that impotency resulted from the injuries received. The court overruled the objection and defendant saved an exception. The admission of this evidence is assigned as error. The petition describes the injuries and results in the following language: "His body was severely and permanently wounded, bruised, contused, torn and mangled both internally and externally, and that the bones, flesh and ligaments of his hips, pelvis, legs and ankle were broken, bruised, torn and mangled, and that he suffered great bodily and mental pain and anguish as the result of said injuries aforesaid, and was confined to his bed and room, by reason thereof, for a long period of time, to-wit, the period of about thirteen weeks; that by reason of said injuries he was disabled and prevented from attending to his business affairs and interests or doing anything whatever towards gaining a livelihood from the date of said injury to the present time, and is and was, as a result of said injuries, permanently injured and crippled for life, that ever since said injuries and as a result thereof and by [371] reason of said injuries he has suffered, does suffer and will continue to suffer for the remainder of his life, great bodily pain, annoyance, inconvenience and expense."

It will be noticed that the petition fails to specifically allege impotency, neither does it contain an allegation of a general nature which might be said to embrace within its terms the condition of impotency. It is true that impotency might result from the injuries described, so might paralysis and many other diseases or conditions, but it cannot be said that impotency would necessarily result from the injuries detailed or described. If a condition or disease necessarily results or follows an injury there could be no valid reason for requiring the same to be specifically pleaded, because it would be presumed that the defendant would know, or at least be expected to discover before trial, those results or conditions which are necessarily produced by the injury alleged. Under such circumstances defendant would have ample opportunity to inquire into and to investigate the conditions so resulting and thereby be enabled to come to the trial of the cause fully prepared to present to the triers of the facts such defense as the results of his investigation might warrant. But where the condition or result is not a necessary result, how can the defendant be apprised of such issue unless the plaintiff (who certainly has full information on the subject) be required to state such result or condition in his petition? If plaintiff is not required to so plead, then, in effect, he is given license to ambush defendant in the trial contest by springing an issue as to special damages which the defendant could not have foreseen. And where the petition is such as in the case at bar, defendant could not have aided the situation by filing a motion to make more specific, because the petition contains no general terms which would by being made more specific uncover [372] the hidden secret that impotency resulted from the injuries.

"General damages are those which necessarily and by implication of law result from the act or default complained of. . . . Special damages as contradistinguished from general damages have been defined as those which are the natural but not the necessary result of the act complained of." [8 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 542-3; Brown v. Hannibal, etc. R. Co. 99 Mo. 310, 12 S. W. 655; Nicholson v. Rogers, 129 Mo. 136, 31 S. W. 260.]

"Special damages, which are the natural but not necessary result of the injury complained of, must be specifically alleged. Such injuries do not necessarily result from the defendant's wrongful act, but flow from it as a natural and proximate consequence; hence they must be specially alleged in order that the defendant may have notice thereof and be prepared to meet the same upon the trial." [5 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 719, and numerous cases therein cited; Brown v. Railroad, supra; Nicholson v. Rogers, supra; Bliss on Code Pleading (3 ed.) par. 297a, 297b; 13 Cyc. 176.]

The rule above announced seems to be in conflict with what is said on that subject in the case of Gurley v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 122 Mo. 141, 26 S. W. 953, and the majority opinion in the case of Moore v. St. Louis Transit Co. 226 Mo. 689, 126 S. W. 1013. The exact point raised in the Gurley case is not disclosed with sufficient clearness to enable us to determine whether it in fact conflicts with the conclusions herein announced; but the Moore case, at least in a part of the discussion of the subject and in the result reached on the point, is in conflict with the rule which is herein announced. After a careful review of the authorities, we have come to the conclusion that those cases, in so far as they conflict with the conclusion herein reached, should be no longer followed.

Upon a careful consideration of the subject and review of the authorities we have come to the conclusion that the correct rule, the rule which has for its [373] support the sounder logic and which while it works no unjust hardship upon the pleader yet undoubtedly bespeaks justice and greater fairness for the trial conflict, is stated by Graves, J., in his dissenting opinion in the case of Moore v. St. Louis Transit Co. 226 Mo. 1. c. 710, as follows:

"It is a well-known fact that from certain kinds of physical injuries, certain results will thereafter inevitably follow. In other words, that such injuries will naturally produce certain conditions and diseases. In such case an allegation in the petition of the injury inflicted would justify proof of such conditions and diseases as would of necessity follow the injury and as to such conditions and diseases the defendant must come prepared to defend. But, on the other hand, there are other physical injuries which may or may not produce resulting conditions or diseases. For instance, an injury to the lung might superinduce pneumonia, but not necessarily so. An injury to the nervous system might produce blindness, but not necessarily so. These conditions or diseases last mentioned may as readily come from other causes as from the physical injury or injuries. In such case the petition should be specific, to the end that the defendant could come prepared to meet the issues and show that the condition or disease was not caused by the physical injury. This he cannot do if the unpleaded conditions or diseases are sprung upon him for the first time at the trial."

It therefore follows that the allegations of the petition were not sufficient to justify the admission of proof of impotency and the court erred in admitting such evidence over defendant's objection and exception. [Campbell v. Cook, 86 Tex. 630, 26 S. W. 486, 40 Am. St. Rep. 878; Jones v. Niagara Junction R. Co. 63 App. Div. 607, 71 N. Y. S. 647; Missouri, etc. R. Co. v. Cook, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 376, 27 S. W. 769; Page v. Delaware, etc. Canal Co. 76 App. Div. 160.]

[374] By reason of the result reached, it becomes unnecessary to discuss the question raised by appellant as to the excessiveness of the verdict.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded. Roy, C., concurs.

PER CURIAM.—By reason of the fact that paragraph III of the foregoing opinion conflicted with the majority opinion of the Court in Banc in the case of Moore v. Transit Company, supra, this cause was transferred to Court in Banc for final determination, and in Banc the opinion of Williams, C., was adopted, Lamm, C. J., and Woolson, J., dissenting.

NOTE.

Necessity That Impotency Be Plead- Specially in Action for Personal In- juries.

Generally.

The necessity of pleading impotency specially in an action for damages for personal injuries has been passed on by the courts, as a general proposition, in only a few instances. There are, however, other decisions which rule on the admissibility of evidence of impotency, as an element of damage, under a particular pleading presented. Those decisions are reviewed infra in the subdivision Specific Instances.

The rule laid down in the reported case that unless impotency or the loss of sexual power is necessarily the result of the injuries detailed or described, it must be alleged specifically in order that it may be proven as an element of damage finds direct support in the following decisions. Jones v. Niagara Junction R. Co. 63 App. Div. 607, 71 N. Y. S. 647; Page v. Delaware, etc. Canal Co. 76 App. Div. 160, 12 N. Y. Ann. Cas. 18, 78 N. Y. S. 454; Johnson v. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. (Mo.) 178 S. W. 239 (following reported case); Campbell v. Cook, 86 Tex. 630, 26 S. W. 486, 40 Am. St. Rep. 878; Missouri, etc. R. Co. v. Cook, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 376, 27 S. W. 769. Compare Moore v. St. Louis Transit Co. 226 Mo. 689, 126 S. W. 1013 (disapproved in reported case). In Page v. Delaware, etc. Canal Co. supra, an action for personal injuries, evidence of the fact of an injury to the plaintiff's sexual organs was admitted at the trial over the defendant's objection that the injury was not specified in the pleading. The court quoted the following rule from an early case: "When a plaintiff alleges that his person has been injured and proves the allegation, the law implies damages, and he may recover such as necessarily and immediately flow from the injury . . . under a general allegation that damages were sustained; but if he seeks to recover damages for consequences which do not necessarily and immediately flow from the injury, . . .

he must allege the special damages which he seeks to recover." Applying that rule it was said: "Within this rule of law it seems clear that an injury to the plaintiff's sexual organs was not one of the injuries specified in the complaint as caused by the accident, nor was it one of those injuries which necessarily and immediately flow from any injury alleged. The learned trial judge admitted the evidence upon condition that it should thereafter be made to appear that such affection resulted from the injuries sustained; but this holding did not satisfy the rule of law that unless such affection be a consequence which necessarily and immediately results from the injury pleaded, it requires special allegation in the pleading to authorize proof thereof." In Campbell v. Cook, 86 Tex. 630, 26 S. W. 486, 40 Am. St. Rep. 878, the court said: "At the trial the court permitted the plaintiff, over the defendant's objections, to testify, that 'his capacity to have sexual intercourse with his wife was greatly impaired,' to which the defendant objected, 'because there was no allegation in the petition which would authorize the admission of such evidence, and because the petition does not claim such damages.' It is well settled in this state, that a general allegation of damages will let in evidence of such damages as naturally and necessarily result from the wrongs charged; but to admit proof of damages which do not necessarily result from the injury alleged, the petition must set up the particular effects claimed to have followed the injury. . . . The object of pleading is to notify the opposite party of what it is expected to prove on the trial. In this case there was no injury alleged to have been inflicted upon any organ or member of the body from which such 'impairment' would naturally not to say necessarily, follow. The court erred in admitting the evidence." In Jones v. Niagara Junction R. Co. 63 App. Div. 607, 71 N. Y. S. 647, the allegation of the complaint was that the plaintiff was injured in his "back, sides, shoulder and internally, shocking his system and wrenching and straining his body, injuring his spinal column and spinal cord, then and there causing him great pain and suffering which still continues, and causing the plaintiff to take to his bed and preventing him from following his usual occupation." While on the stand evidence was given by the plaintiff without objection to the effect, inter alia, that he was unable to perform any sexual act. This evidence was given in response to questions addressed to the particular fact and was not objected to by the defendant, nor was there any dispute that the alleged condition existed. Afterwards the plaintiff's wife was put on the stand and was asked whether the plaintiff had had any sexual intercourse with her since the accident. That question was objected to on the ground that it was incompetent, immaterial and not within the pleadings. The objection was overruled and the defendant excepted. The defendant afterwards moved to strike out the testimony in that regard and that motion was also denied. Subsequently the defendant asked the court to charge the jury that they should disregard the evidence given by the plaintiff as to his inability to talk and laugh and as to his loss of sexual power, which the court refused to do. The court was then requested to charge that as the evidence stood there was no evidence showing that the plaintiff had sustained any loss of sexual power, which the court also refused. He was then asked to charge the jury that they were not to allow any sum whatever as damages by reason of any claim of loss of sexual power on the part of the plaintiff, and to this request the court acceded and directed the jury that there was no claim made by the plaintiff in that regard, his only claim being that his loss of sexual power was a symptom, or evidence, that he had in fact received the injury for which he did claim damages. He was further asked to charge that the jury were to allow damages for only so much of his injury as this was a symptom of, and not for the symptom itself, and in response the court charged that they were not to allow any damages for the loss of sexual power. The court said: "In all of these rulings we are of the opinion that no error was committed. It is quite true that under the pleadings no claim was made for damages because of the loss of sexual power, and it would have been improper to allow any damages to the plaintiff in that respect. . . . But they were expressly told that they could not allow any damages on that account, and, so far as that ruling was concerned, no objection was made to it, and it was manifestly proper. The only way the question is raised is by the objection taken to the ruling permitting the plaintiff's wife to testify to the fact of the loss of sexual power. The plaintiff claims that this evidence was competent as proof of a symptom indicating the extent of the injury to the plaintiff's back. We do not agree with that contention, and if the proper objection had been made to the reception of the evidence in the first instance, that it was incompetent under the pleadings, we are inclined to think that it could not properly have been received for the purpose for which the plaintiff offered it."

However, where impotency is the direct and proximate result of the injury inflicted, evidence of that fact is admissible although the complaint does not in terms specify impotency. Thus in Denver, etc. R. Co. v. Harris, 122 U. S. 597, 7 S. Ct. 1283, 30 U. S.

(L. ed.) 1146, the court said: "One of the consequences of the wound received by the plaintiff at the hands of the defendant's servants was the loss of the power to have offspring—a loss resulting directly and proximately from the nature of the wound. Evidence of this fact was, therefore, admissible, although the declaration does not, in terms, specify such loss as one of the results of the wound. The court very properly instructed the jury that such impotency, if caused by the defendant's wrong, might be considered in estimating any compensatory damages to which the plaintiff might be found, under all the evidence, to be entitled." And in Morfield v. Weidner (Neb.) 154 N. W. 860, the rule laid down in the foregoing case was approved and applied where it appeared that the action was instituted to recover for an assault and there was evidence of the fact that the defendant had administered a severe kick in the plaintiff's private parts. See to the same effect, Missouri, etc. R. Co. v. Smith (Tex.) 172 S. W. 750.

Specific Instances.

In each of the following cases evidence of impotency or loss of sexual power was held to be inadmissible under the particular pleadings presented, the cases being closely allied in principle to those maintaining the general rule stated supra. In Missouri, etc. R. Co. v. Cook, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 376, 27 S. W. 769, it appeared that the allegations of injury were that "the plaintiff was wounded, skinned, and bruised; was greatly shocked and injured in his head, chest, lungs, back, spine, and limbs, and had his nervous system seriously impaired, and thereby sustained serious external and internal injuries." At the trial, the court, over the objection of the defendant, permitted the plaintiff to testify that his genital and urinary organs were impaired. The court held that the admission of such evidence was reversible error and said: "These allegations are general, and, as has often been decided in this state, will admit proof of such injuries as are the natural and necessary result of wrong complained of; as upon an allegation that plaintiff was cut, bruised, and wounded internally and externally about his hip and spine, evidence of physical pain and mental suffering was held to be admissible. . . . But the damages of a special character to be proved must be alleged." In Johnson v. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. (Mo.) 178 S. W. 239, the rule laid down in the reported case was specifically followed and approved. The petition alleged with respect to the plaintiff's injuries and the results flowing therefrom as follows: "That he was thrown violently across the arms of the seat from which he had arisen, his back striking the upright or corners of said seat about the coupling of the back, and a little to the left of the spine, thus and thereby bruising and permanently injuring his back and spinal column; that his head and neck were thrown violently back over and against the top of two seats which were turned together, thus and thereby greatly bruising plaintiff's head and neck and the muscles thereof, and permanently injuring his neck and head and the muscles thereof, and that in undertaking to catch himself and protect himself from the fall aforesaid his left hand was thrown violently against a seat in said train, bruising and spraining and dislocating the joints of his left thumb; that the blow or lick on the left of the spine and near the coupling of the plaintiff's back and the blow or lick on plaintiff's neck and head when his neck and head were thrown back over the tops of said seats, as aforesaid, caused plaintiff's left side to be partially paralyzed and has impaired permanently the sight of plaintiff's left eye, and has permanently injured plaintiff's nervous system; that the blow or lick near the spine or coupling of plaintiff's back, as aforesaid, caused plaintiff to partially lose the use of his right side; that the blow or fall as aforesaid near the coupling of plaintiff's back has permanently disordered plaintiff's kidneys and liver and other vital organs, and the bruise near the spine or at or near the coupling of plaintiff's back, together with the other injuries received, has caused plaintiff to become affected and afflicted with lumbago, and vertigo and paralysis; and plaintiff states that his back and spine are permanently injured, and that his left eye and vision is permanently injured, and that because of the paralysis produced as aforesaid his left leg and arm are permanently injured, and he has partially lost the use of the same." The court said: "The petition does not allege, either directly or indirectly, specifically or generally, that impotency resulted from the injuries alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff, and it cannot be said that impotency would necessarily result from the injuries which the petition alleges that plaintiff received. Plaintiff's own physician testified that impotency was not a necessary result of such injuries, though it might follow therefrom."

However, in each of the following cases evidence of a similar character was admitted under the averments of the complaint presented to the court. In Missouri, etc. R. Co. v. Smith (Tex.) 172 S. W. 750, the court held that the evidence of the plaintiff and his wife that as a result of the injuries that he had received, he was rendered impotent and incapable of sexual intercourse was properly received under a complaint which averred inter alia that the injuries he suffered had caused "progressive degenerative diseases of the spinal cord to set in" and had "set up a degenerative process and condition in the plaintiff's brain and other organs, causing plaintiff to have, among other afflictions and troubles, a partial paralysis of his left side," and further, that the "injuries among other things have caused a degeneration of the central nervous system to the impairment of his mental capacity," etc. The court said: "No effort was made by exceptions interposed to the petition to have appellee to specify the 'other organs' than the brain affected, nor the 'other afflictions and troubles' than the paralysis suffered, as charged, because of the 'degenerative process and condition' caused by the injury to the spinal cord, nor to specify the 'other things' beside impairment of his mental capacity, alleged to have been caused by the 'degeneration of the central nervous system.'" It was further pointed out by the court that on the trial one of the physicians had testified that "impotency is one of the natural things to follow an injury of that kind." This testimony was regarded as bringing the evidence of impotency, in the case, at bar, within the rule of a "natural and necessary" result of the injury alleged. In Strauss v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 94 S. Ct. 324, 77 S. E. 1117, an action for damages, the trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff and the defendants appealed on several exceptions among which was the following: "That his Honor erred in permitting the plaintiff to testify in response to the following question: 'What effect has it on your powers of manhood, on your sexual powers?' Objection. Mr. Moss: 'We object. That is a particular injury and should be specifically alleged. They have not set that up in the complaint and it is therefore incompetent.' The court: 'Answer the question. They have been materially decreased.' Mr. Moss: 'Will your Honor have our exceptions noted?' Mr. Raysor: 'I will withdraw the question.' We respectfully submit that it is improper to permit a question to be asked and on objection and after it has been answered for counsel to withdraw the question, especially when the jury has heard the answer of the witness." The court said: "The injuries alleged in the complaint were, that 'The plaintiff has suffered grievous and long-continued bodily pain; was and is, and always will be, incapacitated for work . . . has been maimed and permanently injured, and prevented from pursuing any active calling in life, and otherwise hurt.' Not only was the question admissible under the allegations of the complaint, but it would have been admissible under general allegations of injury, in order that the jury might be able to render a proper verdict." In Hoyt v. Metro- politan St. R. Co. 73 App. Div. 249, 76 N. Y. S. 832 (affirmed 175 N. Y. 502, 67 N. E. 1083), it was held that the complaint was sufficient to authorize proof of the fact, inter alia, that plaintiff had suffered loss of sexual power. The court said: "Its averments are nearly identical in language, and entirely so in substance, with the complaint the subject of examination in Ehrgott v. New York, 96 N. Y. 264." The complaint referred to averred that the plaintiff had suffered great bodily injury; that he became, and still continued to be, sick, sore and disabled; that he was obliged to spend large sums in attempting to cure himself, and was prevented for a long time from attending to his business. The court in Hoyt v. Metropolitan St. R. Co. supra, in commenting on the foregoing averments in the case of Ehrgott v. New York, supra, said: "These allegations are sufficient to authorize proof of any bodily injury resulting from the accident, and if the defendant desired that they should be more definite, it could have moved to have them made more specific, or for a bill of particulars." In Galveston, etc. R. Co. v. Collins, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 70, 71 S. W. 560, the defendant assigned as error the refusal of the trial court to charge the jury to disregard the plaintiff's testimony that he was unable to perform family duty, because the testimony did not contribute any legal basis for the estimation of damages, and because the plaintiff did not show that such disability was the result of the accident, or that previously he was not in the same condition, or that the loss of that power had occasioned any mental pain or suffering. The particular allegation of injury in the complaint does not appear. The court said: "Plaintiff testified that this condition was the effect of his injuries. Dr. Caffery testified that such injuries as plaintiff's impaired this capacity. Appellant cites nothing which holds that such a disability may not be considered in estimating damages. We overrule the assignment." In Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. v. Likes, 225 Ill. 249, 80 N. E. 136, by an amendment to his amended declaration the plaintiff alleged that on account of the injuries received by him he was rendered impotent for the rest of his natural life. He testified that he was in perfect health up to the time he was injured. On his direct examination he was asked by his counsel: "Now, Mr. Likes, how have you been with reference to your virility since the accident?" He replied, "Almost entirely gone." The court said: "The evidence shows that the plaintiff's nervous system was very seriously impaired by reason of the injuries received by him; that he has temporary periods of insanity and has suicidal and homicidal tendencies, and that it will eventually be necessary to confine him in an asylum for the insane. We think that the evidence tended to show that all of the plaintiff's disorders, including loss or impairment of virility, were the result of the injuries received by him November 4, 1901. There was therefore no error in the action of the court in refusing to strike out the testimony of Likes that his virility was almost entirely gone."

Somewhat analogous to the foregoing cases are a number of decisions in actions instituted by women for damages for personal injuries resulting inter alia, in incapacity for sexual intercourse. Thus, in Lake Shore, etc. R. Co. v. Ward, 135 Ill. 511, 26 N. E. 520, the averment was that the plaintiff was knocked down on the ground and thereby bruised, hurt and wounded, and that divers bones of her body were broken, and that she was grievously wounded internally, and became sick, sore, lame and disordered, and had so remained, and that she feared greatly that her said injuries were of such a grievous nature that she might not recover therefrom for a long time and possibly not during the term of her life. The pleading was held to be broad enough to include injuries to the internal reproductive organs and sufficient to admit evidence tending to show that the injuries had produced permanent sterility or incapacity to perform the sexual duties incident to the marriage state. In Dallas v. Jones, 54 S. W. 606 (reversed on other grounds 93 Tex. 38, 49 S. W. 577, 53 S. W. 377), evidence to the effect that, as a result of an injury to the spine sustained by the plaintiff, the "violent and excessive exertion connected with the sexual act would throw her into spasms" was held to be admissible although there was no allegation in the plaintiff's petition to support it, but there being evidence by a physician, however, to the effect that the condition could be attributed to nothing but the injury. In Gulf, etc. R. Co. v. Pendery, 14 Tex. Civ. App. 60, 36 S. W. 793, the court said: "The plaintiff . . . without objection on the part of the defendant, testified as follows: 'My wife is in such a condition that she cannot receive the approaches of myself as her husband in the generative relation without pain, and always has been since the time of the accident to the present time.' The effect of this testimony the defendant sought to avoid by submitting to the court special charges . . . the refusal of which is complained of in the . . . assignments of error. These charges were to the effect that the jury, in assessing the plaintiff's damage, would not take into consideration any evidence of mental or physical pain experienced by the wife during sexual intercourse with her husband. It is insisted that the court erred in refusing these special instructions, upon the proposition that the damages thus indicated are not the necessary consequences of the injury, and should not have been submitted to the jury in the absence of special allegations. The plaintiff's petition alleging injury is as follows: 'Wounding and bruising plaintiff's said wife in the pit of her stomach and in her back, then and there causing her great pain and suffering, and serious internal and permanent injuries, and causing her to suffer in both body and mind, and then and there damaging plaintiff in the sum of fifteen thousand dollars.' The testimony of physicians, witnesses for the plaintiff, . . . is to the effect that one of the 'serious internal and permanent injuries' inflicted upon the plaintiff's wife was the displacement or prolapsus of the right ovary, and that as a result of this condition of the ovary sexual intercourse would be very painful to the woman. It thus appears that the testimony of the husband which the defendant thus indirectly sought to exclude from the consideration of the jury, was within the scope both of the pleadings and of the evidence, which tended, as we have shown, to indicate that the pain testified about was the natural and necessary consequence of the injury inflicted. No exception was taken to the pleading on account of its general character. If the defendant had desired to be advised of the special character of the 'serious internal and permanent injuries' complained of, we think it should have addressed a special exception to the petition calling for specific information in that connection." In Southern Bell Telephone Co. v. Lynch, 95 Ga. 529, 20 S. E. 500, the plaintiff was permitted to testify as follows over the defendant's objection: "I just can't sleep with him and be with him as a wife should be with her husband. I can't stand nothing like that." The court said: "Although the declaration did not specifically allege any injuries to the sexual organs of the plaintiff, there was no error in allowing the plaintiff to testify to such injuries, it appearing that her evidence as to the same was admitted solely for the purpose of throwing light on the general nature of her injuries and her pain and suffering, and that the jury was instructed not to consider the same for any other purpose."

TOWN OF WAITSFIELD

v.

TOWN OF CRAFTSBURY.

87 Vt. 406; 89 Atl. 466.

Paupers — Reimbursement of Town Furnishing Aid — Notice.

P. S. 3668, requiring the notice given by a town furnishing aid to a pauper to the town of the pauper's last residence to disclose the condition of the alleged pauper, refers to his pecuniary or financial condition.

Same.

Mere informalities in the notice given to the town of a pauper's residence by a town furnishing assistance, required to be given before commencement of an action, do not vitiate the notice.

Duty to Furnish Aid — Notice to Overseer.

Under P. S. 3665, requiring overseers of the poor to see that indigent persons are suitably supported and relieved at the charge of the town, an overseer of the poor must afford such relief whenever he is informed in any manner that relief is required.

Reimbursement of Town.

The right of a town to be reimbursed by another town for expenditures made in assisting paupers chargeable to such other town must necessarily be governed by arbitrary regulations.

Same.

The notice required by P. S. 3668 (Acts 1892, No. 55), providing that no action shall be commenced by a town furnishing assistance to a pauper until the overseer of the poor has given notice of the pauper's condition to the overseer of the town where he last resided for three years, and until such overseer has neglected to provide for such person for 60 days after such notice, must be in writing

Same.

The fact that the overseer of the poor of a town sought to be charged with supplies furnishing a pauper, upon receiving notice from plaintiff town, visited the pauper's family, and ascertained their financial condition, and conferred with the overseer of plaintiff town as to their condition, would not prevent such town from defending an action by plaintiff to recover for assistance furnished the pauper on the ground of the insufficiency of the notice given pursuant to P. S. 3668.

Same.

The fact that, after notice was given by plaintiff town to defendant town of the furnishing of supplies to a pauper from defendant town, the overseer of the poor, in refusing to pay for supplies, placed his refusal upon the ground that he did not consider such person a pauper would not prevent defendant from defending an action to recover for such supplies on the ground of the insufficiency of the notice prescribed by P. S. 3668.

Overseer of Poor — Powers.

Since the function of relieving the poor is governmental in its nature, the overseer of the poor is a public officer rather than a general agent of the town, and hence cannot by his conduct relieve a town from liability for relief of the poor under the ordinary rules as to waiver of rights by the conduct of an agent.

Who Is "Poor Person."

The fact that a person owned a horse and cow did not conclusively show that he was not a "poor person" in need of assistance from a town within the pauper laws.

[See note at end of this case.]

Exceptions from Washington County Court:
STANTON, Judge.

Action to recover money expended in support of pauper. Town of Waitsfield, plaintiff, and Town of Craftsbury, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff alleges exceptions. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

F. L. Laird and Burton E. Bailey for plaintiff.

Horace F. Graham and Benjamin Gates for defendant.

[407] HASELTON, J.—This is assumpsit under the pauper law to recover for money expended in the support of one Jerry Doying and his family. At the close of the plaintiff's evidence a verdict was directed for the defendant town. The plaintiff excepted.

[408] March 10, 1910, the overseer of the town of Waitsfield sent to the overseer of the town of Craftsbury the following notice, duly dated, directed and signed: "There is a man in our town by the name of Jerry Doying. He claims to have a residence in Craftsbury. His wife is sick and he has called on us for aid. At the present time we have to furnish a physician, keep the family in provisions and also a woman to care for Mrs. Doying. He has lived in this town nearly three years and has never been helped by the town until within a few days. Would be glad to hear from you in regard to this matter."

The first question is as to the sufficiency of this notice.

The notice, to be given within thirty days from the time of the application to a town for assistance, and before suit is brought, is required to disclose the condition of the alleged pauper. P. S. 3668. And the condition referred to is pecuniary or financial. Barnet v. Plainfield, 82 Vt. 263, 73 Atl. 579; Mt. Holly v. Peru, 72 Vt. 68, 47 Atl. 103; Essex v. Jericho, 76 Vt. 104, 56 Atl. 493; Randolph v. Roxbury, 70 Vt. 175, 40 Atl. 49.

In this notice there is nothing that relates to the financial condition of Doying, unless it is the statement of the things the plaintiff has to do for him. It is argued in substance that the verb "have" imports obligation, and that the plaintiff could have been under no obligation to assist Doying unless he was poor and in need of assistance. But at most the notice states merely the overseer's view of the town's obligation and such statement is not enough. It is very much like a statement that a town has been called on for assistance which is immaterial and insufficient for it does not show the need of assistance but only some one's view of it.

There are no equities between towns in such matters, but by an arbitrary rule the statute throws the burden of supporting a poor person in need of assistance ultimately upon the town in which such person last resided for three full years supporting himself and family provided the required notice is given. Mere informalities in the notice do not matter. But the notice in question is lacking in substance.

The law is solicitous and imperative that poor persons in any town, in need of assistance shall be relieved by such town, and the duty of its overseer to afford relief arises and becomes ineludible whenever he receives information however conveyed that relief is required. P. S. 3665; Weston v. Wallingford, 52 [409] Vt. 630; Walden v. Cabot, 25 Vt. 522; Springfield v. Chester, 68 Vt. 294, 296, 35 Atl. 322.

But the right of such town to be reimbursed for its expenditures by some other town must necessarily be governed by arbitrary regulations. Morristown v. Hardwick, 81 Vt. 31, 69 Atl. 152; Craftsbury v. Greensboro, 66 Vt. 585, 594, 29 Atl. 1024; Worcester v. East Montpelier, 61 Vt. 139, 17 Atl. 842.

The plaintiff claims that sufficient notice was given the defendant verbally if not in writing, and that verbal notice is just as valid as notice in writing.

But "notice" within the meaning of the statute in question means written notice although the word "written" is not used in the statute. This result follows from the purposes for which the notice is required, and its official character, and accords with the uniform though tacit construction of the statute since the requirement of notice. Acts of 1892, No. 55; P. S. 3668; South Burlington v. Cambridge, 77 Vt. 289, 293, 59 Atl. 1013; Essex v. Jericho, 76 Vt. 104, 56 Atl. 493; Mt. Holly v. Peru, 72 Vt. 68, 47 Atl. 103; Randolph v. Roxbury, 70 Vt. 175, 40 Atl. 49; Barnet v. Plainfield, 82 Vt. 263, 73 Atl. 579.

There was evidence tending to show that upon receiving the notice the overseer of Craftsbury went to Waitsfield, visited the Doying family, ascertained their financial condition and conferred with the overseer of Waitsfield in respect to such condition. But his doings in that respect did not prevent the town of Craftsbury from defending on the ground of the insufficiency of the notice. His conduct amounted at most to an excess of precaution, and did not subject Craftsbury to any liability since Waitsfield lost no right thereby. Danville v. Hartford, 73 Vt. 300, 50 Atl. 1092.

There was also evidence tending to show that several months after the notice was given the overseer of Craftsbury in refusing to pay the bills presented by Waitsfield put his refusal upon the ground that he did not consider that Doying was a pauper and not upon the ground of the insufficiency of the notice which he said he considered all right. But the statute makes the giving of the required notice a prerequisite to the bringing of an action and the overseer of the poor of the town has not authority to waive any of the town's defences to an action.

[410] The function of relieving the poor is properly governmental in its character and the overseer of the poor is not a general agent of the town but is rather a public officer. Holloway v. Barton, 53 Vt. 300.

So the ordinary principles of agency and waiver by agents do not apply. An overseer of the poor cannot by his conduct relieve one town from liability and charge it upon another. Liability must rest where the statute places it. Chelsea v. Washington, 48 Vt. 610, 614.

The defendant claims as matter of law that Doying was not a poor person in need of assistance within the meaning of the law since as the evidence showed he had a horse and a cow. But this fact was not conclusive of the question. Ripton v. Brandon, 80 Vt. 234, 67 Atl. 541.

The language of this Court in Londonderry v. Acton, 3 Vt. 122; Randolph v. Braintree, 10 Vt. 442; Ludlow v. Weathersfield, 18 Vt. 39, which today seems harsh was in fact humane, for as the law then was a person who could be deemed a pauper was liable to be warned out of the town in which he had long lived and with his family and effects be forcibly removed therefrom perhaps to a town in which he had never lived. Within the meaning of such a law the court held that a man was not a pauper, whatever the circumstances requiring his immediate relief were, if he had any property by the sacrifice of which relief could be obtained. A comprehensive review of cases upon this subject including our own cases above cited is found in a note to the Wisconsin case of Coffeen v. Preble, 142 Wis. 183, 125 N. W. 954, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1079, as reported in 20 Ann. Cas. 753.

In view of all the evidence which is referred to the court below was warranted in saying as it did that the plaintiff's evidence tended to show that Doying was a poor person and in need of assistance, for the evidence tended to show that Mr. Doying was a feeble man who got his living by the work he could do with his horse and that the milk of the cow was necessary to the sustenance of the children.

The verdict for the defendant town was, however, properly directed upon the ground of the insufficiency of the notice to it given by the town furnishing the assistance.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE.

Who Is Pauper or Poor Person within Poor Laws.

It is the purpose of this note to review the recent cases discussing who is a pauper or poor person within poor laws. The earlier cases on this point are collected in the note to Coffeen v. Preble, 20 Ann. Cas. 753.

"The term 'pauper' has a distinct and well-defined meaning in our law. It is used to designate those persons whose support imposes a burden upon the public treasury. One may be ever so destitute of estate or ability to earn a livelihood, and yet not be a pauper. He may be cared for by the voluntary action of friends or relatives. The duty to care for him may by law be cast upon relatives. He becomes a member of the pauper class only when, other means of support failing, he becomes a public charge." Weeks v. Mansfield, 84 Conn. 544, 80 Atl. 784. "The statute says (Poor Law, § 2): 'A "poor person" is one unable to maintain himself.' It is common knowledge who the ordinary 'poor persons' are. They are those without property, without habits of industry or thrift, improvident, usually physically or mentally deficient, who are unable through efforts of their own to gain a livelihood. They are constantly seeking, and generally receive at somewhat regular intervals, public charity or assistance; they have a practically constant status as 'poor persons'; they are not able to maintain themselves for any long period of time under even ordinary conditions." Tompkins County v. Ontario County, 92 Misc. 272, 156 N. Y. S. 335.

In Beaver Tp. v. Centre Tp. 23 Pa. Dist. 123, it was held that a man sixty-three years old, weak-minded, unable to work and earn a livelihood, and destitute, was a pauper.

In Amazeen v. Newcastle, 76 N. H. 250, 81 Atl. 1079, it was said that an application to a town to take the applicant's property and furnish him with support "was practically an application for aid as a poor person."

In Clark v. Walten, 137 Ga. 277, 73 S. E. 392, it was said: "One having a parent or child able to support him is not under our law . . . a 'pauper.'"

A person smitten by sudden illness or calamity and without property is a pauper. Tompkins County v. Ontario County, 156 N. Y. S. 338, wherein it was said: "It is common knowledge who the ordinary 'poor persons' are. They are those without property, without habits of industry or thrift, improvident, usually physically or mentally deficient, who are unable through efforts of their own to gain a livelihood. There are yet others who from illness or misfortune, or from some unusual condition, are unable temporarily to maintain themselves. To this latter class the man Coakley apparently belonged. Under ordinary circumstances he was industrious, and, while not accumulating property, had been able to maintain himself all his lifetime until overtaken by illness in April, 1914. Without a home, and without friends who would have given him the care that a person would ordinarily receive under such circumstances, and being among strangers, he was of necessity assisted by the public authorities. In two weeks' time he was apparently again supporting himself by his own industry, and continued to do so for several months. During this time he received no aid from the poor authorities. Was he from the middle of April until the early part of November a 'poor person' within the definition of the statute? When he left Ontario county with money for Auburn, and went from there, still with money, to Groton, was he a 'poor person' straying from one county into another? I think not. It seems to me that with poor persons of this class the 'taint' does not cling to them after the acquirement of property, accumulated either by industry, or by gift or devise. It seems to me that, when one who has received public aid under circumstances out of the ordinary becomes able by his own industry for a considerable period of time to maintain himself, he ceases to be a 'poor person.' There must be some cause besides the mere lapse of time which removes an able-bodied, industrious man from the class of 'poor person.' If Coakley desired to go to a new locality to seek employment in a shop during the winter, rather than remain working on a farm or with a hay press, he had the same right to change his residence as any other industrious, self-sustaining citizen. I conclude, therefore, that when Coakley came into the town of Groton in November, 1914, having then been employed and self-sustaining for several months and arriving there with a ticket paid for by himself, and with some money, and with prospects of employment where he had theretofore been employed, he was not a 'poor person,' and that he became so only when he was again overtaken by misfortune and became ill, and that then the same duty devolved upon Tompkins county to care for him in this emergency as had devolved upon the county of Ontario on the occasion of his previous misfortune in April. He was entitled under section 42 of the Poor Law to be supported by Tompkins county, where he then was; he not having a settlement in any city or town, and not being a 'poor person' straying from one county to another."

In Maine the statute expressly provides that "persons who become needy and are assisted with necessary food, medicine, etc. while in quarantine on account of a contagious disease, shall not be considered a pauper." Lesieur v. Rumford, 113 Me. 317, 93 Atl. 838.

In Clark v. Walton, 137 Ga. 277, 73 S. E. 392, it was held that an "indigent pensioner" was not a pauper within a constitutional provision authorizing the General Assembly to delegate to the county authorities the right to levy a tax "to support paupers." The court said: "The mere fact of a Confederate soldier being rightfully on the roll of indigent pensioners would not of itself place him among the county poor entitled to support as a pauper. This is more clearly shown by a consideration of the provisions of another section of the Code relating to paupers who are chargeable to the county, under the provisions of which parent and children are bound to support each other; and if a person had a parent or a child who was able to support him, he was not chargeable to the county. . . . But it could not be contended that a Confederate soldier who, from age and poverty, or infirmity and poverty, or blindness and poverty, is unable to provide a living for himself would not be entitled to a place on the roll of indigent pensioners, although he had a parent or child able and willing to support him."

It seems that a presumption arises in favor of the decision of poor officers as to the necessity for extending aid to a person in need. Bishop v. Hermon, 111 Me. 58, 88 Atl. 86; See also Case v. Davis County, 160 Ia. 552, 129 N. W. 804; Matter of Chamberlain, 73 Misc. 256, 132 N. Y. S. 681. In the case last cited, the court in discussing the presumption attending the action of an overseer of the poor in rendering assistance said: "In giving relief to the above poor persons, the overseer of the poor of the town of Springfield evidently used his judgment and discretion. This being so, and he having rendered assistance, a presumption arises that such overseer investigated the circumstances of these poor persons and determined that they were entitled to relief as poor persons. If they were not such poor persons as defined by statute, this would make them so. . . . The question of the propriety of giving relief is confined to the discretion of the poor authorities; and, if they grant the relief asked, it is presumed that they have made such investigation as they deemed necessary and have determined the right of the party examined to such relief. While it is possible this presumption may have been overcome by evidence introduced in behalf of the town of Roseboom, no such evidence appears in the facts as submitted; and this presumption must, therefore, stand in favor of the town of Springfield."

PEOPLE EX REL. AGNEW

v.

GRAHAM ET AL.

Illinois Supreme Court—April 22, 1915.

267 Ill. 426; 108 N. E. 699.

Elections — Election Districts in Municipality.

Cities and Villages Act, art. 4, § 3 (Hurd's Rev. St. 1913, c. 24, § 50), declares that all persons entitled to vote at any general election for state officers within any city or village, having resided therein 30 days, may vote at any election for city or village officers. Section 4 (section 51) authorizes the council to divide the city into wards and provides for the election of one alderman from each ward. Section 9 (section 56) requires the council to designate the place in which elections shall be held, while section 10 (section 57) provides that the manner of conducting elections and voting thereat shall be the same as in case of the election of county officers. Const. art. 7, § 1, declares that every person having resided within the state one year, in the county 90 days, and in the election district 30 days shall be entitled to vote, while General Election Law, § 65 (Hurd's Rev. St. 1913, c. 46), follows the wording of the Constitution. It is held that, as the words "precinct" and "district" are frequently used interchangeably, ward lines must be considered in forming election districts within a city, for otherwise it would be impossible to elect aldermen.

Election at Single Polling Place — Validity.

By ordinance it was provided that the ballot box for elections in a city divided into three wards should contain three compartments, one for each ward, and that the ballots of the voters of the several wards should be deposited in the proper compartment. The whole city was treated as one precinct, the only voting place being within the Third ward, but only across the street from the other two wards. It is held, that as the statutes and constitution, while contemplating the ward lines should be taken into consideration in fixing the boundaries of the election precincts, did not expressly provide that voters must cast their ballot in the ward or precinct in which they resided, they will be construed as directory instead of mandatory or essential, and hence the election is not void where it did not appear that any voters were prevented from exercising their rights.

Statutes — Directory or Mandatory.

In determining whether statutes are mandatory or directory the legislative intent governs.

Elections — Acts of De Facto Judges.

Where election judges were good de facto officers, the result is not invalidated because they were not all residents of the precinct where the ballots were cast.

Error to Appellate Court, Second District.

Quo warranto proceeding. Charles Agnew, relator, and Edward Graham, et al., respondents. Judgment for respondents in Circuit Court, La Salle County: DAVIS, Judge. Judgment affirmed by Appellate Court. Relator brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

L. B. Olmstead, Butters & Clark and George S. Wiley for plaintiff in error.

Faessler, Fulton & Roberts and Browne & Wiley for defendants in error.

[427] CARTER, J.—This proceeding was commenced in the circuit court of LaSalle county October 4, 1912, by the State's attorney filing with leave of court, in the name of the People, on the relation of Charles Agnew, an information against Edward Graham, F. E. Blakeslee and P. J. Cruise, requiring them to show by what warrant they respectively exercised the offices of mayor of Earlville and aldermen of said city and the offices of president and secretary and member of the board of local improvements of said city, which offices, the information alleged, they had and still usurped. Respondents set up, by plea, their title to their respective offices. A demurrer thereto having been overruled, plaintiff in error elected to abide thereby and judgment was entered in favor of respondents. A writ of error was sued out from the Appellate Court for the Second District, and that court affirmed the judgment. The case has been brought to this court by petition for certiorari.

From the petition and plea it appears that the city of Earlville was organized under the general City and Village act on February 5, 1887, and about two months thereafter, by ordinance, it was divided into three wards, the boundaries of which it is unnecessary to state here. The same day an ordinance was passed providing that the city council should appoint three judges of election, one from each of the three wards, and one or more clerks, who should conduct all the city elections until their successors were selected; that the elections in said city should be held at a place therein to be designated by the city council in a notice published by the city clerk twenty days before the election; [428] that a ballot-box should be prepared with three apartments, lettered "First Ward,"

"Second Ward" and Third Ward," respectively, and that the ballot of each voter should be deposited in the apartment designated for the ward in which he resided, otherwise such ballot should not be counted for alderman. It further appears that the said last mentioned ordinance remained in full force from 1887 to the time of the hearing of this cause and had never been repealed or amended, and that said city of Earlville had conducted and held all elections from and after its organization in conformity with said ordinance. From the plea it further appears that in the spring of 1911 a primary, and thereafter an election, were duly called, due notice thereof given and the same duly held, and that the respondents became candidates for the respective offices and all necessary steps were taken to place their names on the primary ballot and on the official ballot in the election; and they were fully qualified in every respect to be candidates and to hold the said offices, and that they were each duly nominated and elected, Graham for mayor and Cruise and Blakelee for aldermen of the first and second wards, respectively, and that the election was held according to law and the returns canvassed and declared, and they duly qualified and entered upon said offices, and thereby, under the law, became members of the board of local improvements and were at the time of filing said plea occupying said offices; that said primary and said election of 1911 were held at the city hall in the city of Earlville, which was the place designated by the city council and had been the place of holding elections in said city for twenty years last past; that the ballot-box contained three compartments, and that all those voting at the election were legally qualified voters in the ward designated on the compartment in which their ballots were deposited and that each judge of election possessed the qualifications required by law. The plea further alleged "that there was a large vote cast at said election and a fair expression [429] of the will of the voters of said city; that no one entitled to vote was deprived of his right to do so by reason of the polling place being situated as aforesaid, and that the said election was conducted in all respects in the same manner as has been the custom and practice in said city for more than twenty years and as provided for by the general ordinances of said city; that said city hall is centrally and conveniently located for holding such elections," etc. It further appears from the plea that the city hall was located not more than sixty feet distant from the boundary lines of both the first and second wards of said city, being located in the southeast corner of the third ward, directly north of Winthrop street, the northern boundary of the first ward, and directly west of Ottawa street, the western boundary of the second ward.

The first question necessary to be considered is whether the ward lines must be taken into consideration in fixing the boundaries of the precinct or voting district. The words "precinct" and "district" are frequently used interchangeably and with the same meaning in the various statutes of this State. (People v. Markiewicz, 225 Ill. 563, 80 N. E. 256.) Section 3 of article 4 of the Cities and Villages act provides that "all persons entitled to vote at any general election for State officers within any city or village, having resided therein thirty days next preceding thereto, may vote at any election for city or village officers." (Hurd's Stat. 1913, p. 268.) If this were the only provision of the law affecting residence and election districts there would be no question, as contended by counsel for defendants in error, that a city, even though divided into wards, could be considered as one election district. Section 4, however, of said article 4 of the Cities and Villages act, provides, among other things, that the city council may divide the city into wards, and that one alderman shall annually be elected from each ward. Section 9 provides that the city council shall designate the place or places in which the [430] election should be held and appoint the judges and clerks, and cause notices to be printed and posted as to the time and place of election twenty days before such election. Section 10 provides that the manner of conducting elections and voting at elections held under this act and contesting the same shall be "the same, as nearly as may be, as in the case of the election of county officers, under the general laws of this State." Section 1 of article 7 of the constitution of 1870 provides that "every person having resided in this State one year, in the county ninety days, and in the election district thirty days next preceding any election therein, . . . shall be entitled to vote at such election." Section 65 of the general Election law follows this wording of the constitution as to the residence of the voter in State, county and election district. (Hurd's State. 1913, p. 1055.)

This court had under consideration a somewhat similar question in Welsh v. Shumway, 232 Ill. 54, 83 N. E. 549, and held that for city elections the city council, and not the county board, should establish the boundaries of the election precincts or districts, as well as name the polling places and the judges and clerks of election, but that in such cities, for city elections, (p. 67), "the ward lines must necessarily be considered in forming election districts." As a practical matter in carrying on and conducting a city election where the city is divided into wards, we do not see how it can be reasonably argued that the ward lines can be ignored in forming and fixing the boundaries of election districts or precincts, otherwise it would be impossible to elect the aldermen. That this must be so is conceded by counsel for defendants in error, but they argued that under the holding of this court in People v. Markiewicz, supra, the city may be considered one election precinct with a separate polling place in each ward, it being held in the case just referred to that for the purpose of town elections the entire town was considered as one voting precinct as respecting the qualifications of the [431] voters although there might be several polling places in the town. The wording of the statutes as to the conduct of town elections is, as will be seen from the two cases already cited, very different from the wording of the statutes on city elections. The reasoning of the case last referred to as to the conduct of township elections does not apply to the fixing of boundaries of election districts for city elections and the manner of conducting such elections. We see no reason to change the holding in Welsh v. Shumway, supra, that under the law in this State the ward lines must not be crossed in forming the boundary lines of an election district though such ward may be divided into several election districts or precincts, in which case the voter must have resided in the precinct thirty days before the election, in conformity with the constitution and as required by said section 65 of the general Election law.

The principal contention in the briefs is whether the voters of the first and second wards could legally cast their ballots outside of the boundaries of the respective wards in which they resided. This precise question has never been considered or decided in this State although general statements have been made in various decisions which have more or less bearing thereon. In several other jurisdictions the question has been decided, but those decisions cannot be controlling here, except in so far as the reasoning in those cases is in accord with the general principles of our constitution and statutes as construed by this court. A brief review of these principles as set out in some of the numerous decisions in this State bearing on election matters will assist in reaching a correct conclusion on the question now before us.

In People v. Kilduff, 15 Ill. 493, 60 Am. Dec. 769, the court held that the legality of an election did not depend upon the declaration of the board of elections, as required by law; that the authority, rights and powers of elected officers were derived from the election and not from the returns.

[432] In Platt v. People, 29 Ill. 54, where the law required that the polls should be closed at five o'clock and they were kept open after that hour, it was held that the election would not be declared void on that ground unless it was made to appear that votes were cast after that hour which would change the result; that a mere irregularity in conducting an election which deprived no legal voter of his rights and did not change the result "never has been held to invalidate an election."

In People v. Hilliard, 29 Ill. 413, it appeared that the judges of election were not properly sworn. The canvassing board on that account refused to canvass the returns. This court held that it was the plain duty of the board to do so, and said (p. 425): "The question in all such cases should be, whom did a majority of the qualified voters elect? . . . A literal compliance with prescribed forms is not required in any case if the spirit of the law is not violated."

In People v. Logan County, 63 Ill. 374, it was held that the carelessness or fraud of the judges in not using the registry list as required by law could not be held to deprive the electors of the privileges reserved to them by the constitution and did not invalidate the election.

In Du Page County v. People, 65 Ill. 360, where the law stated positively that an adjournment or recess should not be taken at the noon hour by the judges and clerks of election, the court held that where such an adjournment was taken and no fraud or injury was shown on that account it was no ground for rejecting the entire poll of the township.

In People v. Waite, 70 Ill. 25, an election for school trustees was held at a place not designated in the notices. The relator, who sought to avoid the election for that reason, had participated therein by voting and running as a candidate, and it was held that sound public policy forbade him from having the election of his opponent declared void on that ground.

[433] In Oleland v. Porter, 74 Ill. 76, 24 Am. Rep. 273, the court held that if an election had in other respects been fairly and properly conducted it would not be declared invalid because the judges closed the polls an hour before the time prescribed by law, when it did not appear that any voter offered to vote after the polls were closed or was thereby prevented from voting.

In Dale v. Irwin, 78 Ill. 170, at an election held in Alton it was ordered that one of the polling places should be at Fuch's store. On the date of the election the proprietor of that store forbade the judges and clerks to use it. They therefore repaired to a barber shop on the same side of the street and not more than fifty or one hundred feet away, where the polls were opened, and the election proceeded at this latter place without hindrance, all the voters knowing where the polls were open, as the place was readily seen from Fuch's store. This change by the judges was held not to invalidate the election.

In Chicago v. People, 80 Ill. 496, where, after notice of election was given stating the places of holding an election to incorporate under the Cities and Villages act, a change was made necessary in several of the wards because the rooms in question could not be procured, and a resolution thereafter was passed by the council changing the places and publishing notice of such changes and the location of the new places before the election, it was held that such changes would not invalidate the election, the court saying (p. 505): "The place of holding an election would seem to be one of the least important of the things pertaining to the notice, especially when the place is not to be fixed by the notice but is fixed by public authority, as in this case, by the legislative body of the city. . . . It would not seem to subserve any important end that the voter should have previous notice, for any length of time, of the place of holding the election." This was held not to invalidate the election, even though notice of the time [434] and place of election was required by law to be given thirty days before and the change was within the thirty days.

In Hodge v. Linn, 100 Ill. 397, it was held that the failure to number the ballots cast at the election, as the law then required, and to count the votes in the manner required by statute and to string the ballots on thread or wire in the order of their reading, did not invalidate the election, where nothing appeared to show an injurious effect or that the votes were not truly counted.

In Simons v. People, 119 Ill. 617, 9 N. E. 220, a certain town was divided into two voting districts by the county board, as required by law for general elections, with a voting place in each. The trustees of schools fixed only one polling place in such town for a school election. In the election notice one polling place was described as at Kuhn's Hall, while the proper authorities had established a polling place at Kuhn's real estate office on election day and the last named place was used. The buildings were not more than two hundred feet apart, in plain sight, with an open space between them. The evidence showed that no one was prevented from voting by not knowing where the voting place was or on account of the place at which the votes were taken, and the election was held legal.

In Behrensmeyer v. Kreitz, 135 Ill. 591, 26 N. E. 704, the election officers, after the close of the polls in a certain precinct, took the ballots to a room up-stairs instead of counting them, as the statute required, where the election was held. This change, as the evidence disclosed, was not from any wrongful intent and did not deprive any legal voter of his right to vote or change the result of the election.

In Ackerman v. Haenck, 147 Ill. 514, 35 N. E. 381, the judges failed to make the proclamation thirty minutes before the polls closed and after the ballots were counted they were not delivered to the township treasurer, as the law required, and there were other irregularities of a similar character. The record did not show that the election officials were [435] actuated by improper motives or that the failure to follow the law changed the result, and the election was held legal.

In People v. Brown, 189 Ill. 619, 60 N. E. 46, the court decided that an election for school trustees held at the time of the regular election for town officers at the town meeting was not void because it did not appear that the place where the election was held had been designated, as the statute required, by the electors at their annual meeting. For at least fifteen years prior to 1895 the annual town meetings and elections were held in that township at a truck-house in the village of Roseville and seem to have been properly called under the statute. The truck-house became unfit for further use and the election of 1896 was held in the opera house, located on the same lot, in plain sight and within one hundred feet of the truck-house. No action was taken by the proper authorities as to changing from the truck-house to the opera house, but the elections had been held at the latter place for several years before the question was raised as to the legality.

In Choiseur v. York, 211 Ill. 56, 71 N. E. 540, the testimony showed that on the morning of the election none of the regularly appointed judges appeared and other persons took their places without having been properly selected; that the polling place was established in a room in the court house not opening, as the law required, upon a public thoroughfare; that no register of voters was used, and that some thirty or thirty-five persons prepared ballots outside of the booths, which were counted by the judges. The court held that the election in this precinct was not invalid because the judges were not properly selected or because the polling place was not located upon a public thoroughfare, but held that under the Australian Ballot law the ballots must be marked by the voters in the booths, as required by the provisions of that act.

In People v. Green, 265 Ill. 39, Ann. Cas. 1916A 707, 106 N. E. 54, in an election on the proposition to levy a tax for hard roads, it was contended [436] that the returns had not been canvassed by the proper officials.

The court held that the fact that the returns had, under a misapprehension of the law, been canvassed by officials not designated by law as the canvassing board was not fatal to the tax, as the record showed that the majority of the people voting at the hard roads election were in favor of levying such tax.

These cases serve to illustrate, as well as any decided by this court, the rulings that bear upon the question we are here passing upon. In none of them has the question now before us been squarely before the court, and those cases, therefore, cannot be controlling here. The courts, in discussing questions similar to this, have frequently considered the question as to whether statutes regulating elections were mandatory or directory. A mandatory provision in a statute is one the omission to follow which renders the proceeding to which it relates illegal and void, while a directory provision is one the observance of which is not necessary to the validity of the proceeding. Directory provisions are not intended by the legislature to be disregarded, but where the consequences of not obeying them in every particular are not prescribed the courts must judicially determine them. In doing so they must necessarily consider the importance of the punctilious observance of the provision in question to the object the legislature had in view. If it be essential it is mandatory. (2 Lewis' Sutherland on Stat. Const.—2d ed.—sec. 610.) No universal rule can be given to distinguish between directory and mandatory provisions. The controlling question in this as in all other rules of construction is, what was the intention of the legislature? Whether a statute is mandatory or directory does not depend upon its form but upon the legislative intention, to be ascertained from a consideration of the entire act, its nature, its object and the consequences which would result from construing it one way or the other. (36 Cyc. 1157, and cases cited.) In general, [437] statutes directing the mode of proceeding by public officers are deemed advisory, and strict compliance with their detailed provisions is not considered indispensable to the validity of acts done under them. (Endlich on Interpretation of Statutes, sec. 437.) The terms "mandatory" and "directory" may be convenient to distinguish one class of irregularities in election matters from the other. "But, strictly speaking, all provisions of such laws are mandatory in the sense that they impose the duty of obedience on those who come within its purview, but it does not therefore follow that every slight departure therefrom should taint the whole proceedings with a fatal blemish. Courts justly consider the chief purpose of such laws, namely, the obtaining of a fair election and an honest return, as paramount in importance to the minor requirements which prescribed the formal steps to reach that end." (Bowers v. Smith, 111 Mo. 45, 20 S. W. 101, 33 Am. St. Rep. 491, 16 L.R.A. 754, 2 Lewis' Sutherland on Stat. Const.—2d ed.—sec. 709.) The Supreme Court of one of our sister States has held that "all provisions of the Election law are mandatory if enforcement is sought before election in a direct proceeding for that purpose, but after election all should be held directly, only, in support of the result, unless of a character to affect an obstruction to the free and intelligent casting of the votes or to the ascertainment of the result, or unless the provisions affect an essential element of the election, or less it is expressly declared by the statute that the particular act is essential to the validity of an election or that its omission shall render it void." Jones v. State, 153 Ind. 440, 55 N. E. 229; Norman v. State, 51 Ind. App. 425, 99 N. E. 812.

This court has stated in some of the decisions already cited, and in other cases, that "where a statute imposes duties upon officials connected with the holding of an election and by express language provides that the omission to perform the same shall render the election void, then all courts are bound to enforce such statute and pronounce the [438] election void, regardless of all considerations touching its policy or impolicy; 'but if, as in most cases, the statute simply provides that certain acts or things shall be done within a particular time or in a particular manner and does not declare that their performance is essential to the validity of the election, then they will be regarded as mandatory if they do, and directory if they do not, affect the actual merits of the election.'" (People v. Crossley, 261 Ill. 78, 103 N. E. 537; Parker v. Orr, 158 Ill. 609, 41 N. E. 1002, 30 L.R.A. 227; Blankinship v. Israel, 132 Ill. 514, 24 N. E. 615.) We have also said that where a statute does not declare the performance of certain duties by public officials in connection with the election to be essential to the validity of the election, it will be regarded as mandatory if such matters affect the real merits, but will be considered directory, only, and not vital to the election, unless they are such, in themselves, as to change or render doubtful the result. People v. Green, supra.

"Election statutes are to be tested like other statutes, but with a leaning to liberality in view of the great public purposes which they accomplish; and except where they specifically provide that a thing shall be done in the manner indicated, and not otherwise, their provisions designed merely for the information and guidance of the officers must be regarded as directory, only, and the election will not be defeated by a failure to comply with them, providing the irregularity has not hindered any who were entitled from exercising the right of suffrage or rendered doubtful the evidence from which the result was to be declared." Cooley's Const. Lim. (7th ed.) sec. 928.

Neither the statute nor the constitution provides, in terms, that the votes shall be cast within the election district or precinct. The general rule is, that it is essential to the validity of an election that it be held at the time and in the place provided by law. (McCrory on Elections,—4th ed.—sec. 153; 1 Dillon on Mun. Corp.—5th ed.—sec. 370; Mechem on Public Officers, sec. 181; Cooley's Const. [439] Lim.—7th ed.—sec. 930; 2 McQuillin on Mun. Corp.—sec. 414; 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 684; 15 Cyc. 343.) And this court, in discussing certain provisions as to the validity of the election, has laid down this same general rule. (Stephens v. People, 80 Ill. 337; Snowball v. People, 147 Ill. 260, 35 N. E. 538.) It is plain, however, from the decisions of this court heretofore cited, that it does not follow that the polls must be opened and the election conducted in the very building designated in the order and notice of election. A slight change in the voting place will not render an election void where it appears that no legal voter was prevented from voting and that the change was not made from any improper motive. Many of the cases, however, that discuss the question of a change in polling place had under consideration a change within the boundaries of the election precinct as fixed and not outside of those boundaries. Some of the decisions relied on most strongly by counsel for plaintiff in error are of this nature, among others Melvin's case, 68 Pa. St. 333. The polling place in that case was moved by the judges on the day of election three miles, but still in the same voting district, from the place where it had been established by the proper authority. Knowles v. Yates, 31 Cal. 82, is another case of the same character, where the polling place was moved about three miles on election day and located at another place in the same voting precinct. In both of these cases the election, on that account, was held invalid.

The question of the polling place being located outside of the boundaries of the voting district was most seriously considered by various courts when, during the progress of our civil war, statutes were enacted permitting persons absent from their States, engaged in the military service of the United States, to vote. The constitutionality of these statutes generally turned on whether it was competent for the State legislature to authorize a citizen to vote elsewhere than at the place of his residence. (McCrory on [440] Elections,—4th ed.—sec. 153.) In the case of Baldwin v. Trowbridge, 2 Bartlett's Cont. Elec. Cas. 46, the United States house of representatives held the statute constitutional so far as it related to the election of members of Congress. The Supreme Court of California, in Bourland v. Hildreth, 26 Cal. 161, held that a statute of that State enabling voters in the military service of the United States to vote outside of their legal residences was unconstitutional. The same holding was made in Chase v. Miller, 41 Pa. St. 403. In recent years the legality of votes where the polling place has been located at a place convenient for the voters, by the proper officers, only a short distance outside of the election district, has been passed upon by the courts in several of the States. The courts of last resort in the majority of these cases have held that where it was shown that no legal voter was thereby deprived of his vote and the location was not selected from any improper motive, no fraud or other harm being shown or charged, such location of a polling place would not avoid the election. (Lane v. Otis, 68 N. J. L. 656, 54 Atl. 442; People v. Carson, 155 N. Y. 491, 60 N. E. 292; Paard v. State, 34 Neb. 372, 51 N. W. 828; Murchie v. Clifford, 76 N. H. 99, 79 Atl. 901; Ex p. White, 33 Tex. Crim. 594, 28 S. W. 542; Davis v. State, 75 Tex. 420, 12 S. W. 957; Ex p. Stein, 61 Tex. Crim. 320, 135 S. W. 136; Wakefield v. Patterson, 25 Kan. 709; Steele v. Calhoun, 61 Miss. 556. See, also, where the same rule is adhered to, Delano v. Morgan, 2 Bartlett's Cont. Elec. Cas. 168; 15 Cyc. 344.) With perhaps one or two exceptions in the cases cited by counsel for plaintiff in error as holding the contrary to the decisions just cited, the precise point here involved was not decided. In State v. Fitzgerald, 37 Minn. 26, 32 N. W. 788, the court decided an act of the legislature assuming to establish a second election district in an organized town unconstitutional, and that a town election held at what would then be the proper place in the town if the law were unconstitutional was valid. In People v. Holihan, 29 Mich. 116, [441] the public authorities attempted to change the boundaries of the voting districts, and the court held the action of the authorities in this regard illegal, and that the voters in the territory so changed should have voted at their old voting precinct and not at the new one in the changed district. This was in accord with the holding of this court, under similar circumstances, in Rexroth v. Schein, 206 Ill. 80, 69 N. E. 240. The point of this holding in this and other jurisdictions where the same conclusion has been reached is, that where there is a polling place in each of two adjoining districts and where the boundary line has been attempted to be changed without legal authority, the voters in the disputed strip cannot vote at the polling place of the district in which the public officials have attempted, without authority, to place them.

The requirement that the party offering to vote shall reside within the district which is to be affected by the exercised of his right has been adopted in most, if not all, jurisdictions to enable persons residing in the neighborhood where the voter resides to become acquainted with him and know that he is a bona fide resident not only of the State and county but of the district where he attempts to vote. By requiring him to vote among his neighbors who know whether he is legally entitled to vote, the opportunities for illegal or fraudulent voting will not be as great as if the voting were all to take place at a distance and among strangers. (Cooley's Const. Lim.—7th ed.—sec. 903.) Questions affecting the fairness of elections are of vital importance in this country. Popular self-government depends upon their proper solution. The late Justice Brewer, in discussing these questions in an opinion, said: "The problem is to secure, first, to the voter a free, untrammelled vote; and secondly, a correct record and return of the vote. It is mainly with reference to these two results that the rules for conducting elections are prescribed by the legislative power. But these rules are only means. The end is [442] the freedom and purity of the election. To hold these rules all mandatory and essential to a valid election is to subordinate substance to form,—the end to the means. Yet, on the other hand, to permit a total neglect of all the requirements of the statute and still sustain the proceedings is to forego the lessons of experience and invite a disregard of all those provisions which the wisdom of years has found conducive to the purity of the ballot-box. Ignorance, inadvertence, mistake, or even intentional wrong, on the part of local officials should not be permitted to disfranchise a district. Yet rules,—uniformity of procedure,—are as essential to secure truth and exactness in elections as in anything else. Irregularities invite and conceal fraud." (Gilleland v. Schuyler, 9 Kan. 569.) The fact that all the voters of a ward, by ordinance, vote at a polling place just across the street from the ward in which they live is not such an irregularity as would, merely by reason of such location, give increased opportunity for fraud in the election. Under our constitution the legislature has the authority to regulate the formation of voting districts or precincts. This is frequently, if not generally, delegated in this and other States to the local officials. These authorities draw boundary lines between the voting districts, and can change them, within certain limitations, if they desire. All that the constitution of 1870 in terms requires as to the place of voting is that the elector must vote at the polling place designated by law as the place for casting the vote of the district in which he resides. Of course, it is essential, to properly safeguard an election, that it be held at the time and place duly established as provided by law, but so far as we are advised there has been in all jurisdictions one exception to this general rule: that is, where the voting was done at the same place for years, the people supposing it to be the true place, though, in fact, it was different from the place that was provided by law or should have been fixed in accordance with law. (10 Am. & Eng. Enc. [443] of Law (2d ed.) 685, and cases cited; Ex p. White, supra; Delano v. Morgan, supra.) This, in effect, is the holding of this court in People v. Brown, supra, and although in that case the polling place was within the boundary lines of the voting district, upon principle we cannot see how the holding of the election within or without the boundaries of the voting precinct under such circumstances, and long acquiesced in by the voters, would make any difference in the legality of the votes cast at such polling place. In an unbroken line of decisions this court has held that while the legal safeguards which are thrown about the ballot must be faithfully observed by those who have been entrusted with their enforcement, yet under the pretense of enforcing them the will of the people should not be defeated by an honest mistake of election officials; that the literal compliance with prescribed forms will not be required if the spirit of the law is not violated; that forms should be subservient to substance when no legal voter has been deprived of his vote and no harm or injury of any kind has been done to anyone. People v. Hilliard, supra; Dale v. Irwin, supra; People v. Ruyle, 91 Ill. 525; People v. Nordheim, 99 Ill. 553; Hodge v. Linn, supra; Ackerman v. Haenck, supra; Parker v. Orr, supra; Schuler v. Hogan, 168 Ill. 369, 48 N. E. 135; People v. Crossley, supra; Choisser v. York, supra; People v. Green, supra.

The fixing by a public order of the polling place at a convenient point and giving public notice that such place has been located is for the purpose of giving proper information, in due time, to each voter in the district as to the place where the election will be held. All of this was accomplished by the location of the polling place here in question, as notice was duly given and everyone knew where the polling place was located. To hold that this election was invalid on account of the location of the polling place could be justified only on the ground either that the law was mandatory in requiring that the polling place be [444] located within the boundaries of the voting district, or that to hold the election valid would be laying down a rule of law that would tend strongly to overthrow the safe conduct of elections. As heretofore stated, neither our constitution nor statute in terms states that the polling place must be within the district. Both state only that each voting district or precinct must have a polling place and ballot-box for that district. Without doubt, the spirit of our Election law is that each polling place should be within the boundaries of the district for which it is chosen. Under the circumstances shown in this record, however, to hold that this election was invalid because the polling places for two wards were out of the respective wards would be to defeat the will of the voters of those wards, fairly and honestly expressed. Where no injury has been done to anyone by the mistake and where no benefit will redound to the public by holding otherwise, we cannot see how the safety and security of the ballot are in any way endangered by holding, under the restrictions and conditions laid down in this opinion, that this election, under the circumstances as here shown, is valid.

On principle and authority the trial and Appellate Courts rightly held that the election in question was not invalid because of the location of the polling place.

The question raised by counsel for plaintiff in error that the election was invalid because all three of the judges did not reside in the precinct which the ballots were cast is without merit. The authorities hold that these men were judges de facto and that the election was not void by reason of their acting as such. Choisser v. York, supra; Mechem on Public Officers, sec. 184.

The judgment of the Appellate Court will be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

Cooke, J., dissenting.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that a municipal election is not void because ward lines are ignored and the election is held at a single voting place for the entire municipality, provided no voters are thereby prevented from exercising their rights. This holding is in accord with the majority of the cases which have passed on the question, the decisions being reviewed in the note to Kerlin v. Devils Lake, Ann. Cas. 1915C 624.

HARDY

v.

WOODS ET AL.

South Dakota Supreme Court—March 21, 1914.

33 S. Dak. 416; 146 N. W. 563.

Amendments — Complaint — Change from Representative to Personal Capacity.

An amendment of the complaint, in an action to quiet title expressly brought as administrator alleging that the property belonged to the estate, by striking out the allegations showing that the suit was brought in a representative capacity and alleging that plaintiff claimed individually as surviving devisee, is not objectionable as setting up a new cause of action and changing the issues.

Change of Names of Parties.

A complaint may be amended so as to change the names of the parties if the amendment does not prejudice the parties and is in furtherance of justice.

Statute Permitting Amendment — Construction.

Code Civ. Proc. § 150, providing that "the court may" in furtherance of justice "amend any pleading . . . by adding or striking out the name of any party," authorizes the court to permit amendments by the parties, and does not merely authorize the judge himself to order amendments.

Names — Variance in Chain of Title.

In an action to quiet title, in which plaintiff claimed as devisee from one who acquired title by bidding in the property, at mortgage foreclosure sale under the name of "J. A. Hardy," evidence held to sustain a finding that such "J. A. Hardy" was the same person as "Jesse A. Hardy," through whom plaintiff claimed that his title was derived.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Edmunds county: BORRUM, Judge.

Action to quiet title. Charles W. Hardy, plaintiff, and George A. Woods et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Williamson & Williamson for appellants.
C. M. Stevens for respondent.

[418] POLLEY, J.—This action was commenced by Charles W. Hardy, as administrator, with the will annexed, of the estate of Jesse A. Hardy, deceased. The said Jesse A. Hardy died testate in the county of Hillsboro, state of New Hampshire, in the year 1898. At the time of his death, he was seised in fee of the quarter section of land that is the subject of this action. Plaintiff was appointed executor of the last will and testament of said [419] Jesse A. Hardy, in said Hillsboro county, N. H., and was also appointed administrator, with the will annexed of the said estate in Clark county, S. D. Defendant claimed title to the premises in controversy through a certain tax deed, tax judgment sale certificate, and judgments of the circuit court purporting to quiet the title in defendant's grantors prior to the commencement of this action. These evidences of title were all disposed of by this court on former appeal of this cause, and will receive no further notice. Hardy v. Woods, 28 S. D. 151, 132 N. W. 692.

On the trial, the defendant, for the purpose of defeating plaintiff's right to maintain this action, introduced in evidence certain records from the county court of Clark county, showing that the administration of the estate of the said Jesse A. Hardy had been wound up and that the said Charles W. Hardy had been finally discharged as administrator of said estate, in January, 1904. Upon the admission of this evidence, plaintiff's counsel announced that he was taken completely by surprise, that he had believed the matter of the estate of said Hardy was still pending in the county court of Clark county, and that plaintiff was still administrator and authorized to maintain this action. Counsel then asked to be given time to investigate the matter and requested the court to hold the case open to allow him time to make such investigation. This request was granted by the court, and, upon investigation, counsel found that the said administration had been finally wound up, decree of final distribution entered, and plaintiff discharged as such administrator. He further found that the plaintiff was the sole surviving legatee and devisee of the said Jesse A. Hardy, and was therefore seised in fee of the title to the land in controversy in his own right. Counsel thereupon applied to the court and was given leave to amend plaintiff's complaint so as to conform to the facts as they actually existed, and also to strike from the title of said cause the words "as administrator with the will annexed of the estate of Jesse A. Hardy, deceased." This was allowed, and, the amendment being made, plaintiff introduced in evidence the "decree of heirship" entered by the county clerk of Clark county in the said matter, which among other things, "declared that Charles W. Hardy is sole heir, devisee and legatee of the said [420] decedent and his last will and testament." The court thereupon found that plaintiff was the owner in fee and entitled to the possession of the disputed premises, and entered a decree accordingly. Motion for a new trial being denied, defendant appeals to this court.

It is first contended by appellant that the court erred, to his prejudice, in permitting this amendment and in receiving further evidence in support of the amended complaint; that he was given no opportunity to answer the same or to introduce further evidence or to be heard on the issues raised by the amended complaint. In short (that the court granted plaintiff a new trial and entered judgment for plaintiff as though by default, without giving defendant an opportunity to offer proof to controvert the allegations of the amended complaint. This contention finds no support whatever in the record. Plaintiff was originally given ten days in which to ascertain the real condition of the Hardy estate in Clark county. This time was extended by the court, but defendant was given notice of the time and place where the matter of filing the amended complaint and making further proof would be heard by the court, and he was present, by his counsel, and made his objections thereto, but did not ask leave to file an answer to the amended complaint nor offer further evidence; nor does he now suggest that he wishes to answer the said amended complaint or has further evidence to offer, nor show in what manner he was prejudiced by the rulings of the court.

But it is claimed that the change made in the complaint, under the guise of an amendment, amounted to a substitution of parties plaintiff and set up a new and different cause of action and changed the issues involved. This presents a question of more difficulty. Plaintiff brought the suit in his capacity as administrator, alleging the premises in dispute to belong to the estate of Jesse A. Hardy. By the amendment, he became the plaintiff in his individual capacity and claimed that he, individually, was the owner in fee of said premises. This, appellant strenuously contends, the court was without authority to permit, and, in support of this contention, cites the following authorities: Davis v. New York, 14 N. Y. 506, 67 Am. Dec. 186; Wood v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 96 Mich. 437, 56 N. W. [421] 8; Dubbers v. Goux, 51 Cal. 154; Wilson v. Kiesel, 9 Utah 397, 35 Pac. 491; More v. Burger, 15 N. D. 345, 107 N. W. 200. Some of these cases appear to support appellants' contention, yet none of them are parallel cases, and the overwhelming weight of authority, and, as we believe, the better reasoning, supports the opposite view. The act most loudly complained of by appellant was the permitting of plaintiff to change the character in which he was endeavoring to maintain the action; yet the rule seems to be well established that this may properly be done where it is warranted by the facts. "Where a party sues in his own right, he may, if the facts warrant it, amend his complaint so as to make the suit stand in his representative capacity; or conversely, if he sues in his representative capacity, he may be allowed to amend by declaring in his individual capacity." 1 Enc. Pl. Pr. 537, 538; 18 Cyc. 981; and 31 Cyc. 490, and cases cited. What was said in an early Iowa case is especially applicable to the facts in this case: "A party asking an amendment at so late a stage as in the present case would naturally expect to pay the whole expense caused by the issue; and what is the substantial difference between this and his taking a nonsuit and commencing again, except that by taking an amendment, rather than a nonsuit, time is spared, and an action or a cause of action is sometimes saved, which would otherwise be lost, as by a limitation, or by other cause; and this is the precise effect which we understand our present system of statute law, in relation to pleading, to aim at. It is to save the rights of persons, and not to have them sacrificed to the mere rules of pleading, if they can be placed in a correct attitude; the party himself bearing the expense of setting his case right. It is not intended to intimate that there may not be cases where the amendment could not be made on any terms, but these remarks apply to those cases which come within the reach of amendments. We think that an amendment showing the character in which the plaintiff sues, but not changing the plaintiff, is admissible." Hunt v. Collins, 4 Ia. 56.

The change made by the amendment is merely a change in the character in which plaintiff is trying to recover. He is the real party in interest and is the sole beneficiary, whether the title to the disputed premises is declared to be in plaintiff individually [422] or in the estate of the said Jesse A. Hardy. To have denied the amendment would have compelled plaintiff to commence another action, and thus require the prosecution of the two actions to accomplish what can as well be accomplished in one. With the statute of limitations running all the time, it might happen that the second action would be barred by the time the first one was determined, and thus deprive the plaintiff of a right to which he was clearly entitled at the commencement of the action. The following are some of the numerous authorities supporting the conclusions of the court: Bigelow v. Draper, 6 N. D. 152, 69 N. W. 570; Knight v. Boring, 38 Colo. 163, 87 Pac. 1078; Hume v. Kelly, 28 Ore. 398, 43 Pac. 380; Buffington v. Blackwell, 52 Ga. 129; American Bonding Co. v. Dickey, 74 Kan. 791, 88 Pac. 66; Kennedy v. Gelders, 7 Ga. App. 241, 66 S. E. 620; Goldstein v. Peter Fox Sons Co. 22 N. D. 636, 135 N. W. 180, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 566—where the cases on this subject are collected and reviewed at length by the court, and Wood v. Lenawee Circuit Judge, 84 Mich. 521, 47 N. W. 1103. In this latter case, the suit was commenced by the administrator, with the will annexed, of the estate of a certain woman, deceased, to recover on a certain certificate of insurance. After issue was joined, the heirs of the decedent's husband petitioned the court for an order, striking out the name of the said administrator and substituting their own in place thereof. The petition was denied by the circuit court, and the petitioners applied to the Supreme Court for a writ of mandamus to compel the circuit court to make the substitution. The writ was granted; the court saying: "This is a case where the right of action will be lost unless the amendment is permitted, and great injustice be done to the heirs." The proceeds of the certificate sued upon belonged to the heirs at law of the deceased husband. In both cases the said heirs were the real parties in interest. The only difference was in the mode of its transfer to them—"a mere technicality in the legal steps necessary to be taken to collect it."

The correct rule is that: "The right to amend as to names of parties exists where the amendment does not operate to the prejudice of the parties, and does operate in furtherance of justice." Goldstein v. Peter Fox Sons Co. supra.

[423] The amendment in this case was permitted by the court "in furtherance of justice," under the provisions of section 150, Code Civ. Proc. But it is claimed by appellant that this section does not authorize the court to permit amendments by the parties to an action—drawing a distinction between the language used in section 149 and that in section 150, and claiming that only the trial judge himself is authorized by section 150 to make amendments. In this he is clearly wrong, as it is not the intent of the law as expressed by the language used in this section (section 150) that the trial judge must himself recast the pleadings so as to make them conform to the facts or proof offered, but that he may permit the parties, or their counsel, in a proper case to do so.

Plaintiff's testator acquired his title to the disputed premises through the foreclosure of a certain mortgage thereon, which was assigned to him and bid in by him at foreclosure sale, under the name of J. A. Hardy; and it is contended by appellant that there is no evidence to identify the said J. A. Hardy as the Jesse A. Hardy through whom respondent claims to have derived his title, and that there is no evidence to show that the said Jesse A. Hardy is dead. An examination of the evidence on these two points shows that the testator was Jesse A. Hardy, of Hollis, county of Hillsboro in the state of New Hampshire, and that Jesse A. Hardy, of Hollis, N. H., died prior to January 10, 1898. The assignment of the mortgage in question was to J. A. Hardy; but this mortgage was executed to secure the payment of a certain "mortgage coupon bond," together with ten interest coupons thereto attached. When the mortgage was assigned, said bond was indorsed by the payee therein named, as follows: "For value received, the Dakota Loan & Security Company, of Clark, Dakota, has assigned the attached bond, No. 1252, to Jesse A. Hardy, of Hollis, state of New Hampshire." And each of the said interest coupons was indorsed: "Pay to the order of Jesse A. Hardy." The sheriff's deed, through which plaintiff claims that his testator acquired his title, describes the grantee therein as J. A. Hardy, of Hillsboro county, N. H. While this is not direct evidence of identification, it is sufficient to show, prima facie at least, that Jesse A. Hardy, of Hollis, county of Hillsboro, state of New Hampshire, and J. A. [424] Hardy, of Hillsboro, N. H., was one and the same party; and, this being true, there can be no question of his having died long prior to the commencement of this action.

We have examined the other questions presented by appellant, but are unable to find that he has been, in any wise, prejudiced by any of the matters complained of, and it is not necessary to take them up in detail. Upon the whole record, we are satisfied that the trial court was correct in his conclusions, and the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

And in Lucas v. Pittman, 94 Ala. 616, 10 So. 603, it was said: "It may be regarded as settled, that under the statute of amendments, when a complaint is filed in the name of one suing in his individual capacity, if the facts authorize it, the complaint may be amended, so as to make the suit stand in his representative capacity, and vice versa."

APPLICATION OF RULE

Individual to Representative Capacity.

Under the rule prevailing in the majority of jurisdictions, a plaintiff may amend his action so as to change the capacity in which he sues from that of an individual to that of an executor, administrator, or personal representative. Humphreys v. Humphreys, 3 P. Wms. (Eng.) 349; Missouri, etc. R. Co. v. Wulf, 226 U. S. 570, Ann. Cas. 1914B 134, 33 S. Ct. 135, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 355; Leahy v. Haworth, 141 Fed. 850, 73 C. C. Pittman*, 94 Ala. 616, 10 So. 603 (overruling Christian v. Morris, 50 Ala. 585; Taylor v.

Taylor, 43 Ala. 649; Phifer v. Abbott (Fla.) 67 So. 917; Hines v. Rutherford, 67 Ga. 606; Elliott v. Knight, 64 Ill. App. 87; Reed v. Cooper, 30 Kan. 574, 1 Pac. 822; Fuqua v. Fuqua, 16 S. W. 353, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 130; Gray v. Alderson (Ky.) 123 S. W. 317; Stearns v. Wright, 50 N. H. 293; Mann v. Marshall, 76 N. H. 162, 80 Atl. 336; Tucker v. Sherman, 29 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 368; Vaughan v. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. 177 Md. App. 155, 164 S. W. 144; Snaveley v. Prudential Ins. Co. 22 Pa. Dist. 557 (distinguishing Wildermuth v. Long, 196 Pa. St. 541, 46 Atl. 927, and approving Power v. Grogan, 232 Pa. St. 387, 81 Atl. 416); Glenn v. Gerald, 64 S. C. 236, 42 S. E. 155; Bradford v. Felder, 2 McCord Eq. (S. C.) 168; Smith v. Anderson, 39 Tex. 496; Pugmire v. Diamond Coal, etc. Co. 26 Utah 115, 72 Pac. 385. In Phifer v. Abbott (Fla.) 67 So. 917, the court said: "It clearly appears that Lucy B. Abbott, the complainant in the original bill, is the sole heir of the mortgagee; that she is the holder and owner of the evidence of indebtedness in question; that there is no indebtedness against her mother's estate; and that she has fully qualified to administer on the estate that belongs entirely to her. She is the same person who instituted the original suit, and the only change in her asserted capacity to sue is that she has qualified as the legal representative of an estate that is wholly her own. Such amendment as this does not make a new suit; and the form of the amended bill is such that it may, if necessary to justice in the cause, be treated as a supplemental bill. An amendment stating that a complainant sues technically in a representative capacity, and not individually, in the same cause of action, does not make a new suit or cause of action, particularly when the complainant is the sole party in interest, and the suit is brought for her sole benefit." And in Crimm v. Crawford, 29 Ala. 623, the court said: "The amendment of the complaint, by showing that the plaintiff claimed in his capacity of administrator, does not substitute a new cause of action. The cause of action is really the same. The amendment merely inserts that which is necessary to secure a recovery upon the existing cause of action, which was imperfectly set forth. In Hines v. Rutherford, 67 Me. 606, a suit brought by one as heir-at-law was held to be amendable so as to permit the plaintiff to proceed in his name as the executor of the will of the decedent. And in Missouri, etc. R. Co. v. Wulf, 226 U. S. 570, Ann. Cas. 1914B 134, 33 S. Ct. 135, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 355, wherein the plaintiff sued as the sole beneficiary under a state statute, it was held that an amendment showing that she sued as the personal representative under the Federal Employers' Liability Act (Act of April 22, 1908, ch. 149, 35 Stat. L. 65, Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 584), was not equivalent to the commencement of a new action, so as to subject it to the limitations prescribed by that act.

Under the rule supported in the majority of jurisdictions, a plaintiff may amend his action so as to change the capacity in which he sues from that of an individual to that of a trustee. Middlesex Banking Co. v. Smith, 83 Fed. 133, 52 U. S. App. 406, 27 C. C. A. 485; McCoy v. Watson, 51 Ala. 466; Boas v. Christ, 20 Pa. Co. Ct. 196. See also La Pierre v. Webb, 113 Ga. 820, 39 S. E. 344. Thus in a case where the plaintiffs sued in ejectment as individuals, they were permitted to amend so as to show that they sued in the capacity of trustees of a church. Boas v. Christ, 20 Pa. Co. Ct. 196. And in a case where the plaintiff began his action as an individual within the period of limitations, it was held that an amendment showing that the plaintiff sued in the capacity of a trustee, filed after the period of limitations had expired, did not constitute the institution of a new action so as to be barred by the statute of limitations. Middlesex Banking Co. v. Smith, 83 Fed. 133, 52 U. S. App. 406, 27 C. C. A. 485.

Under the rule obtaining in the majority of jurisdictions, it is proper to permit a plaintiff to amend his action so as to change the capacity in which he sues from that of an individual to that of an assignee for the benefit of creditors. Hunt v. Collins, 4 Ia. 56; Schneider-Davis Co. v. Brown (Tex.) 46 S. W. 108. In the case last cited the court said: "Appellants' first assignment complains that the court erred in overruling their exception directed at plaintiff's first amended original petition, to the effect that the original cause of action was abandoned, and a new cause of action set up, which was barred by the statutes of limitation. The court did not err in its ruling. The proposition is based upon the fact that the original pleading did not disclose that plaintiff held the goods as trustee for the benefit of creditors, while the amended plea fully set forth this fact as the basis of his right of possession. This was not a change in the cause of action. The capacity in which he sued was not changed by the amended pleading. The same proof was admissible under the two pleadings."

It has been held that a plaintiff may amend his action so as to change the capacity in which he sues from that of an individual to that of a guardian. Longmire v. Pilkington, 37 Ala. 296.

Representative to Individual Capacity.

Under the rule prevailing in the majority of jurisdictions, a plaintiff may amend his action so as to change the capacity in which he sues from that of an executor, administrator, or personal representative to that of an individual. Van Doren v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 93 Fed. 260, 35 C. C. A. 282; St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. Herr, 193 Fed. 950, 113 C. C. A. 578 (certiorari denied 225 U. S. 705, 32 S. Ct. 837, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 1265; Lucas v. Pittman, 94 Ala. 616, 10 So. 603 (overruling Christian v. Morris, 50 Ala. 585, Taylor v. Taylor, 43 Ala. 649); Atlanta, etc. R. Co. v. Smith, 1 Ga. App. 162, 58 S. E. 106; National Ben. Assoc. v. Jackson, 114 Ill. 533, 2 N. E. 414; Burlington Voluntary Relief, etc. v. More, 52 Neb. 719, 173 N. W. 15; Johnson v. Phoenix Bridge Co. 197 N. Y. 316, 90 N. E. 953 (distinguishing Doyle v. Carney, 190 N. Y. 386, 83 N. E. 37); Jamieson v. Capron, 95 Pa. St. 15; Walfenden v. Pennsylvania, Schuylkill Valley R. Co. 2 Pa. Co. Ct. 243; Whitehead v. Herron, 15 Tex. 127, 65 Am. Dec. 145. And see the reported case. See also Cockrill v. Clyma, 98 Cal. 123, 32 Pac. 888; Herlihy v. Little, 200 Mass. 284, 86 N. E. 294. In Burlington Voluntary Relief, etc. v. Moore, 52 Neb. 719, 173 N. W. 15, which was an action brought by the plaintiff as an administratrix and which was amended to show that the plaintiff sued as an individual, the court said: "The change was not a substitution of plaintiffs, it was merely a change in the description of the capacity in which the plaintiff claimed to be suing. Nor was the cause of action changed. The object of each petition was to recover upon the same contract of insurance. The change in this respect was merely in alleging to whom the insurance was payable, the original containing no allegation on the subject. We hold, therefore, that the amendment was such as our practice permits, and in such cases the allowance of amendments being largely in the discretion of the trial court, and no abuse of discretion appearing, that the assignment of error on this subject is not well taken." And see Van Doren v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 93 Fed. 260, 35 C. C. A. 282, wherein the court said: "If a person who is both widow and administratrix sues in the wrong capacity the action may be defeated and great hardship result unless an amendment be allowed permitting her to prosecute the action in the right capacity. There is abundant authority to the effect that under a general power to allow amendments necessary for the determination of the real question in controversy between the parties, an amendment touching the capacity in which the plaintiff sues or declares should, when properly applied for, be permitted where substantial justice requires."

It has been held that an action may be amended so as to change the capacity in which the plaintiff sues from that of a guardian to that of an individual. Huff v. Walker, 1 Ind. 193.

The general rule permits an action to be amended so as to change the character in which the plaintiff sues from that of next friend to that of an individual. Bryant v. Helton, 66 Ga. 477, wherein it was held that where a husband sued as the next friend of his infant wife, and pending the action the wife became of age, he might amend his action so as to sue in his own name and that of his wife.

Minority Rule.

In some jurisdictions it has been held that a plaintiff may not amend his action so as to change the capacity in which he sues from that of an individual to that of a representative capacity or vice versa. McRae v. McRae, 11 La. 571; Fleming v. Courtenay, 98 Me. 401, 57 Atl. 592, 99 Am. St. Rep. 414; Walker v. Lansing, etc. Traction Co. 144 Mich. 685, 108 N. W. 90; Lower v. Segal, 60 N. J. L. 99, 36 Atl. 777; Fitzhenry v. Consolidated Traction Co. 63 N. J. L. 142, 42 Atl. 416; Bennett v. North Carolina R. Co. 159 N. C. 345, 74 S. E. 883; Johnson v. Canadian Northern R. Co. 19 Manitoba 179. Compare Anderson v. Brock, 3 Greenl. (Me.) 243; Persinger v. Jubb, 52 Mich. 304, 17 N. W. 851; Wolscheid v. Thome, 76 Mich. 265, 43 N. W. 12; Smith v. Pinney, 86 Mich. 484, 49 N. W. 305; Chamberlain v. Smith, 21 U. C. Q. B. 103.

Under the minority rule a plaintiff cannot amend his action so as to change the capacity in which he sues from that of an individual to that of an executor, administrator or personal representative. Fleming v. Courtenay, 98 Me. 401, 57 Atl. 592, 99 Am. St. Rep. 414; Walker v. Lansing, etc. Traction Co. 144 Mich. 685, 108 N. W. 90; Fitzhenry v. Consolidated Traction Co. 63 N. J. L. 142, 42 Atl. 416; Bennett v. North Carolina R. Co. 159 N. C. 345, 74 S. E. 883. In Fleming v. Courtenay, supra, the court said: "There is no more identity between a person suing as executor, upon a cause of action accruing to his estate, and the same person suing in his individual capacity, upon a cause of action accruing to himself, than there is between two entirely different persons. It is true, that in Bragdon v. Harmon, 69 Me. 29, where a plaintiff was described in the writ as executor, the court held that an amendment could be allowed by striking out the words 'executor, etc.,' but the reason of this, as expressly stated in the opinion, was because the cause of action was described as one accruing to the plaintiff in his own right, and consequently the words allowed to be stricken out were simply descriptive personae. That case is no authority for the power of the court to allow an amendment whereby a new plaintiff would be substituted, or even the same person as plaintiff but in an entirely different capacity. In this very case, when it came to the law court before, upon exceptions to a ruling on a demurrer to the defendant's plea in abatement (95 Me. 128), it appeared that the plaintiff had joined in the same writ, counts in which the cause of action was alleged as accruing to the estate, and other counts in which the cause of action was alleged as accruing to her individually. It further appeared that she was not executrix at that time. But, inasmuch as the counts alleging that the cause of action accrued to her individually were sufficient, with a slight amendment, she was allowed to amend her writ by striking out the counts alleging that the cause of action accrued to the estate which she represented and by making the slight amendment necessary in the counts declaring upon the cause of action in her own right, upon the authority of Bragdon v. Harmon, supra." In Walker v. Lansing, etc. Traction Co. 144 Mich. 685, 108 N. W. 90, it was said: "The second group of errors relates to the court's permitting an amendment to the declaration. The result of the amendment was to allow the plaintiff to appear in the action, not as an individual, entitled to the damages which he had sustained as the husband of decedent because of her injury and death, but as her personal representative, entitled to very different damages. The effect of the amendment was to permit Mr. Walker as an individual representing one cause of action to get out of court, and Mr. Walker as administrator representing an entirely different cause of action to get into court. This is not permissible."

Under the minority rule a plaintiff cannot amend his action so as to change the capacity in which he sues from that of an executor, administrator or personal representative to that of an individual. McRae v. McRae, 11 La. 571; Lower v. Segal, 60 N. J. L. 99, 36 Atl. 777; Johnson v. Canadian Northern R. Co. 19 Manitoba 179. Compare Chamberlain v. Smith, Canada 21 U. C. Q. B. 103. In Lower v. Segal, supra, it was said in a syllabus by the court: "Application being made by plaintiff to amend the proceedings, so that the action may appear to have been brought by her as widow, held: (1) That the propriety of making the amendment asked must be determined without reference to the fact that plaintiff is both widow and personal representative of the deceased; and the amendments should only be made if, in case this action had been brought by another person as such personal representative, the widow should be permitted to substitute herself as plaintiff, and amend the proceedings so as to present her claim against defendant.

(2) Such an amendment would not tend towards the determination in this suit of the real question in controversy between the parties thereto, but would operate to institute a new suit between different parties, and presenting other questions. It is not an amendment that the court is required to make. (3) The amendment asked would be unreasonably vexatious to defendant, for it appears on the face of the declaration that the action was not brought within the period limited by the laws of Pennsylvania for bringing such actions." And in Johnson v. Canadian Northern R. Co., 10 Manitoba 179, the court said: "The plaintiff applied at the trial to amend by striking out the words 'administratrix,' etc., and to bring the suit in her name as widow of deceased. The Ontario Act allows the widow to sue if no executor or administrator has been appointed. The application to amend was renewed before this court. To allow the amendment would be equivalent to the bringing of a new action. The suit was clearly brought by the Manitoba administratrix, as such. The amendment would permit a new person to sue whose right of intervention depends upon the absence of an executor or administrator of the estate of the deceased."

EX PARTE LOGAN ET AL.

Alabama Supreme Court—February 5, 1914.

185 Ala. 525; 64 So. 570.

Chattel Mortgages — Waiver — Levy of Attachment.

The levy of an attachment by a chattel mortgagee on the mortgaged property as the property of the mortgagor does not waive the title of the mortgagee, or estop him from maintaining an action of detinue to recover the mortgaged property, since, by the direct provisions of Code 1907, § 4091, a chattel mortgagor has an equity in the mortgaged property subject to levy.

Res Judicata — Matters Not in Issue.

A claim suit between a chattel mortgagee and a third party resulting in favor of the third party, and instituted after the levy of an attachment by the chattel mortgagee on the mortgaged property as the property of the mortgagor is not res judicata in a detinue suit by the mortgagee against the mortgagor as to the same property.

Chattel Mortgages — Remedies of Mortgagee.

A chattel mortgagee has three several or concurrent remedies against the mortgagor:

An action at law to recover the debt; an appropriate action to recover possession of the property; and a foreclosure of the mortgage, and sale of the property.

[See 96 Am. St. Rep. 690.]

Certiorari to Court of Appeals.

Petition by S. E. Logan for certiorari to Court of Appeals to review judgment and decision of that court in case of Logan, et al. v. Smith Bros. Co. 9 Ala. App. 459. The material facts are stated in the opinion. WRIT DENIED.

O. M. Alexander and Blackmon, Merrill & Walker for appellant.

James F. Matthews for appellee.

[526] MAYFIELD, J.—The questions presented for decision are as follows:

Does the mortgagee of a chattel estop himself from maintaining an action of detinue to recover the mortgaged property by levying an attachment or execution upon the property as the property of the mortgagor?

If not estopped, does such levy amount to a waiver of the right or title of the mortgagee?

If the mere levy does not work an estoppel or waiver, is a claim suit, instituted after the levy, between the mortgagee and a third party, which results in favor of the third party, res judicata, in a detinue suit by the mortgagee against the mortgagor, as to the same property?

The trial court and the Court of Appeals answered each of the questions in the negative, and the defendant mortgagor seeks certiorari to have reviewed the judgment and decision of the Court of Appeals as to these questions.

The exact questions are new in this court, so far as our investigation goes. They have been decided by other courts, however; but the trouble is they have been decided differently in the several courts. The questions, or some of them, have been answered in the affirmative by the Supreme Courts of Massachusetts and of Arkansas and other states, and in the negative by the Supreme Courts of Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Iowa, North Dakota, and other states.

[527] The rule of law is thus stated by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts: "A party holding personal property by virtue of a mortgage or pledge may waive his claim under such mortgage or pledge, and attach the property in a suit to recover the debt for which the mortgage or pledge was given. Buck v. Ingersoll, 11 Metc. (Mass.) 226, 232. Such attachment is, in itself, a waiver of the claim under the mortgage. The liens respectively created by mortgage and by attachment on the same property are essentially different, and cannot coexist. They affect very differently, also, the rights of third persons. A stranger may attach personal property subject to the incumbrance of a prior lien by attachment, with no responsibility for such prior lien; if the lien is by mortgage, he must pay the amount secured by such mortgage, before his attachment is effectual. We have no need to discuss the question whether the same rule shall apply to an attachment of the equity of redemption of personal property to secure the payment of the mortgage debt as applies to the equity of redemption of real property, for, in this commonwealth, the equity of redemption of personal property is not attachable." Evans v. Warren, 122 Mass. 304.

The Arkansas court thus states the rule, citing a number of authorities: "The levy of the attachment amounted to an assertion by appellants that the property was subject to seizure and sale under the attachment. But, as this could not be true if the lien of the mortgage still existed, the levy of the attachment was the same as a denial on the part of appellants that the mortgage lien existed, and was in effect a waiver on their part of the lien created by the mortgage. In other words, having sued out an attachment, levied it upon the property in question, and prosecuted the attachment suit to judgment, they must be held to have waived [528] rights which were inconsistent with such a course of procedure. The mortgage lien, being inconsistent with such attachment, was thereby waived, and appellants have nothing upon which to base their action of replevin." Cox v. Harris, 64 Ark. 215, 41 S. W. 426, 62 Am. St. Rep. 187, 188.

The Indiana and Illinois courts criticised the rules declared by the Massachusetts and Arkansas courts as being technical and artificial, and declined to follow. See Bryam v. Stout, 127 Ind. 195, 26 N. E. 687; Barchard v. Kohn, 157 Ill. 579, 41 N. E. 902, 20 L.R.A. 803. In the latter case it is said: "The main case which holds, that an attachment of the mortgaged property by the mortgagee for the mortgage debt is a waiver of his lien under the mortgage is Evans v. Warren, 122 Mass. 303. The decision in that case was placed upon the ground substantially that the liens created by mortgage and by attachment upon the same property are essentially different, and cannot coexist, for the reason that under the Massachusetts statutes the equity of redemption of personal property is not subject to attachment, and hence, if the mortgagee causes an attachment to issue against the mortgaged property, it is a waiver of the mortgage lien. The cases which hold that the attachment operated as a waiver of the plaintiff's rights under the mortgage do so upon the general grounds that a person cannot avail himself of inconsistent remedies in relation to the same matter, and, having chosen and carried into effect one remedy, he cannot resort to a different one, involving a repudiation of the grounds upon which the first one was based; that the suit on the mortgage and the attachment suit were inconsistent, because the one proceeds upon the ground that the mortgagee is the owner of the property, and the other upon the ground that the mortgagor thereof [529] is owner; that, when the debt matured, the mortgagee had the right to take the property under the mortgage, he having the legal title, subject only to a right of redemption; and that, by bringing the attachment suit, he elects to treat the property as the property of the debtor, and cannot, by seeking to enforce his mortgage, assert an ownership and right of possession in himself antedating the attachment. The reasoning in Evans v. Warren, supra, was held to be unsatisfactory, and its doctrine was repudiated in Byram v. Stout, 127 Ind. 195, 26 N. E. 687. In the latter case the mortgagee in a chattel mortgage brought an action to foreclose it, and a junior mortgagee set up as a defense that the complainant had previously brought suit upon the evidences of debt secured by his mortgage, and had therein issued a writ of attachment, and levied it upon the mortgaged property, and had thereby released his mortgage lien; but the court held that the attachment was not a waiver of the mortgage lien, and did not estop the mortgagee from claiming under his mortgage, basing its decision mainly upon the ground that in Indiana the mortgagee in a chattel mortgage is a mere lienholder. Jones, Mortg. § 55. In support of the conclusion that the mortgage of personal property is a mere lienholder, Indiana decisions are there referred to holding that personal property under mortgage may be levied upon and sold by execution subject to the mortgage lien."

The Massachusetts doctrine is thus criticised by an annotator of the case of Dix v. Smith, 9 Okla. 124, 80 Pac. 303, 50 L.R.A. 714: "The decision in the principal case, while the logical result of the view taken of the nature and effect of a chattel mortgage, and of the construction placed upon the statute governing attachments, rests upon strictly technical grounds. To render [530] applicable the theory of the case, that a lien of a chattel mortgage and the lien of an attachment are inconsistent, and cannot coexist, since the first imports legal title in the mortgagee, and the second legal title in the mortgagor, not only the common-law doctrine that a chattel mortgage operates to transfer the legal title to the mortgagee, but also the common-law rule that a mere equitable right, such as the equity of redemption remaining in the mortgagor, is not subject to levy, must have been left undisturbed, both by statute and judicial decision. Even in a jurisdiction where the doctrine that the legal title is in the mortgagee has not been abandoned, there is no necessary inconsistency between the lien of a chattel mortgage and the lien of an attachment, though asserted by the same person, if, either by statute or judicial decision, the equity of redemption in the mortgagor is made subject to attachment. While the statute involved in the principal case affords the means of reaching by attachment property that has been mortgaged, the opinion emphasizes the fact that the statute contemplates the payment and discharge of the mortgage before the lien of the attachment can attach, so that the statute does not impair either of the doctrines of the common law referred to. The theory and decision of the principal case have the support of Evans v. Warren, 122 Mass. 308, which is substantially like it, except that there the attachment, which was subsequently dissolved, was issued for the debt secured by the mortgage. The court took the view that the liens were essentially different, and could not coexist, pointing out that the legal title was in the mortgagee, and that the equity of redemption in personal property was not attachable."

Whatever might be the correct doctrine in this state but for our statutes, our statutes certainly change the [531] law from that declared by the Supreme Courts of Massachusetts and Arkansas. Section 4091 of our Code expressly makes the equity of redemption in either land or personal property, subject to levy and sale under execution. This being true, the doctrine of estoppel or waiver cannot apply to or result from the levy of an execution, by the mortgagee, upon the mortgaged chattels.

It is true that this court, in the case of Fuller v. Eames, 108 Ala. 464, 19 So. 366, held that, where there was a conditional sale of chattels, the vendor retaining title until the purchase price was paid, and the vendor attached the property as that of the vendee, he was thereby estopped from bringing an action of detinue to recover the same property, thereby claiming that it was the vendor's, and not the vendee's. In that case this court said: "In this attachment proceeding, the plaintiff unequivocally recognized the property as defendant's, and sought to subject it in a manner wholly inconsistent with the retention of the title in himself when he sold the property to defendant. He thereby waived any title he might have had to the property, and could not afterwards institute this suit maintainable only on the theory of title in himself. Thomason v. Lewis, 109

Ala. 426, 15 So. 830; Montgomery Iron Works v. Smith, 98 Ala. 644, 13 So. 525; Lehman v. Van Winkle, 92 Ala. 443, 8 So. 870; Tanner, etc. Engine Co. v. Hall, 89 Ala. 628, 7 So. 187."

In that case, as is pointed out, the two remedies were inconsistent, and not concurrent, and, the vendor having elected to attach the property as that of the defendant, and to hold him liable for the purchase price, he would not be allowed to have the property and also to have the purchase price.

In the case at bar, as to mortgaged chattels, the statute changes the rule, if it would not otherwise be different. [532] The equity of redemption in chattels being subject to levy and sale under execution, the levy, of course, was not a claim inconsistent with that of the mortgagee's title, and, for this reason, the pleas setting up estoppel, election, or waiver, on account of this levy, were no defense to the action of detinue; hence no error intervened in the trial court or in the Court of Appeals as to the rulings on demurrer to these pleas.

The claim suit was a contest between the mortgagee and a third party. In this suit the issue was, by virtue of the statute, whether the property was that of the defendant, the mortgagor, and whether it was subject to the process. The title to the property as between the mortgagee and the mortgagor was not therefore put in issue, nor decided, so far as the pleas show, and therefore the result of that claim suit was not shown to be res judicata of the detinue suit between the mortgagee and the mortgagor.

In this state the mortgagee has three remedies against the mortgagor, either of which he is at liberty to pursue, or he may pursue any two or all concurrently: He may bring an action at law to recover the debt, an appropriate action to recover possession of the property, and may foreclose the mortgage, and sell the property. But, if he pursue one or more, each suit must be tried and determined on the principles applicable and prevailing in the forum in which the particular remedy is sought.

The questions were treated fully by the Court of Appeals in an able opinion by Walker, P. J., in which we entirely concur, and, but for the fact that the question is one of first impression in this court, it might well be disposed of by our merely adopting the opinion of the Court of Appeals.

The writ of certiorari is therefore denied,

[533] Certiorari denied.

Anderson, C. J., and Sayre, Somerville, de Graffenried, and Gardner, JJ., concur. Mr. Clellan, J., thinks the writs of certiorari prayed for should be denied for the reasons and upon the considerations set forth in the opinion of the Court of Appeals.

NOTE.Waiver of Chattel Mortgage Lien by Attachment.

The majority of the recent cases are in accord with the rule laid down in Kansas City Live Stock Com. Co. v. Bank of Hamlin, 79 Kan. 761, 17 Ann. Cas. 956, that if the mortgagor of chattels retains a title or interest therein subject to levy and sale the mortgagee does not waive his mortgage lien by the levy of an attachment on the chattels in an action for the debt secured by the mortgage. Such a holding is in the reported case rested on a statute providing that a chattel mortgagor retains an equity subject to levy and sale. See to the same effect J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. v. Johnson, 152 Wis. 8, 139 N. W. 445.

In Flores v. Stone, 21 Cal. App. 105, 131 Pac. 348, rehearing denied 21 Cal. App. 111, 131 Pac. 351, 352, under a statute whereby a mortgagee does not obtain title to the mortgaged chattels but merely a lien on them, an attachment levied on mortgaged property the mortgage on which was subsequently assigned to the plaintiff, was held not to estop the mortgagee from prosecuting an action to foreclose the mortgaged property, the court basing its decision on the fact that the mortgagee's interest in the property was a lien and not a fee. The court said: "The contention of appellant, in brief, is that, plaintiffs having attached the property subject to the mortgage and afterwards paying to the mortgagee the amount of the mortgage debt and obtaining an assignment of said notes and mortgages, they thereby waived all right to any lien under the respective mortgages and that they are therefore estopped from foreclosing the same. This claim is based upon sections 2968 to 2970, inclusive, of the Civil Code and certain decisions of the courts, especially of other jurisdictions, hereafter to be noticed. It is not disputed that, in this state, the mortgagee does not hold the title to the property but he merely has a lien thereon as security for the payment of his debt. (Civ. Code Section 2888.) This applies to mortgages of personal as well as of real property. (Alferits v. Borgwardt, 126 Cal. 202 [58 Pac. 460.]) While the mortgagee, therefore, can maintain only one action for the recovery of the debt secured by the mortgage, as provided in section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure, there is nothing to preclude him from attaching the property for an unsecured debt. He would not thereby waive his mortgage as there is no inconsistency in the assertion of the two claims. If the mortgage conveyed the title the situation, of course, would be different, as he would be attaching his own property. The assignee of the mortgage would sustain the same relation to the case, and the institution of an action and the levy of an attachment on the property for an unsecured debt could not of itself be deemed a waiver of the lien of his mortgage nor should it deprive him of his right to enforce the payment of the secured debt. If practicable, only one action should be brought and a needless burden of expense should not be imposed upon the debtor, but it is not perceived how, on principle, if the attachment suit is instituted first, it destroys the lien of the mortgage. In this instance, manifestly, the attaching creditor was not in a position to foreclose at the time the attachment was issued as the assignment of the mortgage was made subsequently." So in Krebs v. Sawyer, 162 Ia. 593, 144 N. W. 345, it was held that a mortgagee who seized the mortgaged property in a replevin suit did not waive or depreciate his mortgage lien in any way. That case likewise involved a state whereby the mortgagee was not vested with the title to the mortgaged property, but was entitled merely to possession. The court said: "There is nothing in the point that Sawyer waived his mortgage lien by commencing his action of replevin in Nebraska. What he did there was in the enforcement of his lien, and not in hostility to it. In fact, he has never waived either claim, but constantly asserted, both, as he had the right to do." To the same effect see Stein v. McAuley, 147 Ia. 630, 125 N. W. 336, 140 Am. St. Rep. 332, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 692, wherein it was said: "The whole doctrine of waiver is based upon the theory that the respective liens are essentially different, and cannot co-exist. See Evans v. Warren, supra. When, then, a chattel mortgage conveys the legal title to the mortgagee, as in Massachusetts and some of the other states, affirming the doctrine of waiver, it is manifest that the conclusion reached in these jurisdictions is correct; for it is elementary, of course, that one may not attach his own property. But where the mortgage creates a mere lien upon the property, as in this state (see Code, section 2911), the reason for the rule does not exist and in such cases the rule itself is inapplicable. This distinction is pointed out in the cases from Illinois, Indiana, and Nebraska heretofore cited. In this state the mortgagor has an equity of redemption under a chattel mortgage, which may be levied upon and sold (see Code sections 3905, 3979); and, if this may be done, we see no reason why a mortgagee of the property may not himself levy upon this equity in the property itself without waiving his mortgage lien. In such a case he is not asserting title in himself in one proceeding and levying upon it in another. His rights, then, are simply cumulative, and in no sense inconsistent. This distinction is now generally recognized by courts and text-writers." The case of Green v. Bass, 83 Ohio St. 378, Ann. Cas. 1912A 828, 94 N. E. 742, adheres to the doctrine that a mortgagee does not lose his mortgage lien by instituting an attachment proceeding. In that case it appeared that a mortgagee brought an action on the note which the mortgage secured and after recovering judgment caused an execution to be issued and levied on the property covered by the mortgage. It did not appear whether the mortgagee's interest amounted to title to the mortgaged property or whether it was merely a lien. However, the court, discussing the effect of the levy on the validity of the mortgage, said: "That the note became merged in the judgment which was a higher form of the same debt is clear enough upon both principle and authority. But it is not made to appear how it could affect the lien of the mortgage, which, according to the established view in this state, is only a security for the debt. Why should not that which was a security before the recovery of judgment be a security after it? Plaintiff did not, in any way, change his position in consequence of the recovery of that judgment, nor was he, in any way, affected by it. No reason appears why the case should not be governed by the general rule that a security continues until the discharge of the obligation. If the doctrine of merger could be said to be inapplicable to a case of this character, it would still be true that even with respect to the union of a lesser and greater estate in the same property and in the same person, the estates will not be regarded as merging if equitable considerations require them to be regarded as separate."

However, in Johnson v. Jones, 39 Okla. 323, 135 Pac. 12, 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 547, the opposite view was announced. In that case it was held that a mortgagee by attaching the mortgaged property, released the mortgage. The court said: "The lower court did not err in giving the instruction. Instruction No. 23 reads as follows: 'You are instructed that you will not consider the question of the mortgage, which plaintiff claims he held on the mares and mules now claimed by defendant Jones, so far as it relates to said mares and mules, as the plaintiff, by attaching said property, destroyed whatever mortgage lien he may have had by reason of said alleged mortgage, and, in determining the rights of said defendant Jones to said property, said mortgage will be considered by you.' This instruction correctly states the law of the case. See Dix v. Smith, 9 Okla. 124, 60 Pac. 303, 50 L.R.A. 714; Crimson v. Barse Live Stock Commission Co. 17 Okla. 117, 87 Pac. 876; Jones on Chattel Mortgages, sec 565. The distinction urged by counsel, while ingenious, to our minds is fallacious, and will not stand." It may be pointed out that in Oklahoma a mortgagee has title to the mortgaged property and not merely a lien. To substantially the same effect, see Rooney v. McPherson, 38 Okla. 410, 133 Pac. 212. But in Sheets v. Hocker, 34 Okla. 676, 128 Pac. 725, a stranger to the mortgage who levied an execution against a house for the purpose of satisfying a money judgment but who when informed of the existence of a chattel mortgage on the same property, obtained an assignment of the same and commenced foreclosure proceedings under the mortgage after dropping the levy, was held not to lose his rights under the mortgage. The court said: "The plaintiff relied upon the proposition that the levy of the execution was a waiver of the mortgage. The evidence does not show an intention to waive the mortgage. It shows that the execution was placed in the hands of the constable before the defendant learned of the existence of the mortgage. As soon as defendant learned of the mortgage, he bought it, and from that time proceeded under it, and proceeded promptly. The constable had the execution and levied it, but according to the testimony, he was instructed not to proceed under it. This instruction was given next morning. The defendant proceeded promptly to advertise and sell, and never seemed to rely on the execution at all. The facts of this case do not bring it within the rule laid down in Dix v. Smith, 9 Okla. 124, 60 Pac. 303, 50 L.R.A. 714. In that case the creditor proceeded with an attachment. In this case he proceeded with the mortgage, and instructed the officer not to proceed under the execution. The mortgage lien was not discharged when defendant bought the note, and had it assigned to himself, and the fact that the constable also levied an execution did not discharge the lien of the mortgage."

PERDUE ET AL.

STARKEY'S HEIRS.

Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals—
September 9, 1916.

117 Va. 806; 86 S. E. 158.

Wills — Division Per Capita or Per Stirpes.

A bequest to persons who are living and to children of another who is dead presumptively refers to the children as individuals and not as a class, and the children take the same share per capita with those persons who are living, and the relations between the beneficiaries and the operation of the statute on those relations in case of intestacy do not overcome the presumption that a per capita distribution was intended.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A husband and wife executed a will whereby they made specific legacies, and then gave to persons named and the daughters of another person their estate, "to be equally divided between them." The beneficiaries bore different degrees of relationship to each other and to the husband and wife. Held, that the estate must be divided per capita among the beneficiaries.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Roanoke county.

Action between Perdue and Starkey's heirs, involving construction of will. From judgment rendered, certain parties appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Samuel A. Anderson and John P. Lee for appellants.

Martin & Chitwood, Cowe & Cocke and E. W. Saunders for appellees.

[807] HARRISON, J.—This appeal involves the proper construction of the fifth clause of the joint will of John C. Starkey and Mary A. Starkey, his wife.

After sundry specific legacies are made, the fifth clause disposes of the residuum of the joint estate as follows: "We give and bequeath unto Sallie P. Blount, Elsie Jeter, Duck Hancock and Charles F. Poindexter and S. L. Holland's daughters by first wife the remainder of our estate, both real and personal, to be equally divided between them."

The beneficiaries under this clause bear different degrees of relationship to each other and to the testator and the testatrix. Some are nieces of the testator and others nieces of the testatrix, Duck Hancock and Charles Poindexter being niece and nephew of both, and the appellants, who are S. L. Holland's daughters by his first wife, being great-nieces of the testatrix.

The rule of construction to be applied in the interpretation of the language used in the clause under consideration has long been settled in this jurisdiction. It is that, in the absence of explanation, where a bequest is made to some who are living and to the children of another who is dead, the children of the one who is dead are presumed to be referred to as individuals and not as a class, taking the same share per capita with those who are living; and that the relations existing between the parties, and the operation which the statute would have upon those relations in case of intestacy are not sufficient to overcome the presumption that a per capita distribution was intended. Whittle v. Whittle, 108 Va. 22, 60 S. E. 748; Walker v. Webster, 95 Va. 377, 28 S. E. 570; Hoxton v. Griffith, 18 Grat. (Va.) 574.

In the last named case, Judge Joynea, speaking for this court, states the rule in the following clear and satisfactory [808] language: "When a bequest is made to several persons, in general terms, indicating that they are to take equally as tenants in common, each individual will of course take the same share; in other words, the legatees will take per capita. The same rule applies where a bequest is to one who is living, and to the children of another who is dead, whatever may be the relations of the parties to each other, or however the statute of distributions might operate upon those relations in case of intestacy. Thus, where property is given 'to my brother A, and to the children of my brother B,' A takes a share only equal to that of each of the children of B. So where the gift is to A's and B's children, or to the children of A and the children of B, the children take as individuals, per capita. The substance of this rule of construction is that, in the absence of explanation, the children in such a case are presumed to be referred to as individuals, and not as a class, and that the relations existing between the parties, and the operation which the statute would have upon those relations in case of intestacy, are not sufficient to control this presumption. The general rule is well established, and has been fully recognized by the decisions of this court. Brewer v. Opie, 1 Call. (Va.) 212; Crow v. Crow, 1 Leigh (Va.) 74; McMaster v. McMaster, 10 Grat. (Va.) 275." This learned judge adds: "But this rule is not inflexible, and it will yield to the cardinal rule of construction which requires that effect shall be given to the intention of the testator, to be collected from the whole will. If, therefore, an intention can be collected from the will that the children of the deceased parent are to take as a class, that intention will prevail."

The cases cited in support of the rule by Judge Joynea show from what an early day the rule as stated by him has been the established law in this State; and the subsequent [809] cases cited by us show how uniformly that rule of construction has been upheld to the present day.

The will in the case before us is brief. As already seen, after making several specific legacies, the residuary clause under construction declares that the beneficiaries mentioned therein are to take "the remainder of our estate, both real and personal, to be equally divided between them." There is not a word in any other part of the will indicating that the makers intended by the language used any other disposition of their estate than that which follows under the rule of construction mentioned; nor is there anything in the agreed facts which suggests that they expected the estate given to be divided otherwise than per capita among those who were to take it.

The makers of the will selected those who were to take the remainder of their estate, describing some of them by name and others as the daughters of S. L. Holland by his first wife, and clearly and specifically directed that such residuum should be equally divided between them.

The interpretation put upon the will by the circuit court, that the beneficiaries under the fifth clause took per stirpes and not per capita is in conflict with the established rule of construction to which we have adverted. The decree complained of must, therefore, be reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the views herein expressed.

Reversed.

Generally.

It is a general rule of testamentary construction that, in the absence of language indicating a contrary intent, a direction that a bequest to several persons shall be divided equally among them imports a division per capita and not per stirpes though the beneficiaries stand in different degrees of relationship to the testator. Ballentine v. Foster, 128 Ala. 638, 30 So. 481; Purnell v. Culbertson, 12 Bush (Ky.) 369; Hertz's Estate, 22 Pa. Dist. 250; Priester's Estate, 23 Pa. Super. Ct. 336. And see the cases cited throughout this note. "The settled legal construction of the words 'equally to be divided,' when used in a will is to cause an equal division of the property per capita and not per stirpes, whether the devisees be children and grandchildren, brothers or sisters and nephews or nieces, or strangers in blood to the testator." Doe v. Roe, 2 Har. (Del.) 103, 29 Am. Dec. 336, citing Butler v. Stratton, 3 Bro. C. C. (Eng.) 367; Lincoln v. Pelham, 10 Ves. Jr. (Eng.) 176; Lugar v. Harman, 1 Cox Ch. (Eng.) 250; Northey v. Strange, 1 P. Wms. (Eng.) 341. So in Johnston v. Knight, 117 N. C. 122, 23 S. E. 92, it was said: "The words 'equally divided' do not absolutely control in all instances, but yield only when other language of the will or the manifest intent requires it."

The rule yields of course to testamentary language evincing a contrary intent. See the cases cited throughout this note. Thus in Risk's Appeal, 52 Pa. St. 269, 91 Am. Dec. 156, it was said: "But, like all other rules of construction, when applied to wills, this one, that entitles children of a living child to take per capita, must be controlled by the general intention of the testator. Not that the principle of the per stirpes rule is to be preferred because adopted by the statutes of distribution, for it may be the very purpose of the testator, as it is his right, to take his estate out of the principles of the statute. But it is a reasonable presumption that the mind of the testator was familiar with the statutory rule of distributions; and if we see in his will an intention to distribute according to that rule, we should give it effect all the more readily because it is provided by law for cases where there is no will. Why, then, should a testator make a will at all, if he means it should operate as the statute would operate without it? He may desire to give legacies to those who would take nothing under the statute, or increased portions to some who would take—or if content that the rules of the statute shall apply to his whole estate, he may still desire to appoint his own executors. For one or the other, or all of these reasons, he may have been moved to make a will. Whilst we are not to hesitate to allow him to alter the descents provided in the statute, we are not, on the other hand, to presume, from the fact that he made a will, that he meant its construction should be at all possible points inconsistent with the statute. In a word, a per capita construction is not to be forced upon a particular devise, because the devisees under that clause, had they taken under the statute, would have been per stirpes."

In a number of cases, wherein it appeared that a bequest was directed to be divided equally "between" several persons belonging to two distinct classes it has been urged that the use of the word "between" instead of "among" indicated an intention that the distribution should be per stirpes, but it has been held uniformly that no importance is to be attached to the use of the word in that connection. McIntire v. McIntire, 192 U. S. 116, 24 S. Ct. 196, 48 U. S. (L. ed.) 369; Almand v. Whitaker, 113 Ga. 889, 39 S. E. 395; Kling v. Schnellbecker, 107 Ia. 636, 78 N. W. 673; Farmer v. Kimball, 46 N. H. 435, 88 Am. Dec. 219; Myres v. Myres, 23 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 410; Hicks's Estate, 134 Pa. St. 507, 19 Atl. 705. In McIntire v. McIntire, supra, it was said: "And with regard to the word 'between,' the will is an illiterate will, and as the popular use of the word is not accurate no conclusion safely can be based upon that." In Kling v. Schnellbecker, 107 Ia. 636, 78 N. W. 673, the court said: "Much is made in the argument of the word 'between,' and it may be conceded that, strictly speaking, it implies a division between two parties or classes; but the reference may be to more than two parties. Haskell v. Sargent, 113 Mass. 243. When the words 'between' and 'among' follow the verb 'divide,' their general significance is very similar, and in popular use they are synonymous, though 'among' connotes a collection, and is never followed by two of any sort, while 'between' may be followed by any plural number, and seems to refer to individuals of a class, rather than to the class itself."

Gift to Unnamed Persons.

A bequest to be divided equally among several persons designated only by a statement of their relationship to the testator is ordinarily to be distributed per capita. McIntire v. McIntire, 192 U. S. 116, 24 S. Ct. 196, 48 U. S. (L. ed.) 369 (children of testator's two brothers); Kling v. Schnellbecker, 107 Ia. 636, 78 N. W. 673 (sister and wife's sisters); Farmer v. Kimball, 46 N. H. 435, 88 Am. Dec. 219 (testator's cousins and children of her mother's cousins). And see Miller v. Wilson (Ky.) 66 S. W. 755. Compare Crozier v. Cundall, 99 Ky. 202, 35 S. W. 546 (children and grandchildren).

By the weight of authority a bequest to be divided equally among the "heirs" of the testator is to be distributed per capita. Tuttle v. Puit, 68 N. C. 543; Mooney v. Purpus, 70 Ohio St. 57, 70 N. E. 894; Ramsey v. Stephenson, 34 Ore. 408, 56 Pac. 520, 57 Pac. 195; Copeland v. Copeland, 64 Ill. App. 100; Walker v. Webster, 95 Va. 377, 28 S. E. 670. In Mooney v. Purpus, supra, it was said: "By the use of the phrase 'my lawful heirs' he manifestly intended that all those persons who would be his heirs under the statute of descent, in case of his intestacy, should be his beneficiaries, and should take the residuum of his estate. And by the use of the words 'equally, share and share alike,' he just as clearly evidenced the intention that they should not take such residuum in the manner prescribed by the statute, but should take it equally, share and share alike, as directed by his will. By reference to the statute we ascertain who are to take under item four, and by the plain provisions of the will itself, we are told how they are to take, that is: 'equally, share and share alike,' per capita and not per stirpes."

In a few cases, however, it has been held that despite a provision for "equal" distribution a testator in leaving his property to his "heirs" is deemed to have adopted the provisions of the statute of descents and the distribution is per stirpes. Johnson v. Bodine, 108 Ia. 594, 79 N. W. 348; Matter of Griswold, 42 Misc. 230, 86 N. Y. S. 250; Young's Appeal, 83 Pa. St. 69.

Gift to Named Persons and Unnamed Members of Class.

GENERALLY.

It seems that by the early English decisions it was established as a rule of construction that a gift to certain named persons and the children of other persons related to the testator in the same degree as those named is to be distributed per capita. While there is much dissent in the latter cases from that broad rule, it is held by the weight of authority that a provision in such a gift that the bequest shall be "equally" divided requires a distribution per capita. Pitney v. Brown, 44 Ill. 363; Purnell v. Culbertson, 12 Bush (Ky.) 369; Justice v. Stringer, 160 Ky. 354, 169 S. W. 836; Stokes v. Tilly, 9 N. J. Eq. 130; Macknet v. Macknet, 24 N. J. Eq. 277; Thornton v. Roberts, 30 N. J. Eq. 473; Burnet v. Burnet, 30 N. J. Eq. 595; Harrell v. Davenport, 58 N. C. 4; Culp v. Lee, 109 N. C. 675, 14 S. E. 74; Johnson v. Knight, 117 N. C. 122, 23 S. E. 92; Collins v. Feather, 52 W. Va. 107, 43 S. E. 323, 94 Am. St. Rep. 912, 61 L.R.A. 660; In re Bossi, 5 British Columbia 446. And see the cases cited in the following subdivisions of this note. The cases so holding attach little importance to the fact that such a distribution varies from that provided by the statute of descents, for the reason, tersely expressed in Cuthbert v. Laing, 75 N. H. 304, 73 Atl. 641, that "a will is made to avoid, not to carry into effect, the statute." In Pitney v. Brown, 44 Ill. 363, it was said: "The point has so often been decided by the courts, both of England and of this country, that there is an established canon of interpretation in regard to these words, from whose authority we do not feel at liberty to depart. With a long line of precedents all pointing in one direction, and on a question of admitted doubt, it is our duty to follow the rule, even if questioning its soundness. The rule is thus stated by Jarman (vol. 2, p. 111): 'when a legacy is to the children of several persons, they take per capita, and not per stirpes. The same rule applies when a bequest is made to a person, described as standing in a certain relation to the testator and to the children of another person, standing in the same relation; as, to my brother A and the children of my brother B, in which case A takes only a share equal to that of one of the children of B.' See also Lugar v. Harman, 1 Cox Ch. (Eng.) 250; Northey v. Strange, 1 P. Wms. (Eng.) 343; Blackler v. Webb, 2 P. Wms. 383; Butler v. Stratton, 3 Brown C. C. (Eng.) 367; Warrington v. Warrington, 2 Hare (Eng.) 54; Paine v. Wagner, 12 Sim. (Eng.) 184; Collins v. Hoxie, 9 Paige (N. Y.) 89; Conner v. Johnson, 2 Hill Eq. (S. C.) 41."

In a few cases the general rule as heretofore stated has been questioned. Roome v. Counter, 6 N. J. L. 111, 10 Am. Dec. 390; Ferrer v. Pyne, 81 N. Y. 281; In re Scott, 163 Pa. St. 165, 29 Atl. 877. And it requires but slight evidence of such an intent on the part of the testator to lead to a distribution per stirpes. Bethel v. Major (Ky.) 68 S. W. 631; Jourdan v. Green, 16 N. C. 270; Miller's Estate, 26 Pa. Super. Ct. 453; Sipe's Estate, 30 Pa. Super. Ct. 145; Conner v. Johnson, 2 Hill. Eq. (S. C.) 41; Collier v. Collier, 3 Rich. Eq. (S. C.) 555, 55 Am. Dec. 653; Perdriau v. Wells, 5 Rich. Eq. (S. C.) 20. Thus a bequest to be divided equally between A and the children of B: in case of the death of A his share to go to C's children, has been held to require a division per stirpes. Green's Estate, 140 Pa. St. 253, 21 Atl. 317.

In case of a bequest to be divided equally between a named person and the "heirs" of another, if, on a construction of the entire will, "heirs" is deemed to mean "children," the distribution will be per capita. Whitehurst v. Pritchard, 5 N. C. 383; Stowe v. Ward, 10 N. C. 604; Harris v. Philpot, 40 N. C. 324. But if "heirs" is used as meaning heirs at law a distribution per stirpes is required. Balcom v. Haynes, 14 Allen (Mass.) 204; Huntress v. Place, 137 Mass. 409; McClench v. Waldron, 204 Mass. 554, 91 N. E. 126; Grandy v. Sawyer, 62 N. C. 8; In re Ashburner, 159 Pa. St. 545, 28 Atl. 361.

CHILDREN AND GRANDCHILDREN.

A bequest to be divided equally among named children of the testator and the unnamed children or issue of a deceased child, the beneficiaries, according to the weight of authority, take per capita. Dowding v. Smith, 3 Beav. (Eng.) 541; Blackler v. Webb,

2 P. Wms. (Eng.) 383; Houghton v. Bell, 23 Can. Sup. Ct. 498; Remillard v. Chabot, 33 Can. Sup. Ct. 328; In re Duder [1884-1896] Newfoundland L. Rep. 186; Crawford v. Redus, 54 Miss. 700; Bunner v. Storm, 1 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 357; Myres v. Myres, 23 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 410; Whitehurst v. Pritchard, 5 N. C. 383; Martin v. Gould, 17 N. C. 305; Harris v. Philpot, 40 N. C. 324; Waller v. Forsythe, 62 N. C. 353; Marsh v. Dellinger, 127 N. C. 360, 37 S. E. 494; In re Dible, *81 Pa. St. 279; Wessenger v. Hunt, 9 Rich. Eq. (S. C.) 459; Kimbro v. Johnston, 15 Lea (Tenn.) 78. In Cuthbert v. Laing, 75 N. H. 305, 73 Atl. 641, it was said: "The claim that the grandchildren take but one share in the estate cannot be sustained. The direction of the will is that the property be distributed in equal shares 'to my children, . . . and also to my grandchildren.' There is no satisfactory evidence that the testator intended the grandchildren to take only the statutory share of their deceased parent. In the provision relating to survivorship he treats all alike. The shares of deceased beneficiaries go to the survivors. If one of the grandchildren had died, its share would have been distributed to all the survivors equally. Had the testator had in mind the statute of distribution, and intended that the two grandchildren should take only their father's share, he would also have provided that in the event of the death of one grandchild its half of its father's share in the estate should go to the other grandchild, to the exclusion of its uncles and aunts." In Brittain v. Carson, 46 Md. 186, the court said: "The words of the will are, 'shall be equally divided between my said daughter, Amelia J. Brittain, and the children of Virginia Carson.' A long series of uniform decisions has given a settled construction to provisions in a will similar to this, all holding that the legatees, by force of the language used, take equally, and that the distribution is to be per capita."

In a few cases, however, a contrary view has been upheld. Billinslea v. Abercrombie, 2 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 24; Lyon v. Acker, 33 Conn. 222; Wood v. Robertson, 113 Ind. 323, 15 N. E. 457; Risk's Appeal, 52 Pa. St. 269, 91 Am. Dec. 156. In Eyer v. Beck, 70 Mich. 179, 38 N. W. 20, it was said: "The laws of inheritance are generally understood by intelligent people. It is understood that, when there are children and grandchildren to take, the grandchildren by one child take in aggregate only that child's portion. In our judgment this idea is clearly expressed in the will. The testator directs that the property shall be equally divided among his 'heirs.' He then goes on to name them, and in doing so gives the name of each child, but not of any grandchild. Those he describes only as 'the children of Christian Beck, J., deceased.' Coming as this does in the description of the heirs, we think it evidently means that those children together represent one heir. That is in harmony with the statute of distributions, and is at least quite as natural a meaning as the other, and is to be preferred for that reason, as conforming to our general policy."

If the language of the will manifests an intent that the distribution shall be per stirpes it must of course prevail. Vincent v. Newhouse, 83 N. Y. 505; Ricks v. Williams, 16 N. C. 3; Henderson v. Womack, 41 N. C. 437; Hamlett v. Hamlett, 12 Leigh (Va.) 350. In Ferr v. Pyne, 81 N. Y. 281, it appeared that a will provided as follows: "I wish the same to be divided equally between Anita, the children of Irene, the son of Isabel, and Henry, the doctor." The court said: "In Powell on Devises (vol. 2, p. 331), it is said that where a gift is made to a person described as standing in a certain relation to the testator, and to the children of another person standing in the same relation, as to my brother A., and the children of my brother B., A. only takes a share equal to one of the children of B., and this position is abundantly sustained by the authority of English cases (Blackler v. Webb, 2 P. Wms. 383; Dowding v. Smith, 3 Beav. 541; Lenden v. Blackmore, 10 Sim. 626, among others), and to some extent by the courts of this country. Yet if the case stood upon the words of the residuary clause alone, we should find great difficulty in confirming, by the sanction of this court, a construction opposed to the apparent meaning of the language used by the testator, and at variance with the natural disposition of mankind. We find the testator calling to mind his children, their names, their relations to others by marriage, the death of some, and with these incidents before him making a distribution of his estate. The living children are named by him, while the children of the daughters who are dead spoken of not by name, but 'as the son of Isabel,' or 'the children of Irene,' evidently giving to them the place as recipients of his bounty which Isabel or Irene, if living, would have filled. He designates the children of Irene as a class, and not as individuals, remembers them not in their own persons, but as representatives of their parent, and substitutes them in her place. We are unable to discover any intent to bestow upon them any greater or more numerous marks of his affection than their parent would, if living, have received. The rule referred to has, in modern times, been applied with reluctance, by some courts, because it had become a rule of property, and by others out of deference to its supposed authority; but in many, if not in all cases, with open protest, while by others it has been wholly rejected. (Minter's Appeal 40 Pa. St. 111; Raymond v. Hillhouse [Conn.] 19 Alb. L. J. 523.) It is, however, not necessary for us to go to that extent, because wherever the rule is adopted it is also held that it is to be governed by the context, and as is said will yield 'to a very faint glimpse of a different intention.' (2 Jarman on Wills [1st Am. ed.] 111; marg. 112; Clark v. Lynch, 46 Barb. (N. Y.) 69; Collins v. Hoxie, 9 Paige (N. Y.) 81; Brett v. Horton, 5 Jur. (Eng.) 696; Roper on Legacies, 159; Lockhart v. Lockhart, 56 N. C. 205; Baleom v. Haynes, 14 Allen (Mass.) 204.) If, therefore, from any portion of the will an intention can be discovered that the children of the deceased daughter are to take as a class, and not as individuals, that intention must prevail, notwithstanding the rule of construction to which we have adverted. It may, we think, be found in the preceding clause of the will, and is fairly to be deduced from the words, 'To the children of Irene fifty thousand dollars.' This is plainly a bequest to those persons as a class, in their representative capacity, and the sum named goes to them as a body, and when we find the same language used in respect to the same persons, in the residuary clause, 'the children of Irene,' as recipients of a share of a single sum, the surplus, we conclude that the testator used the words in the last clause with the same signification, and to the same intent as in the first." In Roome v. Counter, 6 N. J. L. 111, 10 Am. Dec. 390, a distribution per stirpes was held to be required by the following provision: "Item, it is my will that all the remainder of my movable estate shall be equally divided: that is to say, Henry Counter, and the heirs of my son Peter Counter, Anna Roome, Susannah Berry, Elizabeth Dodd and Sarah Counter."

BROTHERS OR SISTERS AND NEPHEWS OR NIECES.

A bequest to be divided equally among named brothers or sisters of the testator and the unnamed children of a deceased brother or sister is to be distributed per capita. Atkinson v. Bartrum, 28 Beav. 219, 54 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 349; Howard v. Howard, 30 Ala. 391; Purvey v. Edmondson, 4 Heisk. (Tenn.) 43; Follansbee v. Follensbee, 7 App. Cas. (D. C.) 282; Maddox v. State, 4 Har. & J. (Md.) 539; Lee v. Lee, 39 Barb. (N. Y.) 172. Compare Stow v. Ward, 12 N. C. 67. In Lee v. Lee, supra, it was said: "Had the testator said, 'I give to my brother' and to the children of his brother and sister, naming each of them as a legatee, and added 'in equal proportions, share and share alike,' there would be no doubt of the right of each of the children to an equal share. The mere grouping of the children of Ellen under that title, instead of naming them individually, does not alter the rights of each."

However, a contrary view has been expressed. Raymond v. Hillhouse, 45 Conn. 467, 29 Am. Rep. 688; Henry v. Thomas, 118 Ind. 23, 20 N. E. 519. In Lachland v. Downing, 11 B. Mon. (Ky.) 32, a division per stirpes was upheld, but that case was said in Purnell v. Culbertson, 12 Bush (Ky.) 369, to have been governed by the peculiar language of the bequest. In White v. Holland, 92 Ga. 216, 18 S. E. 17, the language of a will was held to show an intention that the distribution should be per stirpes.

WIFE AND CHILDREN.

By a bequest to be divided equally between the wife and children of the testator the beneficiaries take per capita. Lord v. Moore, 20 Conn. 122; Morgan v. Pettit, 3 Dem. (N. Y.) 61; Seabury v. Brewer, 53 Barb. (N. Y.) 662; Hick's Estate, 134 Pa. St. 507, 19 Atl. 705. In Seabury v. Brewer, 53 Barb. (N. Y.) 662, it appeared that a will contained the following provision: "I wish my person and real estate to be appropriated equally to the benefit of my wife Emily H. Brewer, and of my children, Seabury Doane Brewer and Florence Kipp Brewer." The court said: "We regard the law too well settled to admit of a reasonable doubt, in regard to the construction which this provision of said will should receive, in determining the rights of the respective parties in the division of said estate. It is very clear that the parties named take per capita and not per stirpes, and therefore each is entitled to one third of the residue of the estate after the dower interest of the widow, Emily H. Brewer, is satisfied."

Gift to Named Persons of Two or More Classes.

Where a devise is given to several persons each designated by name, to be divided equally among them, the division is to be per capita though the beneficiaries belong to two or more classes or are related to the testator in different degrees. Duffee v. Buchanan, 8 Ala. 27; Almand v. Whitaker, 113 Ga. 889; 39 S. E. 395; Wells v. Newton, 4 Bush. (Ky.) 158; Seabury v. Brewer, 53 Barb. (N. Y.) 662. And see the reported case. "Whenever property is devised to children and grandchildren, or to brothers and sisters and nephews and nieces, to be equally divided between them, and the devisees are individually named, they take per capita and not per stirpes." Doe v. Roe, 2 Har. (Del.) 103, 29

Am. Dec. 336. So in Hardy v. Roach, 190 Mass. 223, 76 N. E. 720, it was said: "The clause in question distinctly describes the legatees by their respective names, and plainly says that the property shall be equally divided between them; and we see nothing in the method of division into paragraphs, or in the other framework of the clause, to indicate that this language is to be taken in any other than its ordinary meaning. It is plain that the legatees take per capita."

Of course a plainly expressed design of the testator to divide the beneficiaries into classes and give the estate to them per stirpes will prevail even over the presumption from their designation by name. Randolph v. Bond, 12 Ga. 362; Hoxton v. Griffith, 18 Grat. (Va.) 574.

In Huston v. Crook, 38 Ohio St. 328, the court held that a bequest to several persons was to be distributed per capita in view of a previous naming of the beneficiaries. It was said: "By the 14th and 15th items of his will, the testator directs that the proceeds of his personal estate be divided, 'equally, share and share alike, between all my aforesaid heirs.' At the time these words were used and when the will took effect, he had children, and three grandchildren, the heirs of a deceased daughter. In the preceding clauses of the will, these children and grandchildren were each named, and he gave to each a specific legacy. None of these were heirs in the strict legal sense, as he was then living, but each was an heir apparent, and each would have been an heir, had he died intestate. Hence the phrase, 'all my aforesaid heirs,' was used to expressly include all such as were in fact heirs apparent. These residuary clauses of the will, did not direct a division among 'all his children,' or 'all his sons and daughters' but 'between all his aforesaid heirs.' There is nothing found elsewhere in the provisions of this will, to warrant us in limiting this comprehensive expression to part only of his heirs. To hold that this phrase includes some of the heirs and excludes others, would do violence to the well-settled rule of construction, that the intention of the testator must be discovered from the words used, in connection with the other provisions of the will. The explicit direction that this division should be made 'equally share and share alike,' entitles these grandchildren to take per capita, and not per stirpes. Had this direction as to the equality been omitted, a different result might have been reached in accordance with the judgment of the district court, and in harmony with numerous well considered cases, but the testator has left nothing for construction on this point. Each is to have an equal share."

CONSOLIDATED LIGHTING COMPANY ET AL.

Vermont Supreme Court—January 28, 1914.

87 Vt. 411; 89 Atl. 635.

Eminent Domain — Requisites of Proceeding — Impartial Tribunal.

The questions of necessity for condemning land and due compensation must ultimately be determined by an impartial tribunal proceeding on due notice to interested parties and hearing before deciding, but not acting unreasonably or arbitrarily.

Origin and Scope of Power.

The only application of the doctrine of eminent domain at common law was the exercise by the sovereign of the prerogative right to take and enter upon lands in the defense of the realm.

Same.

The exercise of such sovereign power as the laying waste of one's own country to compel the retreat of a public enemy or the taking of land for fortifications, etc., is not an application of the power of eminent domain, but is referable rather to the war power.

Delegation to Commission — Validity.

The question of the necessity for taking property by eminent domain is a judicial question which must be determined by a court or some quasi judicial tribunal designated by statute, and Acts 1908, No. 116, § 13, providing that whenever it is necessary, to meet the reasonable requirements of service to the public, that any company, such as a lighting company, should cross another's lands with poles and wires, and it cannot agree with the owner as to the matter of necessity or of compensation, it may petition the Public Service Commission, which shall then, upon due notice to all parties in interest, determine the question of necessity, and compensation, and render a judgment which shall be final except as an appeal to the Supreme Court is allowed, is not unconstitutional for authorizing the commission to determine the questions of necessity and compensation.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Acts 1908, No. 116, § 13, providing that whenever it is necessary to meet the service requirements of a public service corporation, such as a lighting company, that it should cross another's land with wires, etc., and it cannot agree with the owner as to questions of necessity or compensation, it may petition the Public Service Commission, which shall, upon due notice to all parties in interest, determine such questions and render a judgment, which shall be final, except as an appeal is allowed to the Supreme Court, is not unconstitutional for empowering the commission to render "judgment" on the ground that it is an administrative body; the word being used in a comprehensive sense which will include the findings and determination of such a body.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Acts 1908, No. 116, § 13, providing that if a public service corporation, such as a lighting company, cannot agree with the landowner as to the necessity of taking land for public purposes or as to compensation, it may petition the Public Service Commission, which shall, upon notice, determine the questions of the necessity and compensation and render judgment, is applicable in proceedings by a lighting company, the charter of which as amended by Acts 1902, No. 202, § 3, provided a constitutional method for the exercise of the power of eminent domain granted thereby.

[See note at end of this case.]

Judicial Power after Condemnation by Commission.

The courts will enforce and protect the rights of the landowner and of the public service corporation condemning land for placing lighting wires, etc., under Acts 1908, No. 116, § 13, after the Public Service Commission has found in favor of condemnor and awarded compensation.

Original petition for writ of prohibition. Jennie George, petitioner, and Consolidated Lighting Company et al., petitioners. The facts are stated in the opinion. PETITION DISMISSED.

Theriault & Hunt for petitioner.

Robert C. Bacon and Senter & Senter for petitionees.

[413] HASELTON, J.—This is a petition for a writ of prohibition to stop proceedings pending before the Public Service Commission. Such proceedings were for the taking, in the exercise of the power of eminent domain, of lands of this petitioner, Jennie George, for the purpose of the construction of a transmission line by the erection of poles and the stringing of wires. The proceedings were brought by the defendant, the Consolidated Lighting Company, before the Public Service Commission of this State under § 13 of No. 116 of the Laws of 1908. The defendants, other than the Lighting Company, make up the Public Service Commission.

Some questions discussed in the briefs were expressly waived in open Court, and on the hearing it was agreed that there were but two questions in the case.

1. Is the section 13, above referred to, constitutional?

2. If it is constitutional does it apply to the case of a Public Service Corporation with a Charter, granted prior to the general law of which the section in question is a part, providing a constitutional method of exercising the right of eminent domain.

Section 13, of No. 116, Acts of 1908, provides that whenever it is necessary in order to meet the reasonable requirements of service to the public that any company, of a class to which this Lighting Company belongs, should cross the lands of any person with pipe lines, conduits, or lines of poles and wires, and the company cannot agree with the owner of the lands as to the matter of necessity or of compensation it may prefer a petition to the Public Service Commission, and that the Commission shall then, upon due notice to all parties in interest, determine the questions of necessity and compensation and render a judgment which shall be final, except as an appeal to the [414] Supreme Court is allowed from the order or decrees of the commission.

No claim is made in this case that the use for which the statute authorizes private property to be taken is not a public one within the meaning of the constitutional provision relating to the matter of eminent domain. But it is claimed by the petitioner that the provision for the determination of the facts of necessity and due compensation in a particular case is unconstitutional.

We go a long way with the petitioner in her argument as to constitutional requirements in those regards. Such facts must ultimately be determined by an impartial tribunal proceeding on due notice to all parties in interest, hearing before deciding, basing its conclusion upon matters properly before it, and not acting unreasonably and arbitrarily. Wheeler v. Barre, 73 Vt. 281, 50 Atl. 1086, 58 L.R.A. 240, 87 Am. St. Rep. 721; Lynch v. Rutland, 66 Vt. 570, 29 Atl. 1015; LaFarrier v. Hardy, 66 Vt. 200, 28 Atl. 1030; Farnsworth v. Goodhue, 48 Vt. 209.

Our later holdings are that where the Legislature delegates to private corporations affected with a public interest the power of eminent domain by way of what has been called "a roving franchise" the necessity for its exercise in a particular case and with respect to particular property must exist or such exercise will be invalid; and the necessity and its extent must be determined by an impartial tribunal.

Since such corporations although affected with a public interest are organized for private gain, if they are to judge of the necessity of a taking in a particular case and of the extent of the necessity, they are made judges in matters in which their private and pecuniary interests are involved. If tribunals may reap profit from their decisions they might as well be paid in money as in lands. The evil which our decisions combat is not of the subtle kind which baffles detection.

To leave one to be a judge in his own case and to say that his decision of facts must stand unless it can be affirmatively shown that he acted unreasonably or in bad faith or abused the [415] power conferred is contrary to every principle of justice. All experience shows that one may act honestly and in good faith and yet, if his private interest is involved in the matter before him, may arrive at conclusions at which an impartial man would not arrive.

To say that the function in question is a legislative or political one is to make no progress.

When the Legislature acts directly in such a matter, as it sometimes though rarely does, it acts as an impartial body, and when it delegates the power to take, it is bound to provide an impartial tribunal for the ultimate determination of the questions upon which the power to take depends.

This delegation of power is, in the case of most private corporations affected with a public interest, in the nature of a valuable concession. And when the power conferred is a general power to take so far as necessity requires, the necessity and extent of the taking ought in decent observance of fundamental principles to be determined by an impartial tribunal.

The Law Quarterly Review, a periodical edited by Sir Frederick Pollock, has in its number for July, 1910, a very timely article on the subject we are now considering. The writer of the article says, and we can only quote here and there: "Assuming these powers are exercised in the best possible faith it does not require a cynical turn of mind to foresee that disputes are bound to arise. Most questions have two sides to them. . . . This decision (referring to a specific case) is particularly instructive as showing the case with which an informal tribunal, which disregards the ordinary safeguards of justice, can run off the rails, and with the best possible intention nevertheless go hopelessly wrong. . . . It used also to be thought that judicial and political duties do not harmonize in the same individual, and that a man who takes upon himself the former should lay aside the latter. But if this is obsolete it must still be true that a man shall not be judge in his own cause. Yet a government official, whose duty it is to secure the smooth working of an act as much as to see that rights thereunder are accurately adjusted, may go straight from an acrimonious correspondence with a party to the seat of judgment."

This writer speaks of "leaving the economic question of the access to lands" to a partisan and 'interested tribunal as of a fact which needs only to be stated to be condemned.

[416] We are told that proceedings for a taking of property by the power of eminent domain were at common law inquisitorial and ex parte. But our constitution intended to provide that they should not be inquisitorial and ex parte. In the orderly administration of constitutional government inquisitorial and ex parte measures may be taken for the institution of proceedings but not for their determination. Our Constitution of 1777 was the first to contain a provision respecting the taking of private property for public use, for while in the main we copied the Pennsylvania Constitution of 1776, the provision referred to was not found therein.

By our constitutional provision the right to take for public uses was recognized, but was limited to the requirements of necessity and carried with it the right of the owner to due compensation. Though many courts put upon constitutional provisions similar to our provision, though in general less specific than it, a different construction from that which we put upon our provision, we are content to abide by the doctrine hereinbefore stated.

In the discussion of the doctrine of eminent domain rather too much is said about the common law. The phrase itself was not known to the common law nor was the doctrine itself in any other application of it than was found in the exercise by the sovereign of the prerogative right to enter upon lands for the defence of the realm. Atty.-Gen. v. Tamlane (1879) 12 Ch. D. (Eng.) 214.

To concede that at common law the doctrine was in embryo is to make an abundant concession.

While the common law was developing English Government was asserting its rights to defend its existence at all hazards. But the granting of the power of eminent domain to a private corporation organized for the purpose of gain as a valuable concession on the ground that the corporation will be of service to the public as well as to its stockholders is a modern device finding its justification in modern conditions, and to be exercised in accordance with sound principles of economy and sociology, and to be safeguarded by fundamental principles.

References are also frequently made to Grotius, Vattel, Puffendorf, and other continental publicists none of whom wrote anything fairly applicable to the concession of the power of [417] eminent domain to private corporations affected with a public interest.

Vattel recognizes the right of expropriation only so far as its exercise is required by the public safety, Vattel, Law of Nations, § 244.

Puffendorf is quoted as saying that the eminent domain is something that some are afraid of more on account of the name than the thing. But writers upon eminent domain do not often quote what he further says that the power can rightfully be exercised only in the extremities of the state, illustrating his meaning by reference to the necessities of fortifications and sieges and, in dire extremities, "of rifling private men's coffers," and laying waste one's own country to compel the retreat of an enemy.

Puffendorf, Book VIII, Division VII, pp. 681 and 682 of the English Translation, Edition of 1710.

To the same effect writes Burlamaqui. 2 Natural and Politic Law, Nugent's Translation, 211.

Such exercises of the sovereign power of the state are not properly referable to the power of eminent domain but to the war power and allied powers of sovereignty, much as the right to destroy private property in the exigencies of flood and fire is referred to the police power rather than to the power of eminent domain. Aitken v. Wells River, 70 Vt. 308, 40 Atl. 829, 41 L.R.A. 566, 67 Am. St. Rep. 672.

The systematical writers of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, above referred to, were contemplating, not the beneficial purposes contemplated by the law of eminent domain as we understand it. Such purposes were foreign to their discussions. They were considering rather the application in a strict sense of the maxim "The Public Safety is the Supreme Law."

But we cannot accede to the claim made by the petitioner that under our Constitution the questions of necessity and compensation must be determined by the judicial department of the government, by a body which in the strict sense is a court.

If an impartial tribunal is provided for the determination of the questions of necessity and compensation and the provisions with respect to notice and hearing and decision upon evidence and the judicial determination of questions of law are all provided for, the constitution is satisfied, and due process of law is accorded although the determination of facts is left [418] to a body not strictly a court but to an administrative body exercising quasi-judicial functions. Such a body is our Public Service Commission. Sabre v. Rutland R. Co. 86 Vt. 347, Ann. Cas. 1915C

In a note to Lynch v. Forbes, 42 Am. St. Rep. 402, a Massachusetts case, 161 Mass. 302, 37 N. E. 437, it is said by Freeman, or one of his associates in criticism of the principal case that "where the Legislature has only authorized the taking of such property as is necessary, the question of the necessity for taking is a judicial one which must be determined either by a court, a jury or some quasi-judicial tribunal designated in the statute." It is there said that this rule is established by an almost overwhelming preponderance of authorities. That it is so established we doubt, but that the rule is a sound one and the only one that accords with the usual constitutional requirements we confidently reaffirm.

The view here taken is not inconsistent with the holding in Stearns v. Barre, 73 Vt. 281, 50 Atl. 1086, 58 L.R.A. 240, 87 Am. St. Rep. 721. The decision there is that the necessity of the taking and the extent of the necessity cannot be left to the final determination of the interested party instituting the proceedings. The principle applied is that no man can be judge in his own cause, a principle which applies whether the "cause" is strictly a judicial one or not, that the final determination of questions between parties must be by an impartial tribunal. As the applicable law then stood there was no such tribunal provided or contemplated. The opinion sometimes speaks of the necessity of an "impartial tribunal" and sometimes of the necessity of a "judicial tribunal," but the two phrases are to be construed in the same sense. The expressions used in the opinion are to be construed with reference to the facts of the case and the state of the law as it then was, and it would be a perversion of a sound legal principle to give to expressions, then incapable of being misunderstood, a meaning which would condemn as unconstitutional subsequent legislation not, of course, foreseen or contemplated by the court, on the ground that the impartial tribunal provided by such legislation was not a judicial tribunal in the full and strict sense although clothed with quasi-judicial functions.

It is not to be understood that an impartial commission provided by the Legislature, determining facts after due notice [419] and upon legal evidence, and so exercising quasi-judicial functions, does not meet the requirements of the constitution, as much as a commission appointed by the court to determine and report facts. The report of either commission is under the control of the court to the same extent. Bacon v. Boston, etc. R. Co. 83 Vt. 421, 76 Atl. 128; Bacon v. Boston, etc. R. Co. 83 Vt. 528, 77 Atl. 858; Sabre v. Rutland R. Co. 86 Vt. 347, Ann. Cas. 1915C 1269, 85 Atl. 693.

As to the right of a party aggrieved by an order or "judgment" of the Public Service Commission to resort to the courts, we repeat in substance what was said in the Sabre case, that if a party pursues the orderly and not burdensome course pointed out by the statute he may present to this Court the questions of the rulings of the commission in receiving or excluding evidence the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings under the rule that a mere scintilla of evidence will not sustain a finding and the sufficiency of the findings to warrant an order under the rule that the order must not be unreasonable or arbitrary in its character and that the powers given to this Court on appeal are supplemented by common law remedies so as to secure to every party interested in the action of the commission a vindication of his full rights against arbitrary and unreasonable action, usurpation of powers and acts in excess of authority.

The functions of the Public Service Commission, and its impartial character, considered in connection with the supervisory power of the courts, render it not only eminently fit but unobjectionable on constitutional grounds that it should be entrusted with the determination of the questions which it is authorized to determine by the legislation now under consideration.

That the railroad commissioners may be legally substituted by the Legislature for commissioners appointed by a court or by judges thereof to act in respect to the appraisal of damages for a taking in the exercise of eminent domain was decided in Stimets v. Highgate, 81 Vt. 231, 69 Atl. 878, where it is said of sec 4, of No. 125, Acts of 1906, that "the railroad commissioners take the place, certainly in respect to the appraisal of damages, of the commissioners provided by V. S. 3814 (P. S. 4398), and this completes the process of taking land under this act, when the taking is by the railroad corporation, and constitutes due process of law, for every one is given an opportunity to be heard on all questions in which they are interested."

[420] In that case it is noted that the appeal to this Court had been substituted for an appeal to the court of chancery, a matter since fully discussed and decided, Central Vermont R. Co. v. State, 82 Vt. 145, 72 Atl. 324. In the Stimets case it was held that the method of taking provided by the act did not apply to a taking by towns simply because the Legislature had not made it so applicable.

Courts that differ with us as to the character of the question of necessity are agreed that the question of compensation must ultimately be left to an impartial tribunal; but they do not hold that for that reason the matter must be determined by the judiciary department. Backus v. Fort St. Union

Depot Co. 169 U. S. 569, 570, 42 U. S. (L. ed.) 853, 18 S. Ct. 445; U. S. v. Jones, 109 U. S. 513, 519, 27 U. S. (L. ed.) 1015, 3 S. Ct. 346.

The proceeding for the ascertainment of value says the Supreme Court of the United States "may be prosecuted before commissioners or special boards or the courts, with or without the intervention of a jury, as the legislative power may designate. All that is required is that it shall be conducted in some fair and just manner with opportunity to the owners of the property to present evidence as to its value, and to be heard thereon." U. S. v. Jones, 109 U. S. 513, 519, 3 S. Ct. 346, 27 U. S. (L. ed.) 1015.

It is claimed by the petitioner that the section of the statute in question, Sec. 13, No. 116, of the Acts of 1908, is unconstitutional because it empowers the Public Service Commission to render "judgment" in the matter of necessity and compensation and that it cannot render judgment since it is an administrative body. But this objection raises no serious question. The findings, decisions, and determinations of the commission may well enough be called judgments.

The word "judgment" as here used, is to be given a comprehensive rather than a narrow and technical meaning, is to be given a meaning with comports with a constitutional purpose.

The question remaining in the case is whether the general statutory provision under consideration, enacted in 1908, is applicable in view of the fact that the charter of the defendant Lighting Company, as amended in 1902, conferred upon it the power of eminent domain and provided an entirely constitutional method for the exercise of that power. Acts of 1902, 202, § 3.

[421] But the provision of the general law affects the remedy and the mode of procedure only and is not unconstitutional and is applicable. Backus v. Fort St. Union Depot Co. 169 U. S. 558, 18 S. Ct. 445, 42 U. S. (L. ed.) 853; Ames v. Lake Superior, etc. R. Co. 21 Minn. 241; McCrea v. Port Royal R. Co. 3 S. C. 381, 16 Am. Rep. 729; Baltimore, etc. R. Co. v. Nesbit, 10 How. 395, 13 U. S. (L. ed.) 469; Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Guthrie, 192 Ill. 579, 61 N. E. 658; Paterson, etc. Traction Co. v. DeGray, 70 N. J. L. 59, 56 Atl. 250.

The Lighting Company and any corporation with like rights is entitled to proceed before the Public Service Commission in the matter of eminent domain. Whether the general law in that regard supersedes and repeals constitutional charter provisions in force before the general law took effect, or whether the general law merely furnishes a concurrent method of procedure, it is not necessary to determine until some corporation entitled to proceed under the general law claims the right to proceed by virtue of a constitutional provision of a charter granted before the general law took effect. The importance of the question requires us to decline considering it until its consideration is necessary. The following cases illustrate the weight of the question and are referred to solely because they show the propriety of not discussing it till it is necessary to decide it. Central Vermont R. Co. v. State, 82 Vt. 146, 72 Atl. 324; Brattleboro Town School Dist. v. Brattleboro School Dist. No. 2, 72 Vt. 451, 48 Atl. 697; Brown v. U. S. 171 U. S. 631, 43 U. S. (L. ed.) 312, 19 S. Ct. 56; Rodgers v. U. S. 185 U. S. 83, 46 U. S. (L. ed.) 816, 22 S. Ct. 582; Marlor v. Philadelphia, etc. R. Co. 166 Pa. St. 524, 31 Atl. 255; Treacy v. Elizabethtown, etc. R. Co. 85 Ky. 270, 3 S. W. 168; Hunt v. Card, 94 Me. 386, 47 Atl. 921; State v. Jersey City, 54 N. J. L. 49, 22 Atl. 1052; Paterson, etc. Traction Co. v. DeGray, 70 N. J. L. 59, 56 Atl. 250; Norwich v. Johnson, 86 Conn. 151, 84 Atl. 727, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1024.

The question of the right of the commission to enforce its decision or orders or judgments by process does not arise. The decision of the commission if favorable to the condemnor determines his rights upon payment of the compensation awarded, and the right of the landowner to such compensation, and as in cases of condemnation heretofore arising, it is for the courts to enforce and protect the rights of both. Bridgman v. St. Johnsbury, etc. R. Co. 58 Vt. 198, 2 Atl. 467; Adams v. St. Johnsbury, etc. R. Co. 57 Vt. 240; Kittell v. Missisquoi R. Co. 56 Vt. 96; [422] Kendall v. Missisquoi R. Co. 55 Vt. 438; Knapp v. McAuley, 39 Vt. 275; McAulay v. Western Vermont R. Co. 33 Vt. 311, 78 Am. Dec. 627.

Our conclusion is that it is the right and duty of the Public Service Commission to proceed in the matter of the petition of the Consolidated Lighting Company, and upon due notice and hearing to determine the questions of necessity and compensation which they are therein asked to determine.

Petition for writ of prohibition dismissed with costs.

NOTE.

Validity of Statute Conferring on Public Service Commission or Other Body Jurisdiction of Eminent Domain Proceedings.

The reported case holds that a statute is valid which confers on a public service commission jurisdiction to determine the questions of necessity and compensation in eminent domain proceedings, and to render a judgment which shall be final except as an appeal to the supreme court of the state is allowed.

There does not seem to be any decided case exactly similar to the reported case in its facts, but the general rule laid down therein to the effect that the constitutional requirement that just compensation shall be paid for the taking of private land for public use is satisfied if an impartial tribunal is provided to which a citizen may freely resort and be heard at any time, finds support in a number of decisions. Bruggerman v. True, 25 Minn. 123; State v. Messenger, 27 Minn. 119, 6 N. W. 457; State v. Rapp, 39 Minn. 65, 33 N. W. 926; St. Paul v. Nickl, 42 Minn. 262, 44 N. W. 59; Morris v. Heppenheimer, 54 N. J. L. 268, 23 Atl. 664; People v. Adirondack R. Co. 160 N. Y. 225, 54 N. E. 689. See also U. S. v. Jones, 109 U. S. 513, 3 S. Ct. 346, 27 U. S. (L. ed.) 1015; Stimets v. Highgate, 81 Vt. 231, 69 Atl. 878. Thus it has been held that a statute which gives to county commissioners the right to hear property holders on the question of the damages sustained by them by the appropriation of their land for a highway, and which allows them the right to appeal to the district court within a specified time, is valid. State v. Messenger, supra. And where town supervisors are, in the first instance, constituted a tribunal to assess damages for the taking of land for a public road, with the right given to a property owner to appeal to county commissioners, the property holder is provided with an impartial tribunal. Bruggerman v. True, supra. So in St. Paul v. Nickl, supra, it was held that where provisions were made as to notice and an opportunity to be heard before a board of public works of a city, and the right of appeal was preserved, the constitutional rights of a property holder were secured in proceedings wherein private land was taken for public highway purposes. Likewise in Morris v. Heppenheimer, supra, wherein it appeared that the state took land for a military camp and appointed three commissioners to determine its value, it was held that the fact that the governor had appointed the commissioners did not impugn their impartiality.

In Peirce v. Banger, 105 Me. 413, 74 Atl. 1039, it was held that a statute which conferred on a board of municipal officers power to assess damages for the taking of property in eminent domain proceedings was not invalid on the ground that the officials did not constitute an impartial tribunal. The fact that an appeal was allowed from their decision to a court was said to bring the proceedings within the "just compensation" clause of the constitution.

A statute which confers power on a forest reserve board to take land by condemnation and provides that in case the board and the owner are unable to agree on the compensation the owner may appeal to the court of claims, which court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the question of the value of the lands, is valid and does not violate the constitutional clauses which provide for just compensation and due process of law in the taking of property for public use. People v. Adirondack R. Co. 160 N. Y. 225, 241, 54 N. E. 689. And where a statute which authorizes a city to take private property for wharf purposes leaves nothing to the final determination of the city officers and gives a right to a rehearing before an impartial tribunal on every question in which a property owner may be interested, the due process of law guaranteed him by the constitution is satisfied. Burlington v. Central Vermont R. Co. 82 Vt. 5, 71 Atl. 826. But in Stearns v. Barre, 73 Vt. 281, 50 Atl. 1086, 87 Am. St. Rep. 721, 58 L.R.A. 240, it was held that an impartial tribunal was not provided where city officials were made the final judges in the taking of private land by the municipality for a waterworks.

A statute which empowers a town council to determine the compensation to be paid to a property owner for the taking of his land for street purposes and allows an appeal from their decision to a resident judge of the county for the purpose of having a commission of five freeholders appointed finally to pass on the question of damages, is not unconstitutional as a violation of the due process of law and just compensation clauses of the federal and state constitutions. Fulton v. Dover, 8 Houst. (Del.) 78, 6 Atl. 633, 12 Atl. 394, 31 Atl. 974.

In People v. Hennessy, 206 N. Y. 750, 100 N. E. 407, it appeared that an act authorized and empowered the board of assessors of a city in its discretion to estimate and determine the damage sustained by reason of the construction of a bridge. It was held that although the action of the board, if it should reject a claim, would be final and conclusive, yet in the matter of the award of damages its action was reviewable and therefore that the act was constitutional.

It has been held that due process of law is accorded a property owner whose land has been taken for a public use where a board of supervisors assesses his damages under a statute empowering it to do so. Kimball v. Alameda County, 46 Cal. 19. See also Harper v. Richardson, 22 Cal. 251; Lincoln v. Colusa County, 28 Cal. 662. But an order of a board of supervisors which declares that a newly extended street, as extended, embracing all the land included in the boundaries described, "is hereby condemned, appropriated, acquired, set apart, and taken for public use," has been held to be an exercise of judicial power not conferred by any statute and in a manner which no statute can authorize and therefore is in excess of the jurisdiction of the board. Wulzen v. San Francisco, 101 Cal. 15, 35 Pac. 353, 40 Am. St. Rep. 17.

In Ligat v. Com. 19 Pa. St. 456, it was held that though by the repeal of an act which allowed an appeal from the decision of canal commissioners to a board of appraisers the former were by statute constituted the final tribunal for the assessment of compensation to the owner of property taken for canal purposes, the statute was valid, since an assessment by the canal commissioners was as fully authorized by the constitution as was an assessment by any other tribunal.

It has been held that an act is not open to attack as unconstitutional on the ground that it attempts to give to county commissioners judicial powers, where it empowers the commissioners to appoint appraisers to assess the damages and benefits to lands affected by a proposed canal, as the appointment of appraisers is not exclusively a judicial act. Flat Swamp, etc. Canal Co. v. McAlister, 74 N. C. 159.

Where a statute authorized a city to take private property for street purposes and the city appointed commissioners to lay out the highways and assess damages for the taking, it was held that the statute was valid, there being a provision for an appeal within a reasonable time from the decision of the commissioners to a trial by jury. Steuart v. Baltimore, 7 Md. 500.

Where a legislative act appoints three persons commissioners to locate and establish a state road between certain points, and provides that "all damages sustained by the laying out and opening of said road shall be ascertained and determined by said commissioners, or a majority of them, and shall be paid by the county in which such damages occur," but makes no provision for notice and a hearing, on the right to appeal to the district court, the act is unconstitutional. Langford v. Ramsey County, 16 Minn. 375.

A statute has been held to be unconstitutional which attempted to transfer land to a borough for school purposes and which fixed the compensation for the transfer. Lebanon School-Dist. v. Lebanon Female Seminary, 9 Sad. (Pa.) 474, 22 W. N. C. 65, 12 Atl. 857.

In Myer v. Adam, 63 App. Div. 540, 71 N. Y. S. 707, affirmed 169 N. Y. 605, 62 N. E. 1098, it was held that in view of a constitutional provision to the effect that compensation for the taking of private property for public use should be ascertained by a jury or at least three commissioners appointed by a court, a board of grade crossing commissioners did not have exclusive and final jurisdiction to fix the compensation to which a property owner was entitled for the damages to his property due to the grading of a street.

In Rich v. Chicago, 59 Ill. 286, it appeared that a board of public works and the common council of a city were given the power, by its charter, to assess damages in eminent domain proceedings. In an action wherein the constitutionality of the charter provisions was attacked, the court said that if the question was a new one it would have great difficulty in reconciling the taking of private property for public use without ascertaining the compensation through the machinery furnished by the judicial department of the government, but as an earlier decision (Johnson v. Joliet, etc. R. Co. 23 Ill. 124) had held the provisions to be valid and they had been acted on to such an extent that its overruling would be attended by disastrous results and as a new constitution provided for a trial by jury in eminent domain cases, the court would apply the doctrine of stare decisis and not hold the provisions unconstitutional.

STATE

v.

PITT.

North Carolina Supreme Court—March 11, 1914.

166 N. Car. 268; 80 S. E. 1060.

Indictment — Validity — Prosecutor Member of Grand Jury.

That the foreman of the grand jury was the prosecutor, and swore out a complaint against accused, is not ground for quashing an indictment against him, where the foreman retired from the jury room, and did not discuss the case with the grand jury, nor vote on passing the bill.

[See note at end of this case.]

Witnesses — Competency — Children.

Whether witnesses, respectively 11 and 12 years old, were of sufficient age and capacity to testify is to be determined by the trial court, and such determination is not reviewable on appeal.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A finding that a witness, 11 years old, who testified that if he swore to a lie they would put him in jail, that he intended to tell the truth, and was going to tell what he knew, and a witness, 12 years old, who testified that he had never been in court before, that when he kissed the book it meant that he would tell the truth, and that if he should tell a lie they would put him in the lockup, were competent witnesses, is conclusive as to their competency, both as to their moral and religious sensibility and their intelligence.

[See note at end of this case.]

Larceny — Evidence — Relation of Accused and Prosecutor.

In a prosecution against an employee for larceny of his employer's corn, evidence that the employee was trusted with property of his employer is outside the issues.

Criminal Law — Instructions — Definition of Reasonable Doubt.

An instruction that a reasonable doubt in the jury box is exactly the same kind of reasonable doubt that an honest man meets up with in human life is not error.

[See generally 48 Am. St. Rep. 566.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt county: WHEDBEE, Judge.

Criminal action. Willis Pitt convicted of larceny and appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Julius Brown for appellant.

Attorney-General Bickett and Assistant Attorney-General Calvert for appellee.

[268] CLARK, C. J.—The defendant was convicted of larceny of the corn of one J. R. Bunting, standing in the field. The testimony came from eye-witnesses and was clear and explicit. The first exception is to the refusal of the court to quash the bill of indictment on the ground that said Bunting, who was foreman [269] of the grand jury that passed on the bill, was also the prosecutor and swore out the warrant before a justice of the peace. The court found as a fact that Bunting at the time that the grand jury was considering the bill retired from the grand jury room and did not discuss the case with the grand jury nor vote on passing the bill, and that he did nothing in regard to it except that as foreman of the grand jury he signed the bill at the direction of the grand jury and carried the indictment into court.

"The general rule has been laid down that interest in a particular prosecution other than a direct pecuniary interest will not disqualify a grand juror or be ground of objection to an indictment in the finding of which he participates. Accordingly, in the absence of statutory provisions to the contrary, the fact that a person has originated a complaint against the person accused of crime, or is a witness for the prosecution, does not operate as a disqualification. And the same rule has been applied to a person who has evinced a desire and purpose to enforce the law against the particular kind of crime, or has subscribed funds for the purpose of legitimately suppressing a particular violation of law." 20 Cyc. 1301, title, "Grand Jury."

In State v. McDonald, 73 N. C. 356, it was 504, where there is a full discussion of objections to the competency of a grand jury, it is held that the fact that a son of the prosecutor was a member of the grand jury did not vitiate the indictment, though he had actively participated in finding the bill.

In State v. Sharp, 110 N. C. 604, 14 S. E. held that a grand juror was a competent witness on the trial of the defendant. Revisal, 3232, provides that grand juries shall return all bills of indictment in open court through the acting foreman, except in capital felonies, and it has been often held that an indictment need not necessarily be signed by any one. State v. Mace, 86 N. C. 668.

Exceptions 2 and 3 are to the ruling of the court that two witnesses, respectively 11 and 12 years old, were of sufficient age and capacity to testify. The competency of a witness to testify [270] is determined by the trial court, and is not reviewable on appeal. State v. Finger, 131 N. C. 781, 42 S. E. 820; State v. Perry, 44 N. C. 330; 40 Cyc. 2200.

One of these witnesses, 11 years old, testified that if he swore to a lie they would put him in jail; that he intended to tell the truth, and was going to tell what he knew. The other witness, 12 years old, testified that he had never been in court before; that when he kissed the book it meant that he would tell the truth; that if he should tell a lie they would put him in the lockup. When asked, "What else?" he replied, "I don't know, sir." The finding of the judge that these witnesses were competent to testify was conclusive, and not reviewable. This is so held both as to their moral and religious sensibility and their intelligence. State v. Manual, 64 N. C. 603; State v. Edwards, 79 N. C. 648.

Shaw v. Moore, 49 N. C. 25, is a very interesting discussion as to the disqualification of a witness on account of his religious belief. The Court there held that one who believed in the existence of a Supreme Being was a competent witness, though he did not believe that punishment would be inflicted in the world to come. In that case it would seem that the witnesses were of age. If it were open to us to review the findings of fact of his Honor as to the competency of these witnesses, it would seem that they gave very intelligent replies and a sense of their responsibility and intention to tell the truth, and that punishment would be awarded them should they fail to do so. The fact that one of the witnesses said he "did not know" what punishment would happen to him beyond imprisonment in jail should not disqualify him, in view of the other evidence showing his intelligence and sense of responsibility.

However, as already stated, the finding of the judge in such case is conclusive, and not reviewable by us. He sees the witnesses and can judge better of their intelligence and sense of responsibility than can possibly be transmitted to us on paper.

In Shaw v. Moore, supra, Pearson, J., said that "in the old cases it was held to be common law that no infidel (in which class Jews were included) could be sworn as a witness in the [271] courts of England." He then proceeds to say that the reason for this as given by my Lord Coke, "to say the least of it, is narrow-minded, illiberal, bigoted, and unsound." And adds that "Lord Hale, notwithstanding the opinion of Coke and the old cases, held that a Jew is a competent witness and may be sworn on the Old Testament, and such has ever since been taken to be the law." We know the Old Scriptures, which is the Hebrew Bible, do not teach a future life, and hence there is absent therefrom the doctrine of future rewards and punishments. Indeed, the New Testament teaches that "Life Eternal came through Jesus Christ." In the same case, Shaw v. Moore, supra, Pearson refers to Omychund v. Barker, 1 Atk. (Eng.) 21, as a great case, "for it relieved the common law from an error that was a reproach to it." In that case "a Gentoo, who did not believe in either Old or New Testament," was held to be a competent witness, though it did not appear "whether according to Gentoo religion rewards and punishments are to be in this world or the world to come. The decision was made without ascertaining how the fact was; so it must have been considered by the Court to be immaterial."

Judge Pearson further says that it was insisted on the argument that, however it was decided in Omychund v. Barker, it was otherwise under our statutory provisions prescribing the forms of oath. He says, as to this argument: "We think it manifest, by a perusal of the statute, that it was not intended to alter any rule of law, but the sole object was to prescribe forms adapted to the religious belief of the general mass of citizens, for the sake of convenience and uniformity."

The form of oath for witnesses now prescribed (Rev. 1496 (29), and 2360) simply requires the witness to swear that his evidence "shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." The provision in Revisal, 2354, as to the manner of swearing is, as Judge Pearson says, merely a form "adapted to the religious belief of the general mass of citizens for the sake of convenience and uniformity." Revisal, 2363 (enacted 1899, ch. 50), validated oaths therefore taken not in a manner prescribed by the laws of 1777, now Revisal, 2354.

[272] If such reply from one who is honestly ignorant of what will happen to him in another world shall render him incompetent to testify, not only the administration of justice will often be hindered, but unwilling witnesses can block needed investigations by professing like ignorance.

It was excepted that the defendant was not allowed to state that his employer trusted him with his property. This is not an issue in this cause. The question is not whether he was trusted by his employer, nor that he was unworthy of that confidence, but, Did he steal the corn of the prosecutor, as charged in the bill of indictment? It would not have been competent for the State to show that the defendant was not trusted, or was suspected by his employer. Nor is it competent for the defendant to testify that he was trusted.

Nor do we think it good ground of exception that the judge in his charge, in attempting to define what constitutes a reasonable doubt, said: "A reasonable doubt in the jury box is exactly the same kind of reasonable doubt that an honest man meets up with in human life." The law does not require that any particular formula shall be used in charging upon the doctrine of reasonable doubt. State v. Dobbins, 149 N. C. 465, 62 S. E. 635; State v. Brabham, 108 N. C. 793, 13 S. E. 217; State v. Matthews, 66 N. C. 106; State v. Oscar, 52 N. C. 305.

No error.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that an indictment is not vitiated by the fact that the person prosecuting the charge was foreman of the grand jury, it appearing that he retired from the room while the indictment was under discussion and took no part in finding it. The court also sustains the action of the trial judge in holding that two children, eleven and twelve years old respectively, were competent to testify. The effect on the validity of an indictment of the fact that the complainant or prosecutor was a member of the grand jury is discussed in the note to Krause v. State, Ann. Cas. 1912B 736. The competency of children as witnesses is considered at length in the notes to State v. Meyer as reported in 14 Ann. Cas 1 and 124 Am. St. Rep. 291.

MAYOR AND CITY COUNCIL OF BALTIMORE

v.

J. L. ROBINSON CONSTRUCTION COMPANY.

Maryland Court of Appeals—June 26, 1914.

123 Md. 660; 91 Atl. 632.

Public Contracts — Deposit with Bid — Effect of Withdrawing Bid.

Under Baltimore City Charter, as amended by Laws 1908, c. 163, providing that a contract for supplies or work shall be awarded to the lowest responsible bidder; that bids when filed shall be irrevocable; that each bid shall be accompanied by a certified check of $500; and that the successful bidder, failing to execute the contract and furnish a bond, shall forfeit his check as liquidated damages—one may not withdraw his bid, even before the opening of the bids, and so, being refused permission to do so, and refusing to sign the contract, on it being awarded him, he cannot recover the amount of his check.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Superior Court of Baltimore City: BOND, Judge.

Action by J. L. Robinson Construction Company, plaintiff, against Mayor and City Council of Baltimore, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Alexander Preston and S. S. Field for appellant.

Forrest Bramble and W. W. Lingenfelder for appellee.

[661] CONSTABLE, J.—This appeal involves the right of a bidder, for a municipal contract, to recover from the municipality the amount of money deposited at the time of submitting the bid, where the bidder requests the withdrawal of the proposal before the opening of the same by the municipal officers.

The facts upon which the declaration is based are uncontradicted, and from them it appears that the appellant acting through the Board of Awards advertised for proposals and bids to construct a school house in the City of Baltimore. That the appellee, among others, submitted a proposal for said construction and in compliance with the advertisement and the provisions of the City Charter filed therewith a certified check for five hundred dollars. On the day the bids were to be opened, and just before they were opened, the president of the appellee company stated to the board that he thought from the information he had gained from the other bidders present that he had made an error in his proposal, and requested to withdraw the same. He had learned that the amount of his bid was very much below that of the others, and so much lower that he felt assured a mistake had been made. The board refused to allow the bid to be withdrawn and proceeded to open all of the bids, whereupon it was found that the appellee's bid was the lowest by about fourteen thousand dollars. After the opening the board suggested to the representative of the appellee that he go over the estimate for the purpose of discovering where, if at all, the mistake was. It was found that in making up the general tabulation of the costs of the various items, including [662] the bids of the sub-contractors, that the amount for heating and ventilating had been put down at $952.13 while it should have been $11,952.13, the amount of the sub-contractor's bid, thus making the total of the bid $11,000 less than had been intended. The board, however, awarded the contract to the appellee, which refused to execute the formal contract. Whereupon the board declared the deposit forfeited and readvertised for bids. This suit was then instituted for a return of the five hundred dollars deposited.

The appellant demurred to the declaration, but the Court overruled the demurrer, and the rulings upon the prayers being in favor of the right of action, the appellant has brought this appeal from the judgment rendered against it. The rulings upon the demurrer and the prayers involve one and the same principle of law so they will be considered as a whole.

An Act of the Legislature regulates proposals for contracts with the City of Baltimore. Section 15 of the charter, as amended by Chapter 163 of the Acts of 1908, provides as follows:

"All bids made to the Mayor and City Council of Baltimore for supplies or work for any purposes whatever, unless otherwise provided in this article, shall be opened by a board, or a majority of them, consisting of the Mayor, who shall be President of the same; the Comptroller, City Register, City Solicitor, and the President of the Second Branch, which board, or majority of them, shall, after opening said bids, award the contract to the lowest responsible bidder. . . . Bids when filed shall be irrevocable. The successful bidder shall promptly execute a formal contract, to be approved, as to its form, terms and conditions by the City Solicitor, and he shall also execute and deliver to the Mayor a good and sufficient bond, to be approved by the Mayor, in the amount of the contract price. To all such bids there shall be attached a certified check of the bidder upon some clearing house bank, and the bidder who has had the contract awarded [663] to him, and who fails to promptly and properly execute the required contract and bond, shall forfeit said check. The said check shall be taken and considered as liquidated damages and not a penalty for failure of said bidder to execute said contract and bond. Upon the execution of said contract and bond by the successful bidder the said check shall be returned to him. The amount of said check shall be five hundred dollars, unless otherwise provided by ordinance, or an order or regulation of the department for whose use the bids are made and contract entered into. The checks of the unsuccessful bidders shall be returned to them after opening the bids and awarding the contract to the successful bidders."

In the face of these provisions can a bidder, refusing to execute a contract awarded to him for municipal work, force the return of his deposit? Or once having filed his proposal, can he withdraw it before the bid is accepted and recover his deposit?

It will be noticed that, in plain terms, the section directs that the bidder shall deposit a certified check to indemnify the city in case he, as the successful bidder, fails to execute the contract and furnish a bond; that bids when filed are irrevocable; and that the contract shall be awarded to the lowest responsible bidder. It certainly must be that there was the intention that these explicit directions should have some force and meaning. We must ascribe a reasonable construction to them or we render the statute a mere nullity. These provisions involve the preliminary steps to the making of the contract for the work to be done. These are the conditions which must be subscribed to by anyone who wishes to be in a position to get a contract with the city. They do not make the proposal and the acceptance the contract, but the formal contract is to be entered into later. They make plain to the bidder just what obligation he is entering upon when he submits a bid. He knows that his bid is irrevocable, but [664] he further knows that if he, for any reason, after his bid is accepted, does not want to enter into a contract the condition of his becoming a bidder obligates him expressly to reimburse the city to the extent of five hundred dollars damages. If the contract were made by the bid and acceptance the bidder then would be compelled to carry it out or be responsible for it, without a Court of Equity, for sufficient cause, should relieve him, by rescinding the contract.

Judge Dillon in his work on Municipal Corporations at Section 810 (5th ed.) expresses the meaning and effect of such a charter provision: "After the opening of the bids, the ascertainment of the lowest or most favorable bidder, and the adoption of a resolution that the contract be awarded to him does not make a completed contract between the municipality and the bidder, when the charter requires that all contracts relating to city affairs shall be in writing, or when the advertisement so specifies or when some further step remains to be taken . . . where a bidder accompanies his bid for the performance of a public work with the deposit of a certain sum, under an agreement to forfeit the sum deposited in case of his neglect or refusal to enter into the contract for the work, and without default on the part of the board, he fails to execute the contract he cannot recover back his deposit, and the board may declare the same forfeited."

And McQuillin on Municipal Corporations at section 1221, says: "Money accompanying a bid as security that the bidder will enter into a contract if his bid is accepted, cannot be recovered if the bidder fails to enter into the contract. The rule that Courts incline against forfeitures has no application to such a case, and the rule is never carried to the extent of relieving parties against the express terms of their own contract. A bidder has no right to withdraw his bid even before the bids are opened, nor have the municipal authorities the right to permit him to withdraw it."

[665] Also in 28 Cyc. 661: "A bidder has no right at law, nor have the municipal officers power to permit him to withdraw his bid and deposit."

In Wheaton Bldg. etc. Co. v. Boston, 204 Mass. 218, 90 N. E. 598, a contractor had filed a bid with the proper authorities to build a school house, and was required to file a deposit with his bid. Afterwards he found that he had made a mistake in his estimates and sued the City for the recovery of his deposit. This case is practically identical with the one at bar. The Massachusetts Court held that he could not recover his deposit and said on pages 222 and 223: "But it is plain that the statute contemplated some obligation on the part of the bidders, even though there was none on the part of the city. Statutes of 1890, Chapter 418, Section 5, provides that every proposal shall be accompanied . . . by a check or certificate of deposit for the faithful performance of such proposal." . . . This section must be given reasonable effect. It would be a nullity if it should be held that the bidder was at liberty to withdraw, without any liability, at any time before the formal contract, which alone could bind the city, was executed. The reasonable construction is to hold that the bidder is bound to stand by his proposal at least after its acceptance, and to the extent of his bond or deposit, but no further. If the case was free from statutory regulation, and it did not appear that a more formal contract was contemplated, the mere acceptance of the proposal would constitute a contract, and neither party could refuse to carry it out without becoming liable for all the damage sustained. The Legislature, perhaps in recognition of the hardships which might follow from requiring the bidder to be bound though the city was not, restricted the liability of the former to the extent of the deposit."

To the same effect is Robinson v. Board of Education, 98 Ill. App. 100, where the bidder asked, before the bids were opened, to withdraw his bid because a mistake had been made by him. Also the same ruling in Morgan [666] Park v. Gahan, 136 Ill. 523, 26 N. E. 1085; Turner v. Fremont, 170 Fed. 259, 95 C. C. A. 455; Davin v. Syracuse, 69 Misc. 285, 126 N. Y. S. 1002.

This may seem a hardship upon a bidder who has actually made a mistake, but if the statute is to have any effect that must be the result. The statute is an essential part of the proposal and the bidder makes all its terms and conditions an obligation upon himself by submitting a bid. While it may appear a hardship upon the bidder, the practical side, as illustrated by this record, of awarding contracts by closed bidding, shows it to be a wise provision for municipalities. After the bids were all in, and before the bids were opened, this appellee easily ascertained from his competitors the amounts of their bids. What would there then be to prevent a dishonest bidder, upon finding that his bid was extremely low, from declaring that he had made a mistake and thus put the city to the costs of delay and re-advertising?

The case of Moffett, etc. Co. v. Rochester, 178 U. S. 373, 20 S. Ct. 957, 44 U. S. (L. ed.) 1108, relied upon by the appellee, was upon a bill in equity for a reformation of the proposal and therefore is not authority for the form of action in this case. In fact, all of the cases, cited by the appellee, are cases in equity and in the most of them there was no statute involved.

Judgment reversed, without awarding a new trial, with costs to the appellant.

g. Tender of Contract Different from Bid, 431.

3. Deposit as Liquidated damages, 432.

III. Interest on Deposit, 433.

I. In General.

Where an invitation for bids requires each bid to be accompanied by a deposit, a bid may be rejected where it is not so accompanied. Compton v. Johnson, 6 Ohio Cir. Dec. 110, 9 Ohio Cir. Ct. 532; Philadelphia Metallic Co. v. Board of Public Grounds, etc. 16 Pa. Co. Ct. 431. See also Smith v. New York, 10 N. Y. 504; Walsh v. New York, 113 N. Y. 143, 20 N. E. 825; Selpho v. Brooklyn, 5 App. Div. 529, 39 N. Y. S. 520, affirmed in 158 N. Y. 673, 52 N. E. 1126; People v. Buffalo, 5 Misc. 36, 25 N. Y. S. 50.

But since the requirement that a deposit shall accompany the bid is intended to insure good faith on the part of the bidder and furnish protection to the party inviting the proposals in case the bidder refuses to execute a contract after a favorable award, it has been held to be no objection to the legality of a bid that it is not accompanied by a deposit, as required by law, if the contract is actually entered into. Cady v. San Bernardino, 153 Cal. 24, 94 Pac. 242; Tooele Bldg. Assoc. v. Tooele High School Dist. No. 1, 43 Utah 362, 134 Pac. 894. Compare Chippewa Bridge Co. v. Durand, 122 Wis. 85, 99 N. W. 603, 106 Am. St. Rep. 931.

A deposit made in substantial compliance with the terms of the requirement is sufficient. Hornung v. West New York, 82 N. J. L. 266, 81 Atl. 1116; People v. Contracting Board, 27 N. Y. 378; People v. McDonough, 173 N. Y. 181, 65 N. E. 963, affirming 76 App. Div. 257, 78 N. Y. S. 462. Thus the requirement that bidders on a contract for public improvement shall submit certified checks to the order of the town treasurer with their bids, has been held to be substantially fulfilled by the submission of a cashier's check on an accredited bank drawn to the order of the town and indorsed by the bidder. Hornung v. West New York, 82 N. J. L. 266, 81 Atl. 1116. And where a notice for proposals stated that every proposal must be accompanied by a certificate from some bank in good credit that four thousand dollars "in cash" had been deposited as security for the performance of the contract, the requirement was held to be met by a certificate that a deposit of four thousand dollars had been made but not specifying that it was "in cash." People v. Contracting Board, 27 N. Y. 378.

Where a bond must be deposited with a bid, and a defective bond is deposited by the successful bidder, the unsuccessful bidders cannot object that the successful bidder is allowed to perfect his bond after the opening of the bids. Detroit Free Press Co. v. State Auditors, 47 Mich. 135, 10 N. W. 171.

Where a statute requires, as a condition precedent to the reception of proposals that the bidder shall deposit a certified check with a department or some officer of the department, the requirement is not met by depositing the certified check in an "estimate box" kept by the officer, but the check should be deposited with the department or officer, and then the proposal placed in the estimate box. People v. Thompson, 11 N. Y. St. Rep. 730 note; Walsh v. New York, 55 Super. Ct. 535, 11 N. Y. St. Rep. 728.

A requirement that each bid should be accompanied by a deposit of $100,000.00 has been held not to be unreasonable where the contract called for an expenditure of $7,995,000.00. Flemming v. Jersey City (N. J.) 42 Atl. 845.

II. Forfeiture.

1. GENERAL RULE.

Where a bidder on a contract is required to deposit with his bid a certified check, cash, bond, or other security which is to be forfeited in case he refuses to enter into the contract after a favorable award, the general rule is that the deposit is forfeited by a refusal to accept the award and execute the contract. Turner v. Fremont, 170 Fed. 259, 95 C. C. A. 455, affirming 159 Fed. 221; Scott v. U. S. 44 Ct. Cl. 524; U. S. v. Title Guaranty, etc. Co. 36 App. Cas. (D. C.) 85; Morgan Park v. Gaham, 136 Ill. 515, 26 N. E. 1085; Robinson v. Board of Education, 98 Ill. App. 100; West Chicago Park Com'rs v. Carmody, 139 Ill. App. 635; Wheaton Bldg. etc. Co. v. Boston, 204 Mass. 218, 90 N. E. 598; Coonan v. Cape Girardeau, 149 Mo. App. 609, 129 S. W. 745; Phillips v. New York, 124 App. Div. 307, 108 N. Y. S. 1059; New York v. Seeley-Taylor Co. 149 App. Div. 98, 133 N. Y. S. 808; Davin v. Syracuse, 69 Misc. 285, 126 N. Y. S. 1002, affirmed in 145 App. Div. 904, 129 N. Y. S. 1119; Brown v. Levy, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 389, 69 S. W. 255. And see the reported case. See also Langley v. Harmon, 97 Mich. 347, 56 N. W. 761; Mutchler v. Easton, 148 Pa. St. 441, 23 Atl. 1109, 30 W. N. C. 94, reversing 9 Pa. Co. Ct. 613. Compare Cedar Rapids Lumber Co. v. Fisher, 129 Ia. 332, 105 N. W. 595, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 177; Wilson v. Baltimore, 83 Md. 203, 34 Atl. 774, 55 Am. St. Rep. 339; Mutchler v. Easton, 148 Pa. St. 441, 23 Atl. 1109, 30 W. N. C. 94. Thus where bids for a ferry franchise were required to be accompanied by a deposit to be forfeited in case, after a favorable award, the bidder refused to execute a lease, it was held that there could be no recovery of the deposit where the successful bidder refused to execute the lease. Phillips v. New York, 124 App. Div. 307, 108 N. Y. S. 1059. And where the bidder for a contract for the erection of a school house refused to perform, after a favorable award, his check of $2000.00 deposited with his bid was held to be forfeited. Wheaton Bldg. etc. Co. v. Boston, 204 Mass. 218, 90 N. E. 598.

2. DEFENSES TO FORFEITURE.

a. In General.

Where a deposit is conditioned on the bidder executing the contract in case of a favorable award, the deposit is discharged when the award is accepted and the contract entered into. Philadelphia v. Wood, 15 W. N. C. (Pa.) 94. See also Springfield v. Weaver, 137 Mo. 650, 37 S. W. 509, 39 S. W. 276. And when the original contract has been entered into but mutually abandoned, the deposit cannot be declared to be forfeited. Kelsey's Case, 1 Ct. Cl. 374; Tunny v. Hastings, 121 Minn. 212, 141 N. W. 168.

But it has been held that a contractor could not defeat the forfeiture of his deposit on the ground that the deposit was for a smaller amount than the law required. Tunny v. Hastings, 121 Minn. 212, 141 N. W. 168. And sickness or indisposition has been held not to excuse a failure to enter into the contract. West Chicago Park Com'rs v. Carmody, 139 Ill. App. 635.

Where a bidder placed several bids for different items of a public work in one envelope, and some of the bids were accepted and some rejected, and his deposit was forfeited for failure to perform, it was held, in an action to recover the forfeited deposit, that his contention that he had intended to bid only on the contract for the entire work, and was misled by the agents of the defendant to enter his bid in the manner he did, was not sustained by the evidence. Langley v. Harmon, 97 Mich. 347, 56 N. W. 761.

b. Withdrawal of Bid.

Once a bid is made, a bidder cannot prevent forfeiture of his deposit by withdrawing his bid, either before or after the bids are opened. Scott v. U. S. 44 Ct. Cl. 524; Kimball v. Hewitt, 2 N. Y. S. 697, affirmed in 15 Daly 124, 3 N. Y. S. 756. And see the reported case. See also Robinson v. Board of Education, 98 Ill. App. 100. And it has been held that municipal officers are without authority to permit a bidder to withdraw his bid and deposit before the bids are opened. Kimball v. Hewitt, 2 N. Y. S. 697 (affirmed in 15 Daly 124, 3 N. Y. S. 756), wherein the court said: "Had the defendants been acting in their own private business, there is no doubt that they could have permitted the offer made by the Electric Construction Company to be withdrawn, but, acting as public officers, they could not lawfully forgo the right that the city has acquired to insist that the company should either carry out its offer or forfeit the amount that it had deposited as security. When the bid of the Electric Company, with the certified check that accompanied it, passed into the hands of the commissioner of public works, the statute prescribed the disposition that should be made of the one and the other. The bid was to be publicly opened by the officers, who are the defendants in this action, and the contract was to be awarded to the lowest bidder. If the lowest bidder should refuse to execute, that is to say, sign the contract within five days after notice that it had been awarded to him, the amount of the certified check that he had deposited as security was to be forfeited, and retained by the city as liquidated damages, and paid into the sinking fund. No other disposition of the bid and the check was lawful."

123 Md. 660.

c. Mistake in Bid.

The decisions are not in harmony as to whether a mistake in a bid, is a ground for its rescission and the recovery of the deposit by the bidder. In some jurisdictions it has been held that where the bidder has without fault made a mistake in his estimate, and because of the mistake has refused to enter into the contract, he will be granted relief from a forfeiture of his deposit. Moffett, etc. Co. v. Rochester, 178 U. S. 373, 20 S. Ct. 957, 44 U. S. (L. ed.) 1108, reversing 91 Fed. 28, 62 U. S. App. 392, 33 C. C. A. 319, and affirming 82 Fed. 255; Bloomington v. Bromagin, 137 Ill. App. 509; School Com'rs v. Bender, 36 Ind. App. 164, 72 N. E. 154; Barlow v. Jones, (N. J.) 87 Atl. 649; New York v. Dowd Lumber Co. 140 App. Div. 358, 125 N. Y. S. 394; Balaban Co. v. New York, 87 Misc. 312, 149 N. Y. S. 954. See also Scott v. U. S. 44 Ct. Cl. 524; Crilly v. Board of Education, 54 Ill. App. 371. Compare Robinson v. Board of Education, 98 Ill. App. 100. Thus where it appeared that a bid was based on the wrong plans and specifications it was held that the bidder could rescind his bid and recover his deposit. Balaban Co. v. New York, 87 Misc. 312, 149 N. Y. S. 954. And it has been held that a suit could be brought to rescind a bid and enjoin the enforcement of a bond deposited with it, where there had been an unintentional clerical mistake in making the estimate. Moffett, etc. Co. v. Rochester, 178

U. S. 373, 20 S. Ct. 957, 44 U. S. (L. ed.) 1108, reversing 91 Fed. 28, 62 U. S. App. 392, 33 C. C. A. 319. In that case the court said: "The charter of the city provides that 'neither the principal nor sureties on any bid or bond shall have the right to withdraw or cancel the same until the board shall have let the contract for which such bid is made, and the same shall be duly executed.' A perfectly proper provision, but as was said by the learned Circuit Court: 'The complainant is not endeavoring "to withdraw or cancel a bid or bond. The bill proceeds upon the theory that the bid upon which the defendants acted was not the complainant's bid; that the complainant was no more responsible for it than if it had been the result of agraphia or the mistake of a copyist or printer. In other words, that the proposal read at the meeting of the board was one which the complainant never intended to make, and that the minds of the parties never met upon a contract based thereon. If the defendants are correct in their contention there is absolutely no redress for a bidder for public work, no matter how aggravated or palpable his blunder. The moment his proposal is opened by the executive board he is held as in a grasp of steel. There is no remedy, no escape. If, through an error of his clerk, he has agreed to do work worth a million dollars for ten dollars, he must be held to the strict letter of his contract, while equity stands by with folded hands and sees him driven to bankruptcy. The defendant's position admits of no compromise, no exception, no middle ground." These remarks are so apposite and just it is difficult to add to them. The transactions had not reached the degree of contract—a proposal and acceptance. Nor was the bid withdrawn or canceled against the provision of the charter. A clerical error was discovered in it and declared, and no question of the error was then made or of the good faith of complainant."

However, in other jurisdictions it has been held that a mistake in making the estimate is no defense to a forfeiture of the deposit for failure to accept a favorable award and perform the contract in accordance with the bid. Wheaton Bldg. etc. Co. v. Boston, 204 Mass. 218, 90 N. E. 598; Brown v. Levy, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 389, 69 S. W. 255. See also the reported case. Thus where it appeared that the plaintiff misinterpreted the language of the specifications, it was held that he could not recover his deposit on failure to enter into the contract after award. Wheaton Bldg. etc. Co. v. Boston, 204 Mass. 218, 90 N. E. 598. And a bidder has been held to the forfeiture of his deposit where he made a mistake of $10,000.00 in adding the items of his estimate. Brown v. Levy, 29

Tex. Civ. App. 389, 69 S. W. 255. However, it may be noted that in Wheaton Bldg. etc. Co. v. Boston, supra, the interpretation of the specifications was considered to be a question of law and the court based its decision on the doctrine that a mistake of law is not a ground for relief. And in the reported case the court distinguishes Moffett, etc. Co. v. Rochester, supra, on the ground that that case was a proceeding in equity.

d. Failure to Accept Bid.

Where the proposal of the bidder has been rejected and there is no new offer by him, there is no ground on which to base a forfeiture of his deposit. Brush Electric Light Co. v. Cincinnati, 11 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 581, 28 Cinc. L. Bul. 29. And where there is no binding acceptance of the bid, so as to constitute a completed contract, there can be no forfeiture of the deposit. Haldane v. U. S. 69 Fed. 819, 32 U. S. App. 607, 16 C. C. A. 447; Cedar Rapids Lumber Co. v. Fisher, 129 Ia. 332, 105 N. W. 595, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 177; Erving v. New York, 60 Super Ct. 48, 16 N. Y. S. 612, 42 N. Y. St. Rep. 707, affirmed in 131 N. Y. 133, 29 N. E. 1101. Thus where a bidder was advised by wire that he was the low bidder and to "come on morning train," it was held that the acceptance did not constitute a binding agreement, and that there could be no forfeiture of the bidder's deposit on his refusal to perform according to his bid. Cedar Rapids Lumber Co. v. Fisher, 129 Ia. 332, 105 N. W. 595, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 177. And where the act under which proposals were invited provided that if the lowest bidder should neglect or refuse to accept the contract within five days "after written notice that the same has been awarded to him" the deposit made by him should be forfeited, it was held that the act was penal in nature and would be strictly construed, and where there had been no written notice of acceptance there could be no forfeiture of the deposit, even though the bidder was otherwise apprised that his bid had been accepted. Erving v. New York, 60 Super Ct. 48, 16 N. Y. S. 612, 42 N. Y. St. Rep. 707, affirmed in 131 N. Y. 133, 29 N. E. 1101. And see Haldane v. U. S. 69 Fed. 819, 32 U. S. App. 607, 16 C. C. A. 447, wherein it was held that personal notice of the acceptance of a proposal was a condition precedent to the breach of a bond to enter into the contract in case of a favorable award.

But where the statute under which school commissioners advertised for bids provided that public contracts should not be deemed to be executed until the approval of the mayor was affixed thereto, it was held that the acceptance of a bid by the school commissioners was a binding contract without the affixed approval of the mayor, and the refusal of the successful bidder to enter into the contract forfeited his deposit. Wheaton Bldg. etc. Co. v. Boston, 204 Mass. 218, 90 N. E. 598.

e. Award to Another Bidder.

Where the deposit of a bidder has been forfeited for his refusal to enter into the contract after an award to him, the forfeiture is not affected by awarding the contract to the next lowest bidder. Turner v. Fremont, 170 Fed. 259, 95 C. C. A. 455, affirming 159 Fed. 221. And the fact that the lowest bidder has refused to accept the award and enter into the contract does not alter the right to forfeit the deposit of the next lowest bidder who likewise refuses to enter into the contract. Wheaton Bldg. etc. Co. v. Boston, 204 Mass. 218, 90 N. E. 598.

f. Illegality of Contract.

Where the contract offered to the successful bidder is illegal, he is under no obligation to enter into it, and his deposit cannot be forfeited for his refusal to do so. N. P. Perine Contracting, etc. Co. v. Pasadena, 116 Cal. 6, 47 Pac. 777; Denver v. Hayes, 28 Colo. 110, 63 Pac. 311; Fairbanks v. North Bend, 68 Neb. 560, 94 N. W. 537; Hinkle v. Philadelphia, 214 Pa. St. 126, 63 Atl. 590. In N. P. Perine Contracting, etc. Co. v. Pasadena, supra, the court said: "Appellant contends that its demurrer should have been sustained, and its motion for a nonsuit granted, upon the ground that plaintiff, having become a successful bidder, suffered absolute and unconditional forfeiture by its refusal to enter into the contract. The street law, in terms, declares that if the bidder 'fails, neglects, or refuses to enter into the contract, . . . then the certified check accompanying his bid, and the amount therein mentioned, shall be declared to be forfeited.' (Stats. 1891; p. 199.) It is upon this language that the contention above mentioned is based. The argument is not tenable. Plaintiff averred and proved facts fully establishing the illegality and invalidity of the proceedings which led up to and were to have culminated in a contract. By entering into such a contract it would have received nothing. It could have looked neither to the city nor to the property owners for recompense for its labor. The street law contemplates a forfeiture for a failure to enter into a contract based upon legal proceedings of the municipal authorities, not for a failure to enter into a contract which, so far as the contractor is concerned, is mere waste paper, and under which he would expend money and labor without the possibility of remuneration. In such a case, the promise of the contractor, accompanied by his certified check, is a naked offer, met and supported by no consideration. There is no estoppel. The contractor has received no benefit, the city has sustained no injury. Upon such a total failure of consideration, a promise resting upon expected benefits, which can never be received, is no longer binding, and a deposit of money, accompanying such a promise, is recoverable at law."

It has been held that a contractor may recover a forfeited deposit where the election authorizing the expenditure is illegal. Denver v. Hayes, 28 Colo. 110, 63 Pac. 311. And where a bid, accompanied by a deposit, was filed within the time fixed by the advertisement for receiving bids, but was materially changed after the term for receiving bids had closed, the bid was treated as a new bid illegally filed beyond the time fixed by the advertisement and it was held that its acceptance could not be made the basis for a forfeiture of the deposit. Fairbanks, v. North Bend, 68 Neb. 560, 94 N. W. 537. And see Hinkle v. Philadelphia, 214 Pa. St. 126, 63 Atl. 590, wherein it was held that since it was illegal for a municipality to enter into a contract for which no appropriation had been made, a deposit could not under those circumstances be forfeited for a refusal to enter into the contract after a favorable award.

It has been held that a bidder is not estopped to set up the illegality of a municipal contract in an action to recover his deposit. Fairbanks v. North Bend, 68 Neb. 560, 94 N. W. 537. See also Hinkle v. Philadelphia, 214 Pa. St. 126, 63 Atl. 590.

In the case first cited the court said: "But now the question arises whether the plaintiff is estopped to deny the legality of the proceedings under which its bid was accepted. We do not think it is. Mutuality is of the essence of an estoppel. That being true, it would follow that if the plaintiff is estopped to deny the legality of such proceedings, the defendant is also estopped to do so. If that be true, then, in the light of the cases hereinbefore cited, the defendant could have been compelled by mandamus to enter into a contract with the plaintiff, in accordance with the bid. In other words, a court would have compelled the defendant to enter into a contract in disregard of mandatory provisions of the statute. The bare statement of that proposition carries with it its obvious refutation. Neither does the maxim, Potior est conditio possidentis, apply in this case. There is no evidence that the plaintiff's bid was made or accepted with any intention to evade the statute, or to make a contract contrary to law; nor have we any reason to think it was. But, had it been made and accepted with that end in view, the most that could be said of the transaction would be that it was an agreement to enter into an illegal contract. The plaintiff refused to carry out its part of the agreement. It is the policy of the law to encourage the abandonment of an illegal project. Consequently, it has been held that where one of the parties to an illegal contract pays money thereon to the other, he may recover it back before the contract is executed, but not afterwards. . . . Hence, putting the worst possible construction on the conduct of the parties looking towards the making of an illegal contract, they stopped short of the consummation of any illegal purpose, and the plaintiff is entitled to a return of the deposit."

But where a bidder refused to enter into a contract to build a sewer, and his defense was that the sewer was to be constructed across private property, which he believed the city would be unable to acquire, it was held that "the defense would not prevent a forfeiture of the deposit, since the city could acquire the right of way by eminent domain, and he should have investigated this before making his bid. Coonan v. Cape Girardeau, 149 Mo. App. 609, 129 S. W. 745. And where there was a refusal to perform it was held to be no defense to liability on a bond deposited with the bid, that the bids were asked by a departmental body known as the general supply committee and not by the board of awards as required by statute, it appearing that the action of the general supply committee was authorized and approved by the board of awards. U. S. v. Title Guaranty, etc. Co. 36 App. Cas. (D. C.) 85. See also Morgan Park v. Gahan, 136 Ill. 523, 26 N. E. 1085, wherein a bidder sought to recover his forfeited deposit on the ground that special assessments to pay for the work were irregular and he was under no obligation to perform the awarded contract, the court holding that such a defense was unavailing since the municipality had power to levy additional assessments to pay for the work and the contractor was fully protected.

g. Tender of Contract Different from Bid.

Where the tendered contract is different from the bid as made there can be no forfeiture of the deposit for a refusal to enter into the contract. Sewerage Com'rs v. National Surety Co. 145 Ky. 90, 140 S. W. 62; Dawson Springs v. Miller Coal. etc. Co. 155 Ky. 763, 160 S. W. 495; Smith v. Independent School Dist. No. 12, 108 Minn. 322, 122 N. W. 173; Cotter v. Casteel, (Tex.) 37 S. W. 791. Thus where the tendered contract contained specifications different from those in the invitation for proposals, it was held that there could be no forfeiture of a deposit. Smith v. Independent School Dist. No. 12, 108 Minn. 322, 122 N. W. 173. And where a bidder for the construction of a municipal sewerage plant named his price for the entire plant, and in his proposal stated the price per unit, which price per unit totaled less than the sum for which he offered to contract for the entire plant at the prices named for each unit, it was held that the deposit of the bidder could not be forfeited for a refusal to execute the contract. Dawson Springs v. Miller Coal, etc. Co. 155 Ky. 763, 160 S. W. 495, wherein the court said: "It is also made quite plain from the evidence that the sewerage commission contemplated in the specifications and the instructions that the contractor should be paid so much for each unit of work and not a sum total for the whole work. In other words, the idea of the sewerage commission was that the bidders should specify the price at which they would do the earth excavation per cubic yard, on estimates furnished by the sewage engineer and be paid this specified price for each cubic yard of excavation, whether it was more or less than the estimate, and so with the other items constituting the work. It is also quite plain from the evidence that the appellee company, while it specified in its proposal the price it would charge for each unit, understood that its bid was the total sum at which it proposed to do the work. Evidently the parties to this controversy did not understand each other when the offer was made and accepted. There was no meeting of minds. Under the circumstances we think the lower court correctly solved the difficulty by requiring the city to return the deposit of $500, thus putting the parties where they started." But see Turner v. Fremont, 170 Fed. 259, 95 C. C. A. 455, wherein a deposit was forfeited for failing to enter into a contract after an award, and in an action to recover the same on the ground that the tendered contract was different from the proposal, it was held that the statement in the contractor's bid that he proposed to use "capital" brick did not relieve him from a forfeiture on his refusal to make a contract to furnish brick according to the specifications.

3. DEPOSIT AS LIQUIDATED DAMAGES.

Where it is expressly agreed by the parties that the deposit shall be considered as liquidated damages, in case there is a refusal to perform after a favorable award, the decisions are uniform that the deposit will be so treated as liquidated damages and not as a penalty, whether the actual damages are more or less than the amount of the deposit. Turner v. Fremont, 170 Fed. 259, 95 C. C. A. 455, affirming 159 Fed. 221; Robinson v. Board of Education, 98 Ill. App. 100; Wheaton Bldg. etc. Co. v. Boston, 204 Mass. 218, 90 N. E. 598; Coonan v. Cape Girardeau, 149 Mo. App. 609, 129 S. W. 745; Davin v. Syracuse, 69 Misc. 285, 126 N. Y. S. 1002, affirmed in 145 App. Div. 904, 129 N. Y. S. 1119; New York v. Seely-Taylor Co. 149 App. Div. 98, 133 N. Y. S. 808.

In Coonan v. Cape Girardeau, supra, the court said: "By the very words of plaintiff's bid the amount deposited by him became stipulated damages, to be forfeited to the city if, in the event the contract was awarded him, he failed to execute the bond called for by the contract within twenty days after the award and begin actual work within thirty days. As to whether the one thousand dollars was to be penalty or liquidated damages, we have no doubt the intention was to agree on the damages; what the city would lose by plaintiff's failure to sign the bond and contract and enter on the execution of the work could not be readily measured and the amount to be forfeited was not unreasonable. Those facts justify the ruling that the amount was stipulated damages." And in Wheaton Bldg. etc. Co. v. Boston, 204 Mass. 218, 90 N. E. 598, the court said: "The final contention of the plaintiff is that the deposit was a penalty, and hence cannot be enforced. The terms of the agreement indicate an intent to treat the deposit as liquidated damages, and this appears to be the purpose of the statute. The amount of the check must be regarded as liquidated damages. It was in fact much smaller than the loss sustained by the city, for by the failure of the plaintiff to take the contract it was awarded to another bidder for a sum about twenty-four thousand dollars larger. The plaintiff refused to sign the contract except for an additional price of twenty-one thousand dollars. Therefore no reason appears why the intent of the parties as manifested by their written communication and the purpose of the statute should not be carried out."

Thus it has been held that where a deposit amounted to thirty-seven hundred dollars and the actual loss by the bidder's failure to perform was but twenty-five hundred dollars, the entire deposit was nevertheless forfeited. Turner v. Fremont, 170 Fed. 259, 95 C. C. A. 455. And where it was provided that in case the bidder failed to perform after being awarded the contract, his deposit should be forfeited as liquidated damages, it was held that there could be no recovery of actual damages in excess of the amount of the deposit. New York v. Seely-Taylor Co. 149 App. Div. 98, 133 N. Y. S. 808, wherein the court said: "If it be assumed that the Seely-Taylor Company's bid were a valid and binding one, notwithstanding the mistake alleged, it could thereafter refuse to enter into a contract, and if it did so the only damage to which it was subjected was that provided in the section of the charter referred to. Its refusal forfeited to the city the amount of the deposit as 'liquidated damages.' Where a statute provides for liquidated damages, or where there is a stipulation in a contract as to the amount of damages that is to be paid to either party for a breach, then, in the absence of fraud or mistake, the only question which arises is as to the breach. In that case the actual damage is not involved. One cannot recover both. The recovery of one precludes the recovery of the other. . . . To permit a recovery of actual damage, where liquidated damages have been provided for, is to nullify the statute or destroy a contract with reference thereto. The sole purpose of providing for liquidated damages is to prevent, in case of a breach, any question being raised as to the amount that shall be paid or recovered therefor. The city, when it advertised for bids, informed prospective bidders that they would have to deliver, at the time bids were submitted, a check or money, as provided in section 420 of the charter. The purpose of requiring such deposit to be made was not only to insure good faith on the part of bidders, but to indemnify the city against the expense of readvertising. . . . and also to notify bidders if the contract were awarded to them and they refused to enter into it the precise amount of damage they would have to pay. If this be so, then the only damage to which the Seely-Taylor Company could be subjected for refusing to execute the contract after the same had been awarded to it was the forfeiture of its deposit."

On the other hand, where there is no express agreement that the deposit shall be treated as liquidated damages in case of forfeiture it has been held that the deposit will be treated as a penalty and the forfeiture limited to the damages sustained. Wilson v. Baltimore, 83 Md. 203, 34 Atl. 774, 55 Am. St. Rep. 339; Lindsey v. Rockwall County, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 225, 30 S. W. 380. Compare the reported case wherein there was an express stipulation that the deposit should be treated as liquidated damages. In Lindsey v. Rockwall County, supra, the court said: "On the trial, the court left it to the jury to determine whether or not the check for five hundred dollars was intended as a penalty or as liquidated damages in event there was a failure to enter into contract and bond on the part of plaintiffs, and the jury held, in effect, by their Ann. Cas. 1916C.—28.

verdict, that plaintiffs had forfeited the whole amount. This was error. The only agreement by which plaintiffs were bound was an implied one created by the filing of their bid and check, as required by the advertisement. By the terms of that contract the plaintiffs did not absolutely forfeit the amount of the check upon failure to enter into contract and bond, but by such failure they only became liable for such actual damages as the county sustained by reason of their failure. The actual damages sustained by the county, as shown by the evidence, does not amount to near as much as the amount of the check; and the judgment, therefore, is not supported by the evidence; and the same is reversed and the cause remanded."

III. Interest on Deposit.

Where the facts justify a return of the deposit to the bidder, it has been held that interest is allowable thereon from the time of the bidder's demand for a return. Erving v. New York, 60 Super Ct. 48, 16 N. Y. S. 612, 42 N. Y. St. Rep. 707, affirmed in 131 N. Y. 133, 29 N. E. 1011. But the contrary was held in Denver v. Hayes 28 Colo. 110, 63 Pac. 311, wherein the successful bidders for municipal bonds, although entitled to the return of their deposit on proof of the illegality of the bond issue, were held not to be entitled to interest on their deposit.

HUTTON

v.

WATTERS ET AL.

Tennessee Supreme Court—September 29, 1915.

132 Tenn. 527; 179 S. W. 134.

Facts — Lawful Act Committed with Malicious Motive.

Plaintiff's petition alleged that she operated a boarding house near a school of which the defendant was president; that the defendant, having disagreed with one boarder at the plaintiff's house, demanded his ejection therefrom and was refused; that he, with others, than attempted to, and did, destroy the plaintiff's business, by threats against students who boarded with the plaintiff, by deterring new arrivals from going to the plaintiff's house, and by other means; that the plaintiff was of good character, and operated a reputable house; and that the defendants acted from ill-will, and not by reason of business rivalry or competition. Held, that the declaration was not demurrable, the facts showing a cause of action, even though the act itself was lawful, if the defendant was actuated by malice and destroyed the plaintiff's business without reasonable advantage to himself, since every person has the right to conduct a lawful business and to have that right enforced or the wrong redressed if the right is infringed upon.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

In an action for wrongful injury to plaintiff's business, the question of whether the acts complained of were within the rights of the defendant as being in the due course of competition for his own advantage, or actuated solely by malice and unjustifiable, must be determined upon the facts in each case, and no rule can be laid down for its determination.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A "malicious" act is one injurious to another, intentional, and without legal justification, and is unlawful and actionable, but if an act, otherwise lawful, has a reasonable tendency to promote ends advantageous to the doer, malice in the doing does not bring it within the rule.

[See note at end of this case.]

Certiorari to Court of Civil Appeals.

Action for damages. E. J. Hutton, plaintiff, and H. E. Watters et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants in trial court. Judgment reversed by Court of Civil Appeals. Defendants bring certiorari. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

L. E. Holladay for defendants.

A. B. Adams and R. E. Maiden for plaintiff.

[529] NEIL, C. J.—The averments of the declaration are, in substance, as follows:

One of the defendants, the Hall-Moody Institute, is a chartered institution of learning at Martin, Tennessee. Defendant Watters is its president, and the ten other defendants are its "directors, trustees, teachers, and advisors." The school has a large out of town patronage, and it is essential that boarding houses be conducted to accommodate these students, as well as some of the teachers. Mrs. Hutton is a widow who makes a business of keeping boarders. In June, 1910, she opened a business of the kind in Martin. During that year one James Wilson became one of her customers. Some students did the same. Defendants offered no objection until after a personal difficulty had occurred between Wilson and defendant Watters. The latter then demanded that plaintiff dismiss Wilson. She refused. Because of this refusal Watters became her enemy, and the other defendants ranged themselves with him, and all formed a conspiracy to drive her out of business. Thereupon, from time to time, during the years 1911, 1912, and 1913, as soon as plaintiff secured student boarders, or teacher boarders, the defendants, in prosecution of this purpose, caused these, plaintiff's customers, to leave her house, by threats to deprive them of the benefits of the school, or of their places, if they should refuse. By similar threats other persons were prevented from taking board with plaintiff; the defendants even going to the length of meeting trains and watching for new arrivals and deterring these from [530] patronizing her house. The plaintiff is a person of good moral character, stands well in the community, and has always conducted a reputable establishment. The defendants, in setting on foot and prosecuting the conspiracy referred to, were not influenced by any motive of business rivalry, or competition, but acted as they did merely because of a feeling of ill will induced by plaintiff's refusal to turn James Wilson out of her house, and her refusal to permit Watters to dictate the price which she charged her customers.

The conspiracy was successful, and destroyed, or practically destroyed, plaintiff's business.

The damages are laid at $5,000

The defendants interposed a demurrer purporting numerous grounds, but all resolvable into the single objection that the declaration stated no cause of action.

The trial judge sustained the demurrer, but the court of civil appeals reversed that judgment, and the case then came to this court under the writ of certiorari.

We think the declaration stated a good cause of action.

Every one has the right to establish and conduct a lawful business, and is entitled to the protection of organized society, through its courts, whenever that right is unlawfully invaded. Such right existing, the commission of an actionable wrong is established against any one who is shown to have intentionally interfered with it, without justifiable cause or excuse. To establish justification, it must be made to appear, [531] not only that the act complained of was otherwise lawful and performed in a lawful manner, but likewise that it had some real tendency to effect a reasonable advantage to the doer of it. But in order to determine the reasonableness of such act it must be considered from the standpoint of both parties, with a view to ascertaining whether the defendant has acted merely in the due exercise of his own right to carry on business for himself. If this be found in his favor, while he may have done the plaintiff harm, he cannot be adjudged to have done an injury in the legal sense; that is, a wrongful act in violation of the legal right of another. Whether the defendant was in the reasonable exercise of his own similar rights must, from the viewpoint stated, be determined by the court, or court and jury in each case as it arises, on the law and the evidence. A defendant cannot excuse himself by the mere fact that the means used were his own, his property, his servants. He cannot, with justification in law, use his property, or anything else that appertains to him, in such manner as to wantonly injure another. Still, it has been decided, by the weight of authority, that if the act complained of, being otherwise lawful in itself, had a reasonable tendency to promote ends advantageous to the defendant in the conduct of his own business, it cannot be correctly adjudged an illegal agency or operation by the fact that the doer of it was moved also by a feeling of ill will, or personal malice, towards the person against whom his act was directed (West Virginia Transp. Co. v. Standard Oil Co. 50 W. Va. 611, [532] 40 S. E. 591, 56 L.R.A. 804, 88 Am. St. Rep. 895; 62 L.R.A. 673, note; L.R.A. 1915B 1180, note); but if the act is otherwise wrongful, such personal malice may aggravate the damages. (Cooley on Torts [2d ed.], pp. 832, 836.)

In short, if an act be hurtful to another, intentional, and without legal justification, it is malicious in the true legal sense (19 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law [2d ed.] 623, note 4), therefore unlawful, and is actionable.

Of course it is wholly impossible to formulate a description which will cover all acts which are intentionally hurtful to another, and at the same time justifiable in law. As already said, each case, as it arises, must be determined on its own facts, and in the light of the principles stated. It is left in each case for the court, or the court and jury, according to the way in which the controversy is presented, to say whether the defendant's conduct complained of was, in view of all the circumstances, a reasonable and proper exercise of his right of self-protection, or self-advancement, both as to the substance of it, and the method of it. Huskie v. Griffin, 75 N. H. 345, 74 Atl. 595, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 966, 139 Am. St. Rep. 718; Dunshee v. Standard Oil Co. 152 Ia. 623, 132 N. W. 371, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 263; Gott v. Bearea College, 156 Ky. 376, 161 S. W. 204, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 17; Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, 23 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 598; Mod. Am. Law, vol. 2, pp. 327-336.

[533] In the latter authority it is said, quoting 28 Law Quarterly Review, 67:

"The theory of justification consists in a proper adjustment and compromise between the two competing rights that are equally protected in law. It has been already observed that the enjoyment by a particular individual of the right of freedom, as to how he should bestow his capital and labor, is not absolute, but qualified by the existence of equal rights in the other members, to such an extent as to be made compatible with an equally free enjoyment of these rights by the rest of the community. In fact, every case of justification reduces itself to the question how far the rights of an individual can be so circumscribed in accordance with a general law of freedom as to leave an equal scope for the free enjoyment of the competing rights of his fellow men."

"But," said Lord Justice Bowen, in Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, supra, "such legal justification would not exist when the act was merely done with the intention of causing temporal harm, without reference to one's own lawful gain, or the lawful enjoyment of one's own right. The good sense of the tribunal which had to decide would have to analyze the circumstances and discover on which side of the line each case fell. But if the real object was to enjoy what was one's own, or to acquire for one's self some advantage in one's property or trade, and what was done was done honestly, peaceably, and without any of the illegal acts above referred to, it could not, in my opinion, properly be said that [534] it was done without just cause or excuse." Id. 618, 619.

Although, as indicated, the defense of justification arising in such controversies is a question for decision in each case, as concreted in its own peculiar facts, yet the precedents shed much light in the way of illustrating the principles involved.

In an early English case, decided during the reign of Queen Anne (Keeble v. Hickeringill, 11 East (Eng.) 574), reported in full as a note to Carrington v. Taylor, 11 East (Eng.) 571, 574, 577, it appeared that the plaintiff had prepared a decoy pond for the purpose of taking wild fowl. The defendant knowing this, and purposing to injure the plaintiff by frightening away the wild fowl accustomed to resort to the pond, discharged guns on his own land, and the wild fowl were thus driven away. It was held that an action on the case would lie for the damages thus occasioned. Holt, Chief Justice, said that if the defendant had set up another decoy on his own ground near the plaintiff's and that had spoiled the custom of the latter, no action would lie, because he had as much liberty to make and use a decoy as the plaintiff; but, when, without benefit to himself, real or intended, he successfully committed the act intending to accomplish the injury to the plaintiff, it was actionable.

In International, etc. R. Co. v. Greenwood, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 76, 21 S. W. 559, it was held that a railway company was liable to the proprietor of a boarding house for having deprived him of the patronage [535] of its employees by threatening to discharge them if they patronized him. It did not appear that any interest of the railway company was served, or any benefit to it effected, by such order.

In Graham v. St. Charles St. R. Co. 47 La. Ann. 214, 16 So. 806, 27 L.R.A. 416, 49 Am. St. Rep. 366, it appeared that the foreman of the railway company, without any purpose of advancing its interests, threatened to discharge its servants if they continued to trade with plaintiff, who was conducting a grocery store near the stables and buildings of the company, in New Orleans, and by this order caused injury to the plaintiff. This conduct was held unjustifiable and therefore actionable.

In Wesley v. Native Lumber Co. 97 Miss. 814, 53 So. 346, Ann. Cas. 1912D 706, it was held that an action for damages would lie against a corporation where it had maliciously injured a retail dealer by threatening to discharge any of its employees who should deal with him. To the same effect is Globe, etc. F. Ins. Co. v. Firemen's Fund Ins. Co. 97 Miss. 148, 52 So. 454, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 869.

In Ertz v. Produce Exch. 79 Minn. 145, 81 N. W. 737, 48 L.R.A. 90, 79 Am. St. Rep. 433, it was held that a conspiracy by several to refuse to deal with a dealer in farm produce, having a profitable business, and to induce others to do likewise, it not appearing that such interference of the persons so conspiring was to serve any legitimate interests of their own, but that it was done merely to injure him, and that the conspiracy [536] had been carried into execution, whereby the plaintiff's business was ruined, furnished a cause of action in favor of the injured party.

On the other hand, it was held in Robinson v. Texas Pine Land Assoc. (Tex.) 40 S. W. 843, that an employer who issued store checks redeemable in merchandise was not liable to an action by another storekeeper for threatening to discharge its employees if they traded with him, and for refusing to take up any checks which had passed through the hands of plaintiff. The ground of the decision was that the plaintiff had no superior right to trade with defendant's employees; that defendant had the right to appropriate to itself all of the customers it could command, provided it did not violate a definite legal right of the plaintiff. The point of view is brought out more clearly in Lewis v. Huie-Hodge Lumber Co. 121 La. 658, 46 So. 685. The defendant was the employer of a large number of people, and in connection with its business carried on a general mercantile store for the purpose of selling goods to its employees and others. It notified its employees that if they bought goods of the plaintiff they would be discharged. The court held that defendant's act was justifiable as a means of safe-guarding its own interests.

An interesting case is Delz v. Winfree. The controversy was first presented on a petition stating, in substance, that the defendants, members of two different firms engaged in buying and slaughtering live animals fit to be slaughtered and sold as fresh butcher's meat, [537] conspired with each other, and with a butcher, not to sell to the petitioner for cash live animals or slaughtered meat for the prosecution of his business, and that in pursuance of this conspiracy they refused to sell him, although offered their own price in money, by reason of which unlawful combination and malicious interference the petitioner was compelled to close his business, and so had been damaged. This was held to state a cause of action. 80 Tex 400, 16 S. W. 111, 26 Am. St. Rep. 755. But when the case came on for trial on the issues made, it appeared that the refusal was based on the fact that the petitioner was indebted to the defendants, and they had refused to sell him because, he being insolvent, they deemed it prudent to have no further dealings with him until he had paid them what was due them. There was verdict and judgment in favor of the defendants, and on appeal the judgment of the trial court was sustained, the court holding that the reason assigned and proven justified the act complained of. 6 Tex. Civ. App. 11, 25 S. W. 50.

But in Dunshee v. Standard Oil Co. 152 Ia. 223, 132 N. W. 371, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 263, it was held that the principle of reasonable self-protection, or self-advancement, did not justify the action taken. There it appeared that the defendant, a wholesaler, when its customer in a particular city began to purchase a portion of his stock from a rival concern, entered into a retail business solely for the purpose of driving him out of business, and when this had been accomplished [538] ceased its said retail business. It was held that these facts made out a case for damages.

So, the case of Tuttle v. Buck, 107 Minn. 145, 119 N. W. 946, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 599, 131 Am. St. Rep. 446, 16 Ann. Cas. 807. Here it appeared that the plaintiff, a barber, had for several years carried on a profitable business, and that the defendant, a wealthy banker, possessed of great influence, set up an opposition shop, solely for the purpose of injuring the plaintiff, and without profit to himself, employing and paying barbers to conduct such opposition business, whereby plaintiff's business was ruined. It was held that these facts made a case for relief. The court said:

"To divert to one's self the customers of a business rival by the offer of goods at lower prices is in general a legitimate mode of serving one's own interest, and justifiable as fair competition. But when a man starts an opposition place of business, not for the sake of profit to himself, but regardless of loss to himself, and for the sole purpose of driving his competitor out of business, and with the intention of himself retiring upon the accomplishment of his malevolent purpose, he is guilty of a wanton and an actionable tort."

To the same effect is Boggs v. Duncan-Schell Furniture Co. 163 Ia. 106, 143 N. W. 482, L.R.A. 1915B 1196, quoting and approving Tuttle v. Buck.

The illegal acts excluded by general reference in the excerpt we have made from Mogul Steamship Co. v. McGregor, supra, are thus particularized by the Lord Justice in an earlier part of his opinion:

[539] "No man, whether trader or not, can, however, justify damaging another in his commercial business by fraud or misrepresentation. Intimidation, obstruction, and molestation are forbidden. So is the intentional procurement of a violation of individual rights, contractual or other, assuming always that there is no just cause for it. The intentional driving away of customers by show of violence (Tarleton v. McGawley, Peak N. P. (ed. 1795) (Eng.) 205); the obstruction of actors on the stage by preconcerted hissing (Clifford v. Brandon, 2 Campb. (Eng.) 358; Gregory v. Brunswick, 6 M. & G. 205, 46 E. C. L. 205); the disturbance of wild fowl in decoys by the firing of guns (Carrington v. Taylor, 11 East (Eng.) 571, and Keeble v. Hickeringill, 11 East (Eng.) 574, note); the impeding or threatening servants or workmen (Garret v. Taylor, Cro. Jac. (Eng.) 567); the inducing persons under personal contracts to break their contracts (Bowen v. Hall, 6 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 333; Lumley v. Gye, 2 El. & Bl. 216, 75 E. C. L. 216)—all are instances of such forbidden acts."

Applying the principles stated to the case before us, we are of the opinion that the defendants acted without legal excuse. They were not justified by plaintiff's refusal to dismiss her boarder, James Wilson, nor by her refusal to arrange her rates according to the directions of the defendant Watters. If the prices charged were pleasing to her patrons, no other person had any right to complain. No such defense appears as that set out in Gott v. Berea College, supra, based on the welfare of the students, or the right of the college to make rules for their control.

[540] We are referred to the case of Payne v. Western, etc. R. Co. 13 Lea (Tenn.) 507, 49 Am. Rep. 666, as an authority in opposition to the views herein stated. While that case was ably reasoned by the learned special judge who wrote the majority opinion, and is not without support in the authorities, we are constrained to hold that it was erroneously decided. We are better satisfied with the dissenting opinion. It is certain that the prevailing opinion in that case is out of harmony with the great weight of authority as now understood. Moreover, we have long been dissatisfied with that opinion, believing that it was fundamentally wrong. The real question was not, as assumed in that opinion, whether a master had the right to discharge his servants without liability to account to a third party for his reasons, good or bad, but it was whether the defendant had the right to injure the business of the plaintiff without any purpose to effect an advantage or benefit to itself. The plaintiff in that case could not lawfully question defendant's authority over its servants, but he could question the defendant's exercise of that authority solely for the purpose of destroying his business, the infliction of an injury on his business without legal justification, and hence an act malicious in law.

It was said in that opinion that the act was not malicious in law, because although it inflicted a wrong on the plaintiff such wrong was not a legal wrong, but only a moral wrong, therefore, not an unlawful act. That position assumed the whole matter in controversy. [541] We think the learned special judge confounded the right of a master to discharge his servants subject to legal accountability to no one save the servants themselves for breach of contract, with the supposed right to interfere with the lawful business of another by threats made against those servants. It is said, if the master had the right to discharge his servants, he necessarily had the right to threaten to discharge them. The conclusion does not logically follow. He had no right to condition his threat, or the execution of his threat, on an injury to be inflicted, under his orders, by the servants on the personal business of another. The defendant could not lawfully threaten to discharge his servants if they should fail to assault and beat the plaintiff. Why? Because to assault and beat one who is doing no harm is unlawful. So, it is unlawful to interfere with another's business without a good excuse. The means cannot justify the act, or turn a wrong into a right. The opinion referred to is based on the hypothesis that the means used can effect this metamorphosis, if that means to be the exercise of the power which the master has over his servants through their fear of losing their places, and hence their means of livelihood, and no violence be done. It cannot be that a master has power, within the law, to direct his servants where to buy for themselves, or where not to buy, when no rightful good to himself can be effected through such direction. That would be to sanction tyranny, the enslavement of servants, and the subversion of the law itself. The law wills freedom, save [542] where a man is bound by its own behests, or has, through contract, submitted his duty to the will of another. Where one employs the power which the law gives him by contract for purposes other than those of the contract, to the end that he may enslave the will of the person who has contracted with him, he does wrong, and if injury to another occurs thereby, he does a legal wrong, and cannot shelter himself behind the contract which he has diverted from its purposes, and so prostituted.

It is said in the opinion we are criticizing that a man has the legal right to buy where he chooses and to sell to whom he will. This is true; but we think the point had no fitting part in the solution of the question then before the court. The right of a man to dispose of his own custom does not include the power, in law, to influence or control the custom of other people to the injury or destruction of the business of third parties. Such influence one can lawfully exercise only when it is used for the building up of his own business or the advancement of his own lawful interests. The true theory of the matter was fully discerned by Mr. Justice Freeman, and expressed by him in his masterly dissenting opinion filed in the cause in these words:

"The rule I have maintained is in strict accord with a maxim of the law, so well founded in reason as to need no argument or authority to support it; that is, that a man must so use his own as not to do an injury to others. That this means he shall so enjoy his legal right, as not to do wrong to the legal rights of [543] another, I freely concede. But here is a use of his legal right to discharge employees, for the direct purpose and with no other, and for no other reason except to prevent their trading with a party legitimately entitled by his location and the character of his business to such trade. Here is the use of a legal right, to deprive the other of that which is his legal right, to wit, the property he has in the good will of his business, which consists in his business character for integrity and fair dealing, his convenience of location to his customers, the character of goods he sells, and fairness of price for which they are sold, and the like. All these make up as elements of that property now well recognized in our law as the good will of a business. For a party who has the power, to use that power, to destroy or injure the value of this property, in the exercise of the right, not for any reason of advantage to himself, but solely to injure another, ought not to be permitted by an enlightened system of jurisprudence in this country.

"It is argued that a man ought to have the right to say where his employees shall trade.

I do not recognize any such right. A father may well control his family in this, but an employer ought to have no such right conceded to him. In the case in hand and like cases under the rule we have maintained, the party may always show by way of defense that he has had reason for what he has done; that the trader was unworthy of patronage; that he debauched the employee, or sold, for instance, unsound food, or any other cause, [544] that affected his employee's usefulness to him, or justified the withdrawal of custom from him. This is not in any way to interfere with the legal right to discharge an employee for good cause, or without any reason assigned if the contract justifies it, but only that he shall not do this solely for the purpose of injury to another, or hold a threat over the employee in terrorem to fetter the freedom of the employee, and for the purpose of injuring an obnoxious party.

"Such conduct is not justifiable in morals, and ought not to be in law, and when the injury is done as averred in this case, the party should respond in damages. The principle will not interfere with any proper use of the legal rights of the employer, an improper and injurious use is all it forbids." Payne v. Western, etc. R. Co. 13 Lea (Tenn.) 541, 542, 49 Am. Rep. 666.

All of the foregoing excerpt is in accord with the views now held by the court (including as matter of justification acts for the lawful advancement of the master's own interest), and in harmony with the best judicial thought of the present time, and in our judgment should have controlled the decision of the cause.

We overrule Payne v. Western, etc. R. Co. in so far as it is in conflict with the present opinion.

The judgment of the court of civil appeals in the case before us, reversing that of the trial court, must, on the grounds herein stated, be affirmed, and the cause remanded for issue and trial.

NOTE.

Act Lawful in Itself Not Rendered Unlawful by Malicious Motive.

The earlier cases discussing the effect of a malicious intent on an act inherently lawful are collected in the note to Westley v. Native Lumber Co. Ann. Cas. 1912D 796. This note reviews the recent cases on that point.

Several recent cases have maintained the view that an act which is in itself lawful and infringes no legal right of another is not actionable though it is performed with malicious intent and results in actual damage. Thus in Vitagraph Co. of America v. Swaab, 248 Pa. St. 478, Ann. Cas. 1916B, in discussing an alleged wrongful prosecution of an action of replevin, it was said: "The general principle is that where a plaintiff has a legal right to a particular remedy it matters not what motives may induce him to assert it." So in Prospect Park, etc. R. Co. v. Morley, 155 App. Div. 347, 140 N. Y. S. 380, the court in refusing to enjoin the prosecution of certain actions said: "But appellants assert in their complaint that defendants have conspired to do injury to the plaintiffs, and that the suits brought by them are fraudulent in character, and that therefore the prosecution of such actions should be enjoined. But no action for a conspiracy lies when two or more persons conspire to do a lawful act in a lawful manner and cause damage thereby, even though they may have acted with a malicious motive." In Buck v. Latham, 110 Minn. 523, 126 N. W. 278, the Minnesota Court, which had held in an earlier case (see Tuttle v. Buck, 16 Ann. Cas. 807) that a malicious intent might render actionable an act otherwise lawful, declared that the principle of that case did not warrant recovery on proof that a person with malicious intent prosecuted to judgment a valid claim against another. The court said: "It is apparent upon the face of the counterclaim that the plaintiff had a perfect legal right to do that which he is charged with doing, which was simply this: He bought a past-due negotiable promissory note, paying full value therefor, and brought this action against the defendant to recover the amount due on the note, which the defendant might have paid at any time and avoided the suit. He admits that he had no defense to the note, and that the plaintiff was entitled to the amount claimed. The plaintiff is charged with doing no other act. It is not alleged that the plaintiff has in any manner interfered with or sacrificed the defendant's property, or impaired his financial credit. On the contrary the sole basis for the recovery from the plaintiff of damages in the sum of ten thousand dollars is that his unexecuted purpose in doing the lawful acts that he did do was malicious. The briefs of the respective parties ably discuss the question as to when, if ever, a malicious motive will convert into an actionable tort an act which otherwise would be both legal and proper. We do not discuss the question, for manifestly upon both principle and authority it must be held that the pleading here under consideration does not allege facts constituting a cause of action against the plaintiff, for it shows that he exercised a legal right in a lawful way, with no invasion of the defendant's personal or property rights."

The view that an act inherently lawful may become actionable if it is done with a malicious intent to injure another finds support in the reported case. So, in Boggs v. Duncan-Schell Furniture Co. 163 Ia. 106, 143 N. W. 482, L.R.A.1915B 1196, a recovery was sustained against a person who, having lost the selling agency for certain sewing machines, issued certain misleading advertisements of second hand machines, not for the purpose of legitimate competition in trade but to injure his successor in the agency in question. The court said: "While a person has the right to pursue his avocations and his business for his own pleasure and profit, he has no right, directly or indirectly, to wilfully and maliciously injure another in his lawful business or occupation. Men have the right to engage in lawful competition, and, though the competition may have the effect of driving another out of business, if the competition is lawful, no action arises, though injury resulted from the competition. Where there is lawful competition for gain, for supremacy in business, for the legitimate control of business, even though the purpose and effect of the competition is to drive from business competitors, yet, if the competition is lawful and carried on in a lawful way, no action will lie. There is a difference between lawful competition and simulated competition carried on with the sole purpose and intent, not of profit and gain, but of maliciously injuring others engaged in that particular business. The case before us does not present a case of lawful competition, but a case of simulated or pretended competition, designed and carried out with malice for the purpose of injury to the plaintiff in his business."

Every man has the legal right to advance himself before his fellows, and to build up his own business enterprises, and use all lawful means to that end, although in the path of his impetuous movements he leaves strewn the victims of his great industry, energy, skill, prowess, or foresight. But the law will not permit him to wear the garb of honor only to destroy. The law will not permit him to masquerade in the guise of honest competition solely for the purpose of injuring his neighbor. The law will not permit him to simulate that which is right for the sole purpose of protecting himself in the doing of that which is palpably wrong. It is said that a man cannot be called to answer for doing that which he has a right to do, no matter what the effect of the doing may have upon others, and no evil motive can make an act wrong, the doing of which is within the rights granted by law. But the question still stands, Is he within his legal right when he simulates honest competition, not to advance himself or his own interests, but for the sole purpose of inflicting injury upon his neighbors? It is said the law deals only with externals; but the law ought not to be blinded by the lion's skin. It may be that expressed malice in the doing does not, of itself, make the wrong; but malice is implied in the very act of doing, and therefore the act itself is wrong." In Virtue v. Creamery Package Mfg. Co. 123 Minn. 17, 142 N. W. 930, L.R.A.1915B 1179, reargument denied, 123 Minn. 45, 142 N. W. 1136, L.R.A. 1915B 1195, it was held that while a patentee may in good faith issue notices warning against a supposed infringement, he is liable in damages if he does so with malicious intent to injure a competitor. That case seems, however, to rest on the rule as to privilege with respect to defamatory publications rather than on the doctrine discussed in this note.

MacPHERSON

v.

BUICK MOTOR COMPANY.

New York Court of Appeals—March 14, 1916.

217 N. Y. 382.

Negligence — Liability of Manufacturer to Purchaser — Defective Automobile.

The manufacturer of an automobile is liable to a purchaser thereof from a dealer for injuries caused by a defective wheel, the defects in which could have been discovered by reasonable inspection, though the wheel was purchased by the automobile manufacturer from the maker thereof.

[See note at end of this case.]

MacPherson v. Buick Motor Co. 160 N. Y. App. Div. 55, affirmed.

Appeal from Appellate Division of Supreme Court, Third Judicial Department.

Action for damages. Donald C. MacPherson, plaintiff, and Buick Motor Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff in trial court. Judgment affirmed by Appellate Division of Supreme Court. Defendant appeals by permission. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

William Van Dyke for appellant.
Edgar T. Brackett for respondent.

[384] CARDOZO, J.—The defendant is a manufacturer of automobiles. It sold an automobile to a retail dealer. The retail dealer resold to the plaintiff. While the plaintiff was in the car, it suddenly collapsed. He was [385] thrown out and injured. One of the wheels was made of defective wood, and its spokes crumbled into fragments. The wheel was not made by the defendant; it was bought from another manufacturer. There is evidence, however, that its defects could have been discovered by reasonable inspection, and that inspection was omitted. There is no claim that the defendant knew of the defect and willfully conceded it. The case, in other words, is not brought within the rule of Kuelling v. Roderick Lean Mfg. Co. 183 N. Y. 78, 5 Ann. Cas. 124, 75 N. E. 1098, 111 Am. St. Rep. 691, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 303. The charge is one, not of fraud, but of negligence. The question to be determined is whether the defendant owed a duty of care and vigilance to any one but the immediate purchaser.

The foundations of this branch of the law, at least in this state, were laid in Thomas v. Winchester, 6 N. Y. 397, 57 Am. Dec. 455. A poison was falsely labeled. The sale was made to a druggist, who in turn sold to a customer. The customer recovered damages from the seller who affixed the label. "The defendant's negligence," it was said, "put human life in imminent danger." A poison falsely labeled is likely to injure any one who gets it. Because the danger is to be foreseen, there is a duty to avoid the injury. Cases were cited by way of illustration in which manufacturers were not subject to any duty irrespective of contract. The distinction was said to be that their conduct, though negligent, was not likely to result in injury to any one except the purchaser. We are not required to say whether the chance of injury was always as remote as the distinction assumes. Some of the illustrations might be rejected to-day. The principle of the distinction is for present purposes the important thing.

Thomas v. Winchester became quickly a landmark of the law. In the application of its principle there may at times have been uncertainty or even error. There has never in this state been doubt or disavowal of the principle itself. The chief cases are well known, yet to recall [386] some of them will be helpful. Loop v. Litchfield, 42 N. Y. 351, 1 Am. Rep. 513, is the earliest. It was the case of a defect in a small balance wheel used on a circular saw. The manufacturer pointed out the defect to the buyer, who wished a cheap article and was ready to assume the risk. The risk can hardly have been an imminent one, for the wheel lasted five years before it broke. In the meanwhile the buyer had made a lease of the machinery. It was held that the manufacturer was not answerable to the lessee. Loop v. Litchfield was followed in Losee v. Clute, 51 N. Y. 494, 10 Am. Rep. 638, the case of the explosion of a steam boiler. That decision has been criticised (Thompson on Negligence, 233; Shear- man & Redfield on Negligence [6th ed.] § 117); but it must be confined to its special facts. It was put upon the ground that the risk of injury was too remote. The buyer in that case had not only accepted the boiler, but had tested it. The manufacturer knew that his own test was not the final one. The finality of the test has a bearing on the measure of diligence owing to persons other than the purchaser (Beven, Negligence [3 ed.] pp. 50, 51, 54; Wharton, Negligence [2d ed.] § 134).

These early cases suggest a narrow construction of the rule. Later cases, however, evince a more liberal spirit. First in importance is Devlin v. Smith, 89 N. Y. 470, 42 Am. Rep. 311. The defendant, a contractor, built a scaffold for a painter. The painter's servants were injured. The contractor was held liable. He knew that the scaffold, if improperly constructed, was a most dangerous trap. He knew that it was to be used by the workmen. He was building it for that very purpose. Building it for their use, he owed them a duty, irrespective of his contract with their master, to build it with care.

From Devlin v. Smith we pass over intermediate cases and turn to the latest case in this court in which Thomas v. Winchester was followed. That case is Statler v. George A. Ray Mfg. Co. 195 N. Y. 478, 480, 88 N. E. 1063. The defendant [387] manufactured a large coffee urn. It was installed in a restaurant. When heated, the urn exploded and injured the plaintiff. We held that the manufacturer was liable. We said that the urn "was of such a character inherently that, when applied to the purposes for which it was designed, it was liable to become a source of great danger to many people if not carefully and properly constructed."

It may be that Devlin v. Smith and Statler v. George A. Ray Mfg. Co. have extended the rule of Thomas v. Winchester. If so, this court is committed to the extension. The defendant argues that things imminently dangerous to life are poisons, explosives, deadly weapons—things whose normal function it is to injure or destroy. But whatever the rule in Thomas v. Winchester may once have been, it has no longer that restricted meaning. A scaffold (Devlin v. Smith, supra) is not inherently a destructive instrument. It becomes destructive only if imperfectly constructed. A large coffee urn (Statler v. George A. Ray Mfg. Co. supra) may have within itself, if negligently made, the potency of danger, yet no one thinks of it as an implement whose normal function is destruction. What is true of the coffee urn is equally true of bottles of aerated water (Torgesen v. Schultz, 192 N. Y. 156, 84 N. E. 956, 127 Am. St. Rep. 894, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 726). We have mentioned only cases in this court. But the rule has received a like extension in our courts of intermediate appeal. In Burke v. Ireland, 26 App. Div. 487, 50 N. Y. S. 369, in an opinion by Cullen, J., it was applied to a builder who constructed a defective building; in Kahner v. Otis Elevator Co. 96 App. Div. 169, 89 N. Y. S. 185, to the manufacturer of an elevator; in Davies v. Pelham Hod Elevating Co. 65 Hun 573, 20 N. Y. S. 523, affirmed in this court without opinion, 146 N. Y. 363, 41 N. E. 88, to a contractor who furnished a defective rope with knowledge of the purpose for which the rope was to be used. We are not required at this time either to approve or to disapprove the application of the rule that was made in these cases. It is enough that they help to characterize the trend of judicial thought.

[388] Devlin v. Smith was decided in 1882. A year later a very similar case came before the Court of Appeal in England (Heaven v. Pender, 11 Q. B. D. 503). We find in the opinion of Brett, M. R., afterwards Lord Esher (p. 510), the same conception of a duty, irrespective of contract, imposed upon the manufacturer by the law itself: "Whenever one person supplies goods, or machinery, or the like, for the purpose of their being used by another person under such circumstances that every one of ordinary sense would, if he thought, recognize at once that unless he used ordinary care and skill with regard to the condition of the thing supplied or the mode of supplying it, there will be danger of injury to the person or property of him for whose use the thing is supplied, and who is to use it, a duty arises to use ordinary care and skill as to the condition or manner of supplying such thing." He then points out that for a neglect of such ordinary care or skill whereby injury happens, the appropriate remedy is an action for negligence. The right to enforce this liability is not to be confined to the immediate buyer. The right, he says, extends to the persons or class of persons for whose use the thing is supplied. It is enough that the goods "would in all probability be used at once . . . before a reasonable opportunity for discovering any defect which might exist," and that the thing supplied is of such a nature "that a neglect of ordinary care or skill as to its condition or the manner of supplying it would probably cause danger to the person or property of the person for whose use it was supplied, and who was about to use it." On the other hand, he would exclude a case "in which the goods are supplied under circumstances in which it would be a chance by whom they would be used or whether they would be used or not, or whether they would be used before there would probably be means of observing any defect," or where the goods are of such a nature that "a want of care or skill as to their condition or the manner of supplying them would not probably [389] produce danger of injury to person or property." What was said by Lord Esher in that case did not command the full assent of his associates. His opinion has been criticised "as requiring every man to take affirmative precautions to protect his neighbors as well as to refrain from injuring them" (Bohlen, Affirmative Obligations in the Law of Torts, 44 Am. Law Reg. N. S. 341). It may not be an accurate exposition of the law of England. Perhaps it may need some qualification even in our own state. Like most attempts at comprehensive definition, it may involve errors of inclusion and of exclusion. But its tests and standards, at least in their underlying principles, with whatever qualification may be called for as they are applied to varying conditions, are the tests and standards of our law.

We hold, then, that the principle of Thomas v. Winchester is not limited to poisons, explosives, and things of like nature, to things which in their normal operation are implements of destruction. If the nature of a thing is such that it is reasonably certain to place life and limb in peril when negligently made, it is then a thing of danger. Its nature gives warning of the consequences to be expected. If to the element of danger there is added knowledge that the thing will be used by persons other than the purchaser, and used without new tests, then, irrespective of contract, the manufacturer of this thing of danger is under a duty to make it carefully. That is as far as we are required to go for the decision of this case. There must be knowledge of a danger, not merely possible, but probable. It is possible to use almost anything in a way that will make it dangerous if defective. That is not enough to charge the manufacturer with a duty independent of his contract. Whether a given thing is dangerous may be sometimes a question for the court and sometimes a question for the jury. There must also be knowledge that in the usual course of events the danger will be shared by others than the buyer. Such knowledge may often be [390] inferred from the nature of the transaction. But it is possible that even knowledge of the danger and of the use will not always be enough. The proximity or remoteness of the relation is a factor to be considered. We are dealing now with the liability of the manufacturer of the finished product, who puts it on the market to be used without inspection by his customers. If he is negligent, where danger is to be foreseen, a liability will follow. We are not required at this time to say that it is legitimate to go back of the manufacturer of the finished product and hold the manufacturers of the component parts. To make their negligence a cause of imminent danger, an independent cause must often intervene; the manufacturer of the finished product must also fail in his duty of inspection. It may be that in those circumstances the negligence of the earlier members of the series is too remote to constitute, as to the ultimate user, an actionable wrong (Beven on Negligence [3d ed.] 50, 51, 54; Wharton on Negligence [2d ed.] § 134; Leeds v. New York Telephone Co. 178 N. Y. 118, 70 N. E. 219; Sweet v. Perkins, 196 N. Y. 482, 9 N. E. 50; Hayes v. Hyde Park, 153 Mass. 514, 516, 27 N. E. 522, 12 L.R.A. 249). We leave that question open. We shall have to deal with it when it arises. The difficulty which it suggests is not present in this case. There is here no break in the chain of cause and effect. In such circumstances, the presence of a known danger, attendant upon a known use, makes vigilance a duty. We have put aside the notion that the duty to safeguard life and limb, when the consequences of negligence may be foreseen, grows out of contract and nothing else. We have put the source of the obligation where it ought to be. We have put its source in the law.

From this survey of the decisions, there thus emerges a definition of the duty of a manufacturer which enables us to measure this defendant's liability. Beyond all question, the nature of an automobile gives warning of probable danger if its construction is defective. This [391] automobile was designed to go fifty miles an hour. Unless its wheels were sound and strong, injury was almost certain. It was as much a thing of danger as a defective engine for a railroad. The defendant knew the danger. It knew also that the car would be used by persons other than the buyer. This was apparent from its size; there were seats for three persons. It was apparent also from the fact that the buyer was a dealer in cars, who bought to resell. The maker of this car supplied it for the use of purchasers from the dealer just as plainly as the contractor in Devlin v. Smith supplied the scaffold for use by the servants of the owner. The dealer was indeed the one person of whom it might be said with some approach to certainty that by him the car would not be used. Yet the defendant would have us say that he was the one person whom it was under a legal duty to protect. The law does not lead us to so inconsequent a conclusion. Precedents drawn from the days of travel by stage coach do not fit the conditions of travel to-day. The principle that the danger must be imminent does not change, but the things subject to the principle do change. They are whatever the needs of life in a developing civilization require them to be.

In reaching this conclusion, we do not ignore the decisions to the contrary in other jurisdictions. It was held in Cadillac Motor Car Co. v. Johnson, 221 Fed. 801, 137 C. C. A. 279, L.R.A.1915F 287, that an automobile is not within the rule of Thomas v. Winchester. There was, however, a vigorous dissent. Opposed to that decision is one of the Court of Appeals of Kentucky (Olds Motor Works v. Shaffer, 145 Ky. 616, Ann. Cas. 1913B 689, 140 S. W. 1047, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 560). The earlier cases are summarized by Judge Sanborn in Huset v. J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. 120 Fed. 865, 57 C. C. A. 237, 61 L.R.A. 303. Some of them, at first sight inconsistent with our conclusion, may be reconciled upon the ground that the negligence was too remote, and that another cause had intervened. But even when they cannot be reconciled, the difference is rather in the application [392] of the principle than in the principle itself. Judge Sanborn says, for example, that the contractor who builds a bridge, or the manufacturer who builds a car, cannot ordinarily foresee injury to other persons than the owner as the probable result (120 Fed. 865, 867). We take a different view. We think that injury to others is to be foreseen not merely as a possible, but as an almost inevitable result. (See the trenchant criticism in Bohlen, supra, 351.) Indeed, Judge Sanborn concedes that his view is not to be reconciled with our decision in Devlin v. Smith (supra). The doctrine of that decision has now become the settled law of this state, and we have no desire to depart from it.

In England the limits of the rule are still unsettled. Winterbottom v. Wright, 10 M. & W. 109 is often cited. The defendant undertook to provide a mail coach to carry the mail bags. The coach broke down from latent defects in its construction. The defendant, however, was not the manufacturer. The court held that he was not liable for injuries to a passenger. The case was decided on a demurrer to the declaration. Lord Esher points out in Heaven v. Pender (supra, at p. 513) that the form of the declaration was subject to criticism. It did not fairly suggest the existence of a duty aside from the special contract which was the plaintiff's main reliance. (See the criticism of Winterbottom v. Wright, in Bohlen, supra, at pp. 281, 283.) At all events, in Heaven v. Pender (supra), the defendant, a dock owner, who put up a staging outside a ship, was held liable to the servants of the shipowner. In Elliott v. Hall, 15 Q. B. D. 315, the defendant sent out a defective truck laden with goods which he had sold. The buyer's servants unloaded it, and were injured because of the defects. It was held that the defendant was under a duty "not to be guilty of negligence with regard to the state and condition of the truck." There seems to have been a [393] return to the doctrine of Winterbottom v. Wright in Earl v. Lubbock [1905] 1 K. B. 253, 1 Ann. Cas. 753. In that case, however, as in the earlier one, the defendant was not the manufacturer. He had merely made a contract to keep the van in repair. A later case (White v. Steadman [1913] 3 K. B. 340, 348) emphasizes that element. A livery stable keeper who sent out a vicious horse was held liable not merely to his customer but also to another occupant of the carriage, and Thomas v. Winchester was cited and followed (White v. Steadman, supra, at pp. 348, 349). It was again cited and followed in Dominion Natural Gas Co. v. Collins [1909] A. C. 640, 646. From these cases a consistent principle is with difficulty extracted. The English courts, however, agree with ours in holding that one who invites another to make use of an appliance is bound to the exercise of reasonable care (Caledonian R. Co. v. Mulholland [1898] A. C. 216, 227; Indermaur v. Dames, L. R. 1 C. P. 274). That at bottom is the underlying principle of Devlin v. Smith. The contractor who builds the scaffold invites the owner's workmen to use it. The manufacturer who sells the automobile to the retail dealer invites the dealer's customers to use it. The invitation is addressed in the one case to determinate persons and in the other to an indeterminate class, but in each case it is equally plain, and in each its consequences must be the same.

There is nothing anomalous in a rule which imposes upon A, who has contracted with B, a duty to C and D and others according as he knows or does not know that the subject-matter of the contract is intended for their use. We may find an analogy in the law which measures the liability of landlords. If A leases to B a tumbledown house he is not liable, in the absence of fraud, to B's guests who enter it and are injured. This is because B is then under the duty to repair it, the lessor has the right to suppose that he will fulfill that duty, and, if he [394] omits to do so, his guests must look to him (Bohlen, supra, at p. 276). But if A leases a building to be used by the lessee at once as a place of public entertainment, the rule is different. There injury to persons other than the lessee is to be foreseen, and foresight of the consequences involves the creation of a duty (Junkermann v. Tilyou Realty Co. 213 N. Y. 404, 108 N. E. 190, L.R.A.1915F 700, and cases there cited).

In this view of the defendant's liability there is nothing inconsistent with the theory of liability on which the case was tried. It is true that the court told the jury that "an automobile is not an inherently dangerous vehicle." The meaning, however, is made plain by the context. The meaning is that danger is not to be expected when the vehicle is well constructed. The court left it to the jury to say whether the defendant ought to have foreseen that the car, if negligently constructed, would become "imminently dangerous." Subtle distinctions are drawn by the defendant between things inherently dangerous and things imminently dangerous, but the case does not turn upon these verbal niceties. If danger was to be expected as reasonably certain, there was a duty of vigilance, and this whether you call the danger inherent or imminent. In varying forms that thought was put before the jury. We do not say that the court would not have been justified in ruling as a matter of law that the car was a dangerous thing. If there was any error, it was none of which the defendant can complain.

We think the defendant was not absolved from a duty of inspection because it bought the wheels from a reputable manufacturer. It was not merely a dealer in automobiles. It was a manufacturer of automobiles. It was responsible for the finished product. It was not at liberty to put the finished product on the market without subjecting the components parts to ordinary and simple tests (Richmond, etc. R. Co. v. Elliott, 149 U. S. 266, 272, 13 S. Ct. 837, 37 U. S. (L. ed.) 728). Under the charge of the trial judge nothing more was [395] required of it. The obligation to inspect must vary with the nature of the thing to be inspected. The more probable the danger, the greater the need of caution. There is little analogy between this case and Carlson v. Phoenix Bridge Co. 132 N. Y. 273, 30 N. E. 750, where the defendant bought a tool for a servant's use. The making of tools was not the business in which the master was engaged. Reliance on the skill of the manufacturer was proper and almost inevitable. But that is not the defendant's situation. Both by its relation to the work and by the nature of its business, it is charged with a stricter duty.

Other rulings complained of have been considered, but no error has been found in them.

The judgment should be affirmed with costs.

WILLARD BARTLETT, Ch. J. (dissenting).—The plaintiff was injured in consequence of the collapse of a wheel of an automobile manufactured by the defendant corporation which sold it to a firm of automobile dealers in Schenectady, who in turn sold the car to the plaintiff. The wheel was purchased by the Buick Motor Company, ready made, from the Imperial Wheel Company of Flint, Michigan, a reputable manufacturer of automobile wheels which had furnished the defendant with eighty thousand wheels, none of which had proved to be made of defective wood prior to the accident in the present case. The defendant relied upon the wheel manufacturer to make all necessary tests as to the strength of the material therein and made no such tests itself. The present suit is an action for negligence brought by the subvendee of the motor car against the manufacturer as the original vendor. The evidence warranted a finding by the jury that the wheel which collapsed was defective when it left the hands of the defendant. The automobile was being prudently operated at the time of the accident and was moving at a speed of only eight miles an hour. There was [396] no allegation or proof of any actual knowledge of the defect on the part of the defendant or any suggestion that any element of fraud or deceit or misrepresentation entered into the sale.

The theory upon which the case was submitted to the jury by the learned judge who presided at the trial was that, although an automobile is not an inherently dangerous vehicle, it may become such if equipped with a weak wheel; and that if the motor car in question, when it was put upon the market was in itself inherently dangerous by reason of its being equipped with a weak wheel, the defendant was chargeable with a knowledge of the defect so far as it might be discovered by a reasonable inspection and the application of reasonable tests. This liability, it was further held, was not limited to the original vendee, but extended to a subvendee like the plaintiff, who was not a party to the original contract of sale.

I think that these rulings, which have been approved by the Appellate Division, extend the liability of the vendor of a manufactured article further than any case which has yet received the sanction of this court. It has heretofore been held in this state that the liability of the vendor of a manufactured article for negligence arising out of the existence of defects therein does not extend to strangers injured in consequence of such defects but is confined to the immediate vendee. The exceptions to this general rule which have thus far been recognized in New York are cases in which the article sold was of such a character that danger to life or limb was involved in the ordinary use thereof: in other words, where the article sold was inherently dangerous. As has already been pointed out, the learned trial judge instructed the jury that an automobile is not an inherently dangerous vehicle.

The late Chief Justice Cooley of Michigan, one of the most learned and accurate of American law writers, [397] states the general rule thus: "The general rule is that a contractor, manufacturer, vendor or furnisher of an article is not liable to third parties who have no contractual relations with him for negligence in the construction, manufacture or sale of such article." (2 Cooley on Torts [3d ed.] 1486.)

the same subject refer, is Winterbottom v. Wright, 10 M. & W. 109, which was an action by the driver of a stage coach against a contractor who had agreed with the postmaster-general to provide and keep the vehicle in repair for the purpose of conveying the royal mail over a prescribed route. The coach broke down and upset, injuring the driver, who sought to recover against the contractor on account of its defective construction. The Court of Exchequer denied him any right of recovery on the ground that there was no privity of contract between the parties, the agreement having been made with the postmaster-general alone. "If the plaintiff can sue," said Lord Abinger, the Chief Baron, "every passenger or even any person passing along the road, who was injured by the upsetting of the coach, might bring a similar action. Unless we confine the operation of such contracts as this to the parties who enter into them, the most absurd and outrageous consequences, to which I can see no limit, would ensue."

The doctrine of that decision was recognized as the law of this state by the leading New York case of Thomas v. Winchester, 6 N. Y. 397, 408, 57 Am. Dec. 455, which, however, involved an exception to the general rule. There the defendant, who was a dealer in medicines, sold to a druggist a quantity of belladonna, which is a deadly poison, negligently labeled as extract of dandelion. The druggist in good faith used the poison in filling a prescription calling for the harmless dandelion extract and the plaintiff for whom the prescription was put up was poisoned by the [398] belladonna. This court held that the original vendor was liable for the injuries suffered by the patient. Chief Judge Rugles, who delivered the opinion of the court, distinguished between an act of negligence imminently dangerous to the lives of others and one that is not so, saying: "If A. build a wagon and sells it to B., who sells it to C. and C. hires it to D., who in consequence of the gross negligence of A. in building the wagon is overturned and injured, D. cannot recover damages against A., the builder. A's obligation to build the wagon faithfully, arises solely out of his contract with B. The public have nothing to do with it. . . . So, for the same reason, if a horse be defectively shod by a smith, and a person hiring the horse from the owner is thrown and injured in consequence of the smith's negligence in shoeing; the smith is not liable for the injury."

In Torgesen v. Schultz, 192 N. Y. 156, 159, 84 N. E. 956, 127 Am. St. Rep. 894, 18 L.R.A. (N. S.) 726, the defendant was the vendor of bottles of aerated water which were charged under high pressure and likely to explode unless used with precaution when exposed to sudden changes of temperature. The plaintiff, who was a servant of the purchaser, was injured by the explosion of one of these bottles. There was evidence tending to show that it had not been properly tested in order to insure users against such accidents. We held that the defendant corporation was liable notwithstanding the absence of any contract relation between it and the plaintiff "under the doctrine of Thomas v. Winchester (supra), and similar cases based upon the duty of the vendor of an article dangerous in its nature, or likely to become so in the course of the ordinary usage to be contemplated by the vendor, either to exercise due care to warn users of the danger or to take reasonable care to prevent the article sold from proving dangerous when subjected only to customary usage." The character of the exception to the general rule limiting liability for negligence to the original parties to the contract of sale, was still more clearly stated by Judge [399] Hiscock, writing for the court in Statler v. George A. Ray Mfg. Co. 195 N. Y. 478, 482, 88 N. E. 1063, where he said that "in the case of an article of an inherently dangerous nature, a manufacturer may become liable for a negligent construction which, when added to the inherent character of the appliance, makes it imminently dangerous, and causes or contributes to a resulting injury not necessarily incident to the use of such an article if properly constructed, but naturally following from a defective construction." In that case the injuries were inflicted by the explosion of a battery of steam-driven coffee urns, constituting an appliance liable to become dangerous in the course of ordinary usage.

The case of Devlin v. Smith, 89 N. Y. 470, 42 Am. Rep. 311, is cited as an authority in conflict with the view that the liability of the manufacturer and vendor extends to third parties only when the article manufactured and sold is inherently dangerous. In that case the builder of a scaffold ninety feet high which was erected for the purpose of enabling painters to stand upon it, was held to be liable to the administratrix of a painter who fell therefrom and was killed, being at the time in the employ of the person for whom the scaffold was built. It is said that the scaffold if properly constructed was not inherently dangerous; and hence that this decision affirms the existence of liability in the case of an article not dangerous in itself but made so only in consequence of negligent construction. Whatever logical force there may be in this view it seems to me clear from the language of Judge Rapallo, who wrote the opinion of the court, that the scaffold was deemed to be an inherently dangerous structure; and that the case was decided as it was because the court entertained that view.

Otherwise he would hardly have said, as he did, that the circumstances seemed to bring the case fairly within the principle of Thomas v. Winchester.

I do not see how we can uphold the judgment in the [400] present case without overruling what has been so often said by this court and other courts of like authority in reference to the absence of any liability for negligence on the part of the original vendor of an ordinary carriage to any one except his immediate vendee. The absence of such liability was the very point actually decided in the English case of Winterbottom v. Wright (supra), and the illustration quoted from the opinion of Chief Judge Ruggles in Thomas v. Winchester (supra) assumes that the law on the subject was so plain that the statement would be accepted almost as a matter of course. In the case at bar the defective wheel on an automobile moving only eight miles an hour was not any more dangerous to the occupants of the car than a similarly defective wheel would be to the occupants of a carriage drawn by a horse at the same speed; and yet unless the courts have been all wrong on this question up to the present time there would be no liability to strangers to the original sale in the case of the horse-drawn carriage.

The rule upon which, in my judgment, the determination of this case depends, and the recognized exceptions thereto, were discussed by Circuit Judge Sanborn of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals in the Eighth Circuit, in Huset v. J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. 120 Fed. 865, 57 C. C. A. 237, 61 L.R.A. 303, in an opinion which reviews all the leading American and English decisions on the subject up to the time when it was rendered (1903). I have already discussed the leading New York cases, but as to the rest I feel that I can add nothing to the learning of that opinion or the cogency of its reasoning. I have examined the cases to which Judge Sanborn refers, but if I were to discuss them at length I should be forced merely to paraphrase his language, as a study of the authorities he cites has led me to the same conclusion; and the repetition of what has already been so well said would contribute nothing to the advantage of the bench, the bar or the individual litigants whose case is before us.

[401] A few cases decided since his opinion was written, however, may be noticed. In Earl v. Lubbock [1905] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 253, 1 Ann. Cas. 753, the Court of Appeal in 1904 considered and approved the propositions of law laid down by the Court of Exchequer in Winterbottom v. Wright (supra), declaring that the decision in that case, since the year 1842, had stood the test of repeated discussion. The master of the rolls approved the principles laid down by Lord Abinger as based upon sound reasoning; and all the members of the court agreed that his decision was a controlling authority which must be followed. That the Federal courts still adhere to the general rule, as I have stated it, appears by the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals in the Second Circuit, in March, 1915, in the case of Cadillac Motor Car Co. v. Johnson, 221 Fed. 801, 137 C. C. A. 279, L.R.A.1915E 287. That case, like this, was an action by a subvendee against a manufacturer of automobiles for negligence in failing to discover that one of its wheels was defective, the court holding that such an action could not be maintained. It is true there was a dissenting opinion in that case, but it was based chiefly upon the proposition that rules applicable to stage coaches are archaic when applied to automobiles and that if the law did not afford a remedy to strangers to the contract the law should be changed. If this be true, the change should be effected by the legislature and not by the courts. A perusal of the opinion in that case and in the Huset case will disclose how uniformly the courts throughout this country have adhered to the rule and how consistently they have refused to broaden the scope of the exceptions. I think we should adhere to it in the case at bar and, therefore, I vote for a reversal of this judgment.

Hiscock, Chase and Cuddeback, JJ., concur with Cardozo, J., and Hogan, J., concurs in result; Willard Bartlett, Ch. J., reads dissenting opinion; Pound, J., not voting.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE.

The reported case discusses at length the rule that the manufacturer of an article which, by reason of a defect therein discoverable by inspection, is a source of peril to a user thereof, is liable to an ultimate purchaser for an injury resulting from the existence of that defect. The rule, the court holds, is applicable to an automobile having a defective wheel, and it is held that the manufacturer is not exonerated by the fact that he purchases the defective wheel from a reputable manufacturer. The liability of the maker of an automobile to a third person for the defective construction thereof is discussed in the note to Olds Motor Works v. Shaffer, Ann. Cas. 1913B 689.

Accident Insurance — Limitation of Time to Sue — Validity.

A provision in an accident policy requiring suit to be brought, if at all, within one year from the date of the accident on which the suit is predicated is valid.

Waiver of Limitation.

A provision in an accident policy requiring suit to be brought within a year, if at all, is matter for the benefit of the company and may be waived.

Same.

An accident policy was issued October 19, 1908, and two days thereafter plaintiff suffered accidental injuries which were the basis of the suit. He seasonably filed proofs of injury which were rejected, and nothing further was done until October 26, 1911, when defendant, at the suggestion of the State Insurance Commissioner, requested full information concerning the nature of the accident, stating that on receipt of the same the company would open the case. This request was complied with, and plaintiff continued from time to time to furnish other papers and proofs until on November 9, 1911, when defendant sent plaintiff a check for $25 in full settlement, which he promptly returned and brought suit. Held, that defendant's acts constituted a waiver of the policy provision requiring suit to be brought, if at all, within a year after the date of the accident on which the suit was predicated.

[See note at end of this case.]

Reduction of Benefits — Construction of Policy.

An accident policy provided that, in the event of disability due wholly or in part to or resulting directly or indirectly from hernia commencing or appearing after the policy had been in force for 60 days preceding, the limit of the company's liability should be one-third of the amount that would otherwise be payable under the policy. Held, that such clause, construed most strongly against the insurance company, provided no limitation in case hernia resulted within the 60-day period, in which case the company was liable for full indemnity.

Action on accident insurance policy. Burnice B. Bates, plaintiff, and German Commercial Accident Company, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff alleges

[129] POWERS, J.—The accident policy which the plaintiff held in the defendant company contained a provision which, read in connection with P. S. 4823, limited the period within which a suit thereon could be brought to one year from the date of the accident on which it was predicated. This policy was issued October 19, 1908, and on the twenty-first the plaintiff suffered the accidental injuries which form the basis of this suit. He seasonably filed with the defendant proofs of his injury and his [130] claim was promptly rejected. Nothing further was said or done by either party until October 26, 1911, when, as stated in the defendant's brief, at the suggestion of the State Insurance Commissioners, the defendant began a correspondence with the plaintiff regarding the matter. On that date, the defendant's treasurer wrote the plaintiff a letter in which, after referring to the company's desire to meet all requirements of the commissioner's committee, he said: "Will you be kind enough to give us full information regarding the nature of the accident which occurred to you on October 21, 1908. Kindly be specific in your dates giving us the length of time you were disabled from this injury, and stating the nature of the accident and how it occurred. On receipt of same, this Company will reopen your case." This request was complied with, and on October 31, 1911, the treasurer again wrote the plaintiff, saying: "We are enclosing herewith final claim papers which you and the attending physician will kindly fill in with the information relative to your accident of Oct. 21, 1908. Also kindly give the name of the hospital at Burlington, Vt., in which you were operated on. In forwarding you these blanks, we must request that you kindly answer each and every question asked as it will facilitate matters greatly and we are very anxious to have your claim finally disposed of." These requests were also complied with by the plaintiff. On November 6, 1911, the treasurer again wrote the plaintiff acknowledging receipt of his claim papers, and calling for still further information by way of an attested statement of a notary public that the plaintiff was physically sound and without any hernia prior to the accident. This, too, was furnished. Finally, on November 9, the treasurer sent the plaintiff a check for $25 expressed to be in full settlement, and called attention to certain provisions of the policy to show that this was the amount recoverable. The plaintiff returned the check and brought this suit. The validity of the limitation clause is not and could not be questioned. Wilson v. Aetna Ins. Co. 27 Vt. 99; Morrill v. New England F. Ins. Co. 71 Vt. 281, 44 Atl. 358. It was, however, inserted in the policy for the benefit of the company, and may be waived. Thompson v. Phenix Ins. Co. 136 U. S. 287, 10 S. Ct. 1019, 34 U. S. (L. ed.) 408. It stands just like any other such provision in the policy,—no better and no worse. The waiver may be oral or written, express or implied, before or after forfeiture; it requires no new consideration and need not amount to an estoppel [131] to be effective. Webster v. State Mut. F. Ins. Co. 81 Vt. 75, 69 Atl. 319. The facts here relied upon to constitute a waiver were subsequent to the forfeiture, and while one or two isolated cases can be found holding that the waiver must occur within the period of limitation, by the better reason the true rule is that if, in any negotiations with the assured, after knowledge of the forfeiture, the company recognizes the continued validity of the policy, does acts based thereon, or requires the insured by virtue thereof to incur trouble or expense, the forfeiture is, as matter of law, waived, and cannot thereafter be asserted by the company. And so are the authorities. Titus v. Glens Falls Ins. Co. 81 N. Y. 410; Roby v. American Cent. Ins. Co. 120 N. Y. 510, 24 N. E. 808; Covenant Mut. L. Assoc. v. Baughman, 73 Ill. App. 544; DeFarconnet v. Western Ins. Co. 110 Fed. 405, affirmed 122 Fed. 448, 58 C. C. A. 612; Coursin v. Pennsylvania Ins. Co. 46 Pa. St. 323; New England Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Springate, 129 Ky. 627, 112 S. W. 681, 113 S. W. 824, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 227; Rundell v. Anchor F. Ins. Co. 128 Ia. 575, 105 N. W. 112, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 20; Oshkosh Gas-Light Co. v. Germania F. Ins. Co. 71 Wis. 454, 37 N. W. 819, 5 Am. St. Rep. 233; Brown v. State Ins. Co. 74 Ia. 428, 38 N. W. 135, 7 Am. St. Rep. 495; Queen Ins. Co. v. Young, 86 Ala. 424, 5 So. 116, 11 Am. St. Rep. 51; Bonnert v. Pennsylvania Ins. Co. 129 Pa. St. 558, 18 Atl. 552, 15 Am. St. Rep. 739; Murray v. Home Ben. L. Assoc. 90 Cal. 402, 27 Pac. 309, 25 Am. St. Rep. 133; Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co. v. Norton, 96 U. S. 234, 24 U. S. (L. ed.) 689; Webster v. State Mut. F. Ins. Co. 81 Vt. 75, 69 Atl. 319.

This record presents a typical case of waiver under this rule. It shows in unmistakable terms that the company, with full knowledge, treated the policy as valid; that it acted upon it; and that it required the plaintiff to go to trouble and expense under it, on the assurance that the company would thereupon re-open his case.

But the defendant says that our own cases stand in the way of this result, and calls attention to Williams v. Vermont Mut. F. Ins. Co. 20 Vt. 222; Wilson v. Aetna Ins. Co.

27 Vt. 102; Higgins v. Windsor County Mut. F. Ins. Co. 54 Vt. 271, and Morrill v. New England F. Ins. Co. 71 Vt. 281, 44 Atl. 358. Of these, only the first-named requires special consideration, for the others are manifestly no authority for the defendant's position. The Williams case was decided in 1848, and it was held that the cause of action upon the fire policy there involved having become barred by a limitation in the charter of the company could not be revived by an acknowledgment or new promise. It is apparent [132] that this decision is predicated upon a theory of insurance contracts which has long been abandoned. But it is not necessary to criticise the case, for it is clearly distinguishable from the case in hand. The limitation there involved was in the charter of the company; here it is in the policy. There the forfeiture was statutory; here it is contractual. There the court regarded the provision as a limitation of the liability; here it must be regarded as a limitation of the remedy. This distinction is pointed out in the case and it was said that it was unnecessary to consider what effect the conduct of the directors would have had in the ordinary case of debt,—thus leaving undecided the very question here involved.

The policy contains a provision which, so far as need be recited, is as follows: "In the event of . . . disability . . . due wholly or in part to, or resulting directly or indirectly from . . . hernia . . . cancer or any chronic disease commencing or appearing after this policy has been maintained in continuous force for sixty days preceding, . . . then . . . the limit of the company's liability shall be one-third of the amount that would otherwise be payable under this policy."

As we have seen, the plaintiff's injury was received on the second day after the policy was issued; one of its immediate results was a hernia. The parties disagree as to the effect of the foregoing provision on the amount recoverable. Construing the language of this paragraph against the company, as we are bound to do, Brink v. Merchants', etc. Ins. Co. 49 Vt. 442, Mosley v. Vermont Mut. F. Ins. Co. 55 Vt. 142, the clause regarding the sixty days relates to and modifies the word "hernia." Indeed, counsel for the defendant so construes it in his brief; and he says that the injury to the plaintiff comes within the excepting clause, "which," he says, "when fairly construed, is this: For disability on account of hernia occurring within sixty days from the date of the policy, no liability on the company; hence no right of action." And if the hernia occurs after the sixty days, one-third indemnity.

But this cannot be so. The clause only mentions hernias which occur after the sixty days; those that occur within the sixty days are not alluded to at all; and so they stand like other injuries. The result is, that for hernia which results within the sixty days, the policy provides full indemnity.

[133] The judgment must be reversed, but it will not be necessary to remand the case, as the record discloses sufficient facts to enable us to render the proper judgment. Ellis v. Durkee, 79 Vt. 341, 65 Atl. 94.

The findings show that the plaintiff was totally disabled for four months and seven days, and partially disabled for five months. His total disability calls for $105.83, and his partial disability for $62.50,—or $168.33 in all. To this should be added interest from October 24, 1908, the date on which the company rejected the claim.

Judgment reversed and judgment rendered for the plaintiff to recover $168.33 with interest thereon from October 24, 1908.

What Does Not Amount to Waiver, 451.

Waiver of Exemption Period before Suit, 452.

Generally.

It is well settled that a provision in an accident insurance policy limiting the time within which the insured or his beneficiary can bring suit to enforce payment of the policy is for the benefit of the insurance company and therefore can be waived by the company. North American Acc. Ins. Co. v. Williamson, 118 Ill. App. 670; Hansell-Elcock Co. v. Frankfort Marine Acc. etc. Ins. Co. 177 Ill. App. 500; Continental Casualty Co. v. Hunt, 53 Ind. App. 657, 101 N. E. 519; Turner v. Fidelity, etc. Co. 112 Mich. 425, 70 N. W. 898, 4 Detroit Leg. N. 85, 67 Am. St. Rep. 428, 38 L.R.A. 529; Wondra v. National L. Ins. Co. 126 Minn. 136, 147 N. W. 961; Association v. Beidelman, 1 Mona (Pa.) 481; American Acc. Ins. Co. v. Norment, 91 Tenn. 1, 18 S. W. 395. See also the reported case. And see generally the cases cited throughout this note. In Turner v. Fidelity, etc. Co. supra, the court said: "Such clauses in policies of insurance, while held valid as contracts, may be waived by the company. The law does not favor clauses of limitation in policies of insurance, and they are strictly construed, and it does not require the positive act of the company inducing postponement; but, where the evidence is conflicting, the question of waiver is one for the jury."

The waiver may be by agreement, supported by a sufficient consideration; or it may be independent of any agreement. Thus, in Creem v. Fidelity, etc. Co. 141 App. Div. 493, 126 N. Y. S. 555, wherein it appeared that the defendant had contracted to insure the plaintiff against loss on account of accident to certain third persons, both clauses of waiver were discussed as follows: "The promise, . . . necessarily involved an agreement to waive the limitation clause, and it was supported by sufficient consideration because it was made to obtain the co-operation of these plaintiffs in the defense which counsel desired to make and to induce them not to employ other counsel who might have insisted upon a different defense. However, we do not need to rest the decision on the ground of an agreement to waive the limitation clause, supported by a sufficient consideration, because a case of technical waiver, as well as estoppel, is established, not by reason of the promise alone, because no forfeiture had then occurred, but by reason of the promise together with the subsequent conduct. . . . While the defendant had the right under the policy to insist upon non-interference by the plaintiffs and was obliged to defend in their behalf, it could not exercise that right or discharge that duty so as to prolong the litigation until the plaintiffs' rights were forfeited. By giving the plaintiffs notice of the suits and by then procuring them not to interfere the defendant assumed the defense on their behalf pursuant to the provisions of the policy and the promise to protect them, which was but a renewal of its obligations under the policy, and it could not continue in that relation a moment beyond the three-year period without recognizing its continued obligation under the policy. When it ceased to represent the plaintiffs it was bound to turn the defense over to them, and its failure to do that amounted to a technical waiver of the limitation clause."

Waiver of Final Limitation of Time to Sue.

IN GENERAL.

It is generally held that where the insurance company causes the insured, or the beneficiary, to delay suit beyond the time limited in the contract the company thereby waives the limitation. Metropolitan Acc. Assoc. v. Froiland, 181 Ill. 30, 43 N. E. 766, 52 Am. St. Rep. 359; Continental Casualty Co. v. Hunt, 53 Ind. App. 657, 101 N. E. 519; Creem v. Fidelity, etc. Co. 141 App.

Div. 493, 126 N. Y. S. 555. A waiver frequently results from a delay beyond the period of limitation caused by the company's holding out to the insured a hope of an adjustment. Lynchburg Cotton Mill Co. v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 149 Fed. 954, 79 C. C. A. 464, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 654, reversing 140 Fed. 718; North American Acc. Ins. Co. v. Williamson, 118 Ill. App. 670; Clark v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 185 Ill. App. 580; Turner v. Fidelity, etc. Co. 112 Mich. 425, 70 N. W. 898, 4 Detroit Leg. N. 85, 67 Am. St. Rep. 428, 38 L.R.A. 529; Dolsen v. Phoenix Preferred Acc. Ins. Co. 161 Mich. 228, 115 N. W. 60, 14 Detroit Leg. N. 894; Mastenbrook v. U. S. Accident Assoc. 154 Mich. 16, 117 N. W. 543, 15 Detroit Leg. N. 697; Harold v. People's Mut. Acc. Ins. Co. 2 Pa. Dist. 503, 12 Pa. Co. Ct. 454. See also Norwood v. Preferred Acc. Ins. Co. 56 Misc. 529, 107 N. Y. S. 104. Thus in Dolsen v. Phoenix Preferred Acc. Ins. Co. supra, the court said: "On November 5, 1906, defendant's general counsel wrote the following letter: 'Yours of Oct. 30th duly received. In reply will say that files and your letter were handed to me some time in September, and by me referred back to the secretary of the Insurance Co. for further investigation as to some of the facts and has not been returned to me. I will get the files at my earliest convenience, and thereupon give the matter my prompt attention. Owing to my absence from the city, your letter of the 30th was not received by me or called to my attention until this afternoon, and unfortunately I will leave the city today, and will therefore be unable to give the Dolsen matter any attention until the latter part of the week. Asking you to patiently bear with me, I beg to remain,' etc. . . . [The] letter of November 5th authorized the delay of plaintiff's counsel, in the absence of further communication, and waived the contract limitation as to the time of bringing suit."

In Continental Casualty Co. v. Hunt, 53 Ind. App. 657, 101 N. E. 519, it was held that a request not to bring suit waived the limitation. In Metropolitan Acc. Assoc. v. Froiland, 161 Ill. 30, 43 N. E. 766, 52 Am. St. Rep. 359, it appeared that the by-laws of the insurance association were expressly made a part of the contract of insurance. Soon after the death of the insured, the beneficiary of the policy went to the office of the association and asked for a copy of the by-laws. This request was refused. The beneficiary then inquired how much time she had within which to bring suit and was informed that she had three months. She brought suit within three months but after the expiration of the period limited in the by-law. The court held that the association had waived the by-law.

It has been said that slight evidence is sufficient to establish a waiver of the contractual limitation. North American Acc. Ins. Co. v. Williamson, 118 Ill. App. 670. See also Creem v. Fidelity, etc. Co. 141 App. Div. 493, 126 N. Y. S. 555.

The holding of the reported case to the effect that the acts of the company constituting a waiver may occur after the expiration of the period of limitation finds support in the following cases. Norwood v. Preferred Acc. Ins. Co. 56 Misc. 529, 107 N. Y. S. 104; Harold v. People's Mut. Acc. Ins. Co. 2 Pa. Dist. 503, 12 Pa. Co. Ct. 454. In Norwood v. Preferred Acc. Ins. Co. supra, the court said: "The defendant could have insisted that, as no suit had been brought prior to August 20, 1902, the insured had forfeited or lost all right of recovery by reason of the short Statute of Limitations fixed by the policy. But, instead of that, it continued to treat the policy as valid and induced the plaintiff's attorney not to sue until further investigation could be made; and, after such further investigation, the letter of October 7, 1902, was sent, from which it appears that the defendant had concluded to renew an offer to settle, fixing a limit of time within which the offer must be accepted, and if not accepted the insured would then be at liberty to take such course as he deemed for his best interest; implying that, if he rejected the offer, he could then sue. In Titus v. Glen Falls Ins. Co. 81 N. Y. 410, 419, Judge Earl said: 'It may be asserted broadly that if, in any negotiations or transactions with the insured, after knowledge of the forfeiture, it recognizes the continued validity of the policy, or does acts based thereon, or requires the insured by virtue thereof to do some act or incur some trouble or expense, the forfeiture is as matter of law waived; and it is now settled in this court, after some difference of opinion, that such a waiver need not be based on any new agreement or an estoppel.'"

It seems that a waiver results from a failure to plead the contractual limitation, for such a limitation when not pleaded has been held to be unavailable. Keeffe v. National Acc. Soc. 4 App. Div. 392, 38 N. Y. S. 854. See also Harold v. People's Mut. Acc. Ins. Co. 2 Pa. Dist. 503, 12 Pa. Co. Ct. 454.

EFFECT OF WAIVER.

Where the final limitation of the time within which suit can be brought is waived, the effect is to nullify, and not merely to postpone, the contractual limitation; and the claim remains subject only to the general statutory limitation. Lynchburg Cotton Mill Co. v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 140 Fed. 954, 79 C. C. A. 464, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 654, reversing

87 Vt. 128.

140 Fed. 718, wherein the court said: "The reason for this is apparent, and this case is a striking illustration of what would be the ill effect of a contrary doctrine. No one would ever know when, as to such contracts the statute of limitations began or ceased to run. It would not be determinable from an examination of the contract, nor from the state statute, but would depend upon an uncertain and indefinite state of facts, as to which persons might think differently, and bring about a chaotic condition, which would be exceedingly undesirable. The requirement to sue within thirty days is a stringent clause at best in contravention of the general law on the subject, and only enforceable because of the special agreement of the parties; and it is one that cannot and should not be revived by implication, if once lost; and, besides, the equities of the case would be unfavorable to the adoption of such a policy. The insurer knowing his rights under the general law could afford to waive the clause in question, in order to effect an adjustment, and the assured likewise to make or entertain such a proposition, realizing that by so doing he would forfeit nothing, and upon failure proceed by suit within the statutory period to enforce his claim. The contrary view would result in making practically impossible any effort at compromise between the parties, certainly so far as the assured is concerned. If it be suggested that the benefit of the clause, so far as securing speedy adjustment, would be lost, the answer is that at least a specific contract for revivor of the special limitation contemplated after the failure of the settlement should be had, if it is proposed to avoid the statutory limitation."

In Creem v. Fidelity, etc. Co. 141 App. Div. 493, 126 N. Y. S. 555, the court said: "Waiver, once established, cannot be recalled."

WHAT DOES NOT AMOUNT TO WAIVER.

It is generally held that acts of the insurance company in the ordinary course of business and in good faith toward the insured, showing no intention to waive the limitation, do not amount to a waiver. Harvey v. Fidelity, etc. Co. 200 Fed. 925, 119 C. C. A. 221 (insurer denied sufficiency of proofs of death); Fitzpatrick v. North American Acc. Ins. Co. 18 Cal. App. 264, 123 Pac. 209 (insurer exacted strict compliance with requirements as to proof of death, proof being made before expirations of time limited); Metro-politan Acc. Assoc. v. Clifton, 63 Ill. App. 152 (after expiration of period of limitation, company wrote letter and telegram requesting interview, without promising to recognize claim); Hansell-Elcock Co. v. Frankfort Marine Acc. etc. Ins. Co. 177 Ill. App. 500 (agent of company listened to proposition for settlement and promised to communicate with company and advise insured to reply); Paul v. Fidelity, etc. Co. 186 Mass. 413, 71 N. E. 801, 104 Am. St. Rep. 594 (insurer failed to call attention to limitation while other parties conducted suit to restrain collection by beneficiary; and after expiration of limitation, insurer refused to pay, coupling its refusal with objection that party demanding was not proper party to compel payment); Law v. New England Mut. Acc. Assoc. 94 Mich. 266, 53 N. W. 1104 (insurer negotiated for settlement, denying liability five months before end of time limited); Harris v. Phoenix Acc. etc. Ben. Assoc. 149 Mich. 285, 112 N. W. 935 (insurer negotiated for settlement); Maynard v. U. S. Health, etc. Ins. Co. 76 N. H. 275, 81 Atl. 1077 (company admitted partial liability and negotiated for adjustment); White v. Maryland Casualty Co. 189 App. Div. 179, 123 N. Y. S. 840 (company that had insured firm against loss by accident to certain third persons denied liability and refused to defend action brought against insured).

In Harvey v. Fidelity, etc. Co. 200 Fed. 925, 119 C. C. A. 221, it appeared that the insurer on the receipt of proofs of death answered as follows: "The statements are all to the effect that Mr. Harvey must have been drowned, because he disappeared from the boat, and there was no way of saving him. That, however, is not sufficient proof that the death of Mr. Harvey was from causes covered by the accident policy; that is to say, the beneficiary must prove that death resulted directly and independently of all other causes from bodily injuries sustained through external, violent and accidental means (suicide, sane or insane, not included). The fact that he disappeared from the ship is not sufficient ground upon which to base a claim under the accident policy." In regard to this letter the court said: "Plaintiff contends that defendant's letter . . . above quoted, constituted a waiver of its right to rely upon the limitation provisions of the policy. The letter itself is a refutation of this contention. In it the defendant impliedly admitted the death of Mr. Harvey, and denied liability solely upon the ground that the proofs did not show that his death was caused by accident within the terms of the policy. There was no request for delay, or for further proofs of death; and no intimation that the defendant intended to waive any of its rights under its contract."

A waiver of the provision as to the time for filing proof of disability does not effect a waiver of the provision limiting the time for suit. Maynard v. U. S. Health, etc. Ins. Co. 76 N. H. 275, 81 Atl. 1077. Compare Cole v. Preferred Acc. Ins. Co. 40 Misc. 266, 81 N. Y. S. 901, affirmed 92 App. Div. 613, 86 N. Y. S. 1132; Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Harvey, 82 Va. 949, 5 S. E. 553 (wherein it appeared that filing of proof was waived altogether).

Waiver of Exemption Period before Suit.

The authorities are agreed that a denial by the insurer of all liability on a policy waives a provision in the policy fixing a period after the accident within which suit cannot be brought. Depue v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 166 Fed. 183; U. S. Casualty Co. v. Hanson, 20 Colo. App. 393, 79 Pac. 176; American Home Circle v. Eggers, 137 Ill. App. 595; Binder v. National Masonic Acc. Assoc. 127 Ia. 25, 102 N. W. 190; Continental Casualty Co. v. Mathis, 160 Ky. 477, 150 S. W. 507; Dulaney v. Fidelity, etc. Co. 106 Md. 17, 66 Atl. 614; Phillips v. U. S. Benevolent Soc. 120 Mich. 142, 79 N. W. 1, 6 Detroit Leg. N. 91, affirmed on rehearing 125 Mich. 186, 84 N. W. 57, 7 Detroit Leg. N. 466; Zeitler v. National Casualty Co. 124 Minn. 478, 145 N. W. 395; Wondra v. National L. Ins. Co. 126 Minn. 136, 147 N. W. 961; Modera Brotherhood of America v. Cummings, 68 Neb. 256, 94 N. W. 144; Darling v. Protective Assur. Soc. 71 Misc. 113, 127 N. Y. S. 486; Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Harvey, 82 Va. 949, 5 S. E. 553; French v. Fidelity, etc. Co. 135 Wis. 259, 115 N. W. 869, 17 L.R.A.(N. S.) 1011. Compare Texas Short Line R. Co. v. Waymire (Tex.) 89 S. W. 452, wherein it appeared that by the contract the insurer could not become liable until the insured had sustained loss by reason of satisfying a judgment in favor of the injured third party. Thus in French v. Fidelity, etc. Co. supra, the court said: "Stipulations in policies of insurance that the loss should be paid within a specified time after proofs of loss are furnished and postponing action in the meantime are for the purpose of enabling the insurer before paying the loss to make a full investigation with a view of determining his liability and its extent and to discharge the obligation, if any, without the costs of suit. If the insurer repudiates any obligation under the policy there can be no reason for further delay, and it cannot be prejudiced by an immediate action. Hence it is held both on reason and authority that a denial of any liability on a policy is a waiver of the right of the company to have the stipulated time before suit is begun, and that the action may be commenced at once." In regard to a waiver by a denial of liability, the court in Hansell-Elcock Co. v. Frankfort Marine Acc. etc. Ins. Co. 177 Ill. App. 500, said: "From all the authorities we deduce the rule that where, and only where, a limitation by contract is an existing and available defense, at the time the company denies liability on other grounds and ignores such limitation, it is waived and cannot afterwards be relied upon as a defense."

Consonant with the foregoing line of decisions, it has been held that a refusal on the part of the insurer to treat with the insured as to liability except on prejudicial and illegal conditions amounts to a waiver of the period of exemption provided for in the contract. American Acc. Ins. Co. v. Norment, 91 Tenn. 1, 18 S. W. 395.

Likewise it has been held that waiver results from a demand for stronger proof than the insured is required to furnish in order to render the company liable. Preferred Acc. Ins. Co. v. Fielding, 35 Colo. 19, 9 Ann. Cas. 916, 83 Pac. 1013, wherein the court said: "The stipulation in the policy that the company should have a certain period within which to pay the claim after the proof of death was received was for its benefit.

When, however, . . . it refuses the preliminary proofs tendered, and demands proofs which the plaintiff was not required to furnish, it waived the right to insist on the expiration of the period provided in the policy after preliminary proofs of death were furnished before an action can be maintained on the policy by those who have the legal right to enforce it."

LAYMASTER

v.

GOODIN.

Missouri Supreme Court—July 2, 1914.

290 Mo. 613; 163 S. W. 754.

Injunction. — Criminal Act — Private Nuisance.

The keeping of a bawdyhouse being a crime, and being a private rather than a public nuisance it cannot be enjoined in a suit by the state.

[See note at end of this case.]

Original habeas corpus proceeding. May Laymaster, petitioner, and B. F. Goodin, sheriff, defendant. The facts are stated in the opinion. PETITIONER DISCHARGED.

Irwin & Peters for petitioner.

James H. Lay and A. M. Hough for respondent.

[616] Wootson, J.—This is an original proceeding—habeas corpus—filed in this court by the petitioner, asking to be discharged from a sentence of ten days imprisonment in the county jail, imposed by the circuit court of Cole county, for the violation of a temporary injunction issued by it against her on the — day of —, 1913, "for setting up and keeping a common bawdyhouse" in Jefferson City, Missouri.

The facts are substantially as follows:

On July 19, 1913, the prosecuting attorney of Cole county filed in the office of the clerk of the circuit court thereof, an information charging the petitioner "with setting up and keeping a common bawdyhouse."

This information was filed in vacation of the court, and the cause was tried at the July term, 1913, of the court, which resulted in a mistrial. At the November term thereof she was again tried and acquitted by a jury.

During the interim of the mistrial and the acquittal the prosecuting attorney filed in said court a petition asking that the petitioner herein be enjoined from conducting a common bawdyhouse in said city.

Without notice to petitioner the circuit court granted a temporary injunction, as prayed, without bond, and set the case down for trial at the November term, some four months subsequent, but she had in the meantime been notified of the issuance of the temporary order.

At that term of court the petitioner filed a demurrer to the petition asking for the injunction, which was by the court overruled at the March term, 1914.

Thereupon the petitioner filed answer; but subsequently filed a motion for a change of venue of the cause from Cole county, on account of the prejudice [617] of the judge thereof. This motion was overruled, as I gather it, because of some informality in the application.

Thereupon, a second motion in proper form for a change of venue was filed, which was also overruled.

In the meantime the prosecuting attorney had duly filed in court an application requesting that the petitioner herein be cited for contempt of court, for the alleged violation of the temporary injunction previously issued in the injunction case.

On March 21, 1914, the court took up the citation for contempt and after hearing much evidence pro and con regarding the said violation of the temporary injunction, took the case under advisement until the 30th, and then found her guilty, and sentenced her to imprisonment in the county jail for ten days, and ordered the issuance of a commitment, etc., which the sheriff proceeded to execute, when the petition for the writ in this case was applied for and issued, under which the marshal of this court released her from custody on bond, etc.

I. Counsel for respondent raise a question as to whether or not the bill of exceptions was properly and timely filed.

Without going into that question I will state that in my individual opinion it was neither properly nor timely filed to preserve the questions attempted to be here presented thereby.

II. But the record proper is correctly before this court; and it appears from the petition filed that the petitioner was charged in the petition for the injunction with "setting up and keeping a common bawdyhouse in Jefferson City, Missouri," and the judgment of the court finding her guilty of contempt, etc.

[618] This charge, finding and judgment simply convicts the petitioner of the ordinary crime of setting up and keeping a bawdyhouse. [State v. Canty, 207 Mo. 439, 13 Ann. Cas. 787, 105 S. W. 1078, 123 Am. St. Rep. 393, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 747 and cases cited.]

Counsel for respondent rely not only upon the case just cited, but also upon the case of State v. Lamb, 237 Mo. 437, 141 S. W. 665, as authorities supporting their position in this case. They are not in point.

By an examination of both of those cases it will be seen that it was alleged and proven according to the majority opinion of the court, that not only a crime was being committed, as here, but also that the business complained of was so vile, open, notorious and vicious; that bad and dangerous men, in large numbers, were attracted thereto; even criminals were constantly congregated there, to the great detriment of the peace and safety of the community. In other words, these cases hold that a public nuisance, even though a crime, may be enjoined by a court of equity, though having no criminal jurisdiction, not because of the crime, but because of its inherent and constitutional authority to abate such nuisances.

There is no doubt but what a court of equity has this power, and it should be exercised freely whenever the exigency of the case demands, yet it should not invade the province of the criminal courts of the country, which must try criminals with the assistance of a jury, according to the Constitution and laws of this State, and country generally.

The differentiation of this case from those is, that while all crimes are nuisances, yet they are not necessarily public nuisances. A court of equity may abate the latter, but the courts of law can properly punish the former. Some of the States have enacted statutes conferring jurisdiction upon courts of equity in both classes of cases; but this is not one of them. It still preserves the right of one charged with this class [619] of crime, as in most all others, to be tried by a jury of his peers.

Great pains were taken in the case of State v. Canty, supra, to point out and distinguish the difference between these two classes of cases, and after further consideration I am unable to make that demarcation any plainer by anything I might here add.

No lawyer or judge differs as to the law governing these two classes of cases, but the trouble the courts have had, and I presume always will have, is to determine from the facts of each particular case to which class it belongs. The line of demarcation between the two is often so narrow that it becomes exceedingly difficult to follow it in many complicated and intricate cases; but fortunately for the court, this is not of that character. The petitioner was charged and found guilty of setting up and keeping a common bawdyhouse, which according to all of the authorities, in the absence of statute, is an ordinary crime, but not a public nuisance in any sense of the term.

A court of equity having no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of this cause, it necessarily follows, under the laws of this State; that the circuit court of Cole county had no authority to try and imprison the petitioner for the crime stated in the petition for the injunction. [State v. Williams, 221 Mo. 227, 120 S. W. 740.]

If we are correct in this view of the law of the case; then the circuit court of Cole county sitting in equity, had no jurisdiction to enjoin the petitioner from committing the crime of keeping a common bawdyhouse. That crime, if the petitioner is guilty of it, can be promptly and adequately punished under the criminal laws of the State, which were enacted expressly for that purpose, and there is, therefore, no necessity to resort to the extraordinary powers of a court of equity to suppress such a well-known and common crime.

[620] So believing, I am of the opinion that the petitioner should be discharged; and it is so ordered.

Walker and Faris, JJ., concur; Graves and Brown, JJ., concur in separate opinions; Lamm, C. J., and Bond, J., dissent.

BROWN, J.—I concur in the conclusions reached by my learned brother Woodson, for the reason that in its suit against the petitioner the State is seeking to substitute the equity practice for the criminal law—a thing which the Constitution does not permit. A party whose property is being injured or destroyed by the criminal acts of another may enjoin such criminal acts; notwithstanding to do so amounts to enjoining the commission of a crime. [State v. Schweickardt, 109 Mo. 496, 19 S. W. 47; State v. Feitz, 174

Mo. App. 456, 160 S. W. 585.] Nevertheless it is not the theory of our organic law that the liberty of even the humblest citizen may be taken away without a compliance with section 12, article 2, Constitution of Missouri, which ordains that all prosecutions for felonies and misdemeanors shall be by indictment or information; in which the accused shall be entitled to a trial by jury. [Sec. 28, art. 2, Constitution of Missouri.] In such trial the accused has the right to meet the witnesses against him "face to face." [Section 22, art. 2, Constitution of Missouri.] This last clause of our organic law means that witnesses having personal knowledge tending to prove defendant's guilt must confront him in court, and a conviction cannot stand upon the evidence of witnesses who have only heard rumors of defendant's guilt. A mere rumor has no face, and cannot be "confronted" by anybody within the purview of our Constitution. [State v. Wellman, 233 Mo. 302, 315, 161 S. W. 795.]

[621] Before the constitutional safeguards above noted can be cast into the scrap-heap the people must amend their organic law.

GRAVES, J.—I concur in the result reached by our brother Woodson in this case, but am not certain that I follow all of his reasoning. That my position may not be misunderstood I prefer to state it in my own way. The bill in equity involved in this case is one which simply charged the defendant therein, the petitioner herein, with "setting up and keeping a common bawdyhouse in Jefferson City, Missouri." Upon this petition the temporary injunction was granted, and for the violation of which petitioner was deprived of her liberty. To my mind the trouble with this petition is that it states no cause of equitable cognizance, but as I see it, not for the reasons stated by my brother.

I adhere strictly to the rule announced in State v. Canty, 207 Mo. 439, 13 Ann. Cas. 787, 105 S. W. 1078, 123 Am. St. Rep. 393, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 747, and State v. Lamb, 237 Mo. 437, 141 S. W. 665. I do not understand those cases to say that a court of equity will enjoin a crime, but they do announce the doctrine that when a given state of facts shows a public nuisance, then a court of equity will enjoin the doing of the acts which make up and constitute the public nuisance, although such acts or some of them may within themselves be crimes.

Now at common law the mere maintenance of a bawdyhouse was a public nuisance. Thus in 14 Cyc. 484, it is said: "A bawdyhouse was a public nuisance at common law, because it drew together lewd and debauched persons, thus tending to disturb the peace and to increase immorality among the people."

By statute it has been made a crime, but the making of it a crime has not destroyed its character as a public nuisance, and therefore the jurisdiction of equity over it as a public nuisance. At the instance of the [622] state, through its law officers, public nuisances may be abated, as can private nuisances at the instance of the individual.

But all this does not help the state in this case. The petition for equitable relief should have averred in direct terms that the defendant was maintaining a public nuisance, but the term "public nuisance" is not found therein. On the other hand the criminal name for the act is used throughout. It may appear to be a refinement to say, that in law the keeping of a bawdyhouse is a public nuisance, and yet say that a petition in equity which says the defendant is keeping a bawdyhouse does not charge her with maintaining a public nuisance. But when we consider the fact that equity can only take hold of the subject upon the theory of there being a public nuisance, it is clear that the charge in the bill should specifically aver a public nuisance. This of course should be followed by specifications. The bill in this case, upon which the temporary injunction was granted, does not so charge, and therefore stated no cause in equity.

Rehearing denied July 14, 1914.

NOTE.

Right of State to Enjoin Private Nuisance Which Is also Crime.

An examination of the authorities reveals no decision other than the reported case wherein the right of a court of equity to enjoin at the suit of the state a private nuisance which is also a crime, has been adjudicated. The expression of the courts in the various cases involving the restraint of public nuisances which are also crimes, would seem to indicate that no right exists to such a remedy on the part of the state, under the broad general rule that a court of equity has no power to enjoin the commission of a crime. Thus in Ex p. Allison, 48 Tex. Crim. 634, 13 Ann. Cas. 684, 90 S. W. 492, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 622, the court said, in commenting on the rule laid down in State v. Patterson, 14 Tex. Civ. App. 465, 37 S. W. 478, that a state has the right, through its proper officers, to enjoin a public nuisance which is also a crime: "But . . . the state must show in such case that the nuisance is an injury to the property or civil rights of the public at large. It was there held that the state did not show such injury to property or civil rights of the public, and that consequently it presented a criminal case, pure and simple, and an injunction would not lie." And in Hudson v. Thorne, 7 Paige (N. Y.) 261, the court said: "It is no part of the business of this court to enforce the penal laws of the state, or the by-laws of a corporation, by injunction, unless the act sought to be restrained is a nuisance. And it nowhere alleged in this bill, that the manufacture of pressed hay within the compact parts of the city of Hudson, in a building more than thirty feet square, is in itself a public nuisance." In State v. O'Leary, 155 Ind. 526, 58 N. E. 703, 52 L.R.A. 299, the question was whether an injunction might be had on the application of the state to suppress a gambling house, where no injury to property was shown, where no person had been annoyed or disturbed, where gambling in all of its forms was made a criminal offense by statute, and the ordinary criminal process for its punishment and suppression was in full force and available to the state." The court said, in denying an injunction: "We do not undertake to lay down any general rule, or to decide that a place where gambling is carried on, and where lawless and disreputable persons congregate for the purpose of gaming, may not, under special circumstances, constitute a public nuisance, and be a proper subject for the exercise of the powers of a court of equity. But, owing to the total failure of proof in the important particulars pointed out in this opinion, we are constrained to hold that the appellant failed to make such a case as warranted the interposition of the court by its extraordinary writ of injunction."

In the reported case, the implication would seem to be that a private nuisance which is also a crime, cannot be enjoined by the state. The court holds that where the keeping of a bawdyhouse is a crime but not a public nuisance, an injunction against the keeping of such a house should not be granted, on the ground that while a court of equity may abate a public nuisance, a court of law only can punish a crime, and also that such an injunction would deprive the accused of his constitutional right to be tried by a jury of his peers.

In Pike County Dispensary v. Brundidge, 130 Ala. 193, 30 So. 451, the court said: "The illegal carrying on the business of a retailer of spirituous, vinous and malt liquors, that is the carrying on of such business without a license when a license is required, or in violation of a local prohibition statute is not a nuisance unless declared so to be by the statute. There is no statute in Alabama declaring such illegal business a nuisance; and it is therefore, not a nuisance in this state. . . . If it is to be conceded that the Pike County Dispensary has no right to engage in the liquor business without paying the county license tax and may not legally engage in such business in Brundidge under any circumstances because of the local prohibition statute referred to, the present bill is yet without equity, since chancery courts have no jurisdiction to enjoin the commission of offenses against the criminal laws of the state; and the proposed acts of the respondent, however illegal they may be, would not constitute a nuisance. True the bill in terms alleges that to carry on the proposed business in Brundidge would be a public nuisance; but this is a mere mistaken conclusion of law on the part of the pleader from the facts stated which do not warrant it. Taking all the facts appearing on the bill; whether well or illy pleaded, to be true; no case is made of equity cognizance." And in State v. Ehrlick, 65 W. Va. 700, 64 S. E. 935, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 691, the court said: "Jurisdiction in equity to abate nuisances is undoubted and of universal recognition. It is equally well settled that the state may institute suits for that purpose in proper cases. But it is nowhere asserted that either the state or private individual may maintain such a suit in any and all cases of nuisance. In other words, relief in equity by abatement is not the necessary sequence of the establishment of the charge of nuisance. Some nuisances are criminal while others are not. Criminal nuisances are abatable by criminal process, and, where this process is adequate, jurisdiction in equity fails; either because adequate legal remedy precludes jurisdiction in equity, or the subject matter is beyond the scope of equity jurisdiction. If a nuisance, purely criminal, injures or affects a private plaintiff in certain respects, he may resort to equity for relief, but the existence of neither a civil nor criminal public nuisance necessarily calls for interposition by a court of equity. A private person cannot abate it, unless it is specially injurious or prejudicial to him, and the state cannot proceed against it in equity, if it be merely a criminal nuisance, unattended by injury to a personal or property right of some sort, creating necessity for prevention of irreparable injury." But in People v. St. Louis, 5 Gilman (Ill.) 351, 48 Am. Dec. 339, an action to enjoin the obstruction of a channel of the Mississippi River, thus creating a public nuisance, the court said: "The court of chancery may grant preventive as well as remedial relief, and this may be done where the act threatened would be punishable under the criminal laws as a nuisance. It was admitted that the court may prevent or remove a private nuisance, and it is equally clear that it may do so when the nuisance affects the public generally; although it is not always bound to interfere in either case. No better case could be desired to illustrate the necessity of this jurisdiction than the one before us. If the acts here threatened would amount to a nuisance, the remedy offered by a criminal prosecution, would be entirely inadequate to the protection of the public franchise, for the works once erected, it is admitted on all hands that no human power could ever remove them, and such are the interests involved on the one hand, that the prospects of a prosecution which could only be followed by a light punishment, present no sufficient terrors, to restrain the parties."

A discussion of the cases wherein it has been held that a state may enjoin, through its proper officers, an act which is both a public nuisance and a crime will be found in the notes to State v. Canty, 13 Ann. Cas. 787; State v. Marshall, Ann. Cas. 1914A 434, and Crighton v. Dahmer, 35 Am. St. Rep. 666. And the validity of statutes authorizing the issuance of an injunction against the commission of a crime is treated in the note to Ex p. Allison, 13 Ann. Cas. 684.

v.

SALISBURY ICE AND FUEL COMPANY,

North Carolina Supreme Court—May 6, 1914.

166 N. Car. 366; 81 S. E. 737.

False Pretenses — Intent.

Under Revisal 1905, § 3432, providing that, in an indictment for obtaining property by false pretenses, it shall be sufficient to allege that the party did the act with the intent to defraud, without alleging an intent to defraud any particular person, and that it shall not be necessary to prove an intent to defraud any particular person, an allegation, in an indictment as to the persons intended to be defrauded, is surplusage, and a claim of variance cannot be predicated thereon.

Corporations — Criminal Liability.

Under Revisal 1905, § 2831, subd. 6, defining "person" as extending to bodies corporate, unless the context clearly shows the contrary, and section 3432 providing that, if any person shall by any false pretense obtain any money or other thing of value with intent to defraud, such person shall be guilty of a felony and imprisoned or fined, a corporation may be convicted of obtaining money by false pretenses, as a corporation may be convicted of a crime requiring an intent, and the fact that it cannot be imprisoned does not exempt it from criminal liability.

[See note at end of this case.]

False Pretenses — Reliance on Representation.

While, to constitute the offense of obtaining property by false pretenses, defendant's conduct must deceive and be intended and calculated to deceive, the sale of 1,750 pounds of coke as a ton constitutes the offense, though the buyer strongly suspected that defendant was selling by short weight, where he did not and could not know this until he weighed the coke after delivery, as he was induced to part with the price in reliance upon defendant's representation that it was a ton.

[See 7 Ann. Cas. 32; 25 Am. St. Rep. 379.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Rowan county: Long, Judge.

Criminal action. Salisbury Ice and Fuel Company convicted of obtaining money by false pretenses and appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Linn & Linn for appellant.

Attorney General Bickett, Assistant Attorney General Calvert and A. H. Price for appellee.

[366] CLARK, C. J.—The defendant was indicted for obtaining money by false pretenses, under Revisal, 3432, by selling to J. N. Smith and C. M. Henderlite a certain amount of coke represented to be one ton in weight, whereas it weighed 1,750 pounds, the defendant well knowing the pretense to be false. Said Henderlite was a competitor in trade of the defendant company, and he suspected that it was selling short weight. On 8 January, 1913, he called up the office of the defendant over the phone and asked the price of coke. The reply was $5. He ordered a ton sent to J. N. Smith at a certain corner, and the defendant delivered the order as one ton and received payment. Henderlite then hauled the coke to the scales and found that it weighed only 1,750 pounds.

There are practically but two questions presented that require consideration:

[367] 1. The defendant moved in arrest of judgment on the ground of fatal variance in that the indictment charged false pretense "with intent to deceive C. M. Henderlite and J. N. Smith," whereas it appears from the evidence that J. N. Smith was a fictitious person and C. M. Henderlite was not known in the transaction either directly or indirectly, and was not deceived. Revisal, 3432, provides: "It shall be sufficient in any indictment for obtaining or attempting to obtain any such property by false pretenses to allege that the party did the act with intent to defraud, without alleging an intent to defraud any particular person and without alleging any ownership of the chattels, money, or valuable securities; and, on the trial of any such indictment, it shall not be necessary to prove an intent to defraud any particular person, but it shall be sufficient to prove that the party accused did the act charged with an intent to defraud." The charge as to the persons intended to be cheated was therefore surplusage and immaterial. State v. Ridge, 125 N. C. 658, 34 S. E. 440.

2. The other exception is that a corporation cannot be convicted of a crime which requires an intent.

In State v. Rowland Lumber Co. 153 N. C. 612, 69 S. E. 58, it is said: "The first ground, that corporations cannot be convicted of an offense where the intent is an ingredient, is no longer tenable. They are as fully liable in such cases as individuals. They are liable for libel, assaults and battery, etc. Corporate existence can be shown, though not charged in the bill. State v. Shaw, 92 N. C. 768."

This is fully sustained by all the late authorities. In U. S. v. MacAndrews, etc. Co. 149 Fed. 823, it is held that a corporation can be held criminally liable for conspiracy or any other crime requiring the proof of an intent. The Court says, on page 835: "It was long contended that even civil liability arising from evil intent could not be visited upon an artificial being. This fiction has vanished, and corporate liability on the criminal side permanently established, even for assault. Lake Shore, etc. R. Co. v. Prentice, 147 U. S. 101, 13 S. Ct. 261, 37 U. S. (L. ed.) 97, for conspiracy (citing many cases). It was even longer denied that a corporation could be indicted at all. Reg. v. Great North of England R. Co. 9 Q. B. 313, 58 E. C. L. 315. In People v. Clark, 8 N. Y. Crim. 169, 179, 14 N. Y. S. 642, [368] the Court declared that the legal reason upholding this contention was the strange argument that a corporation could not plead in person, and therefore could not be called on to answer criminally. It certainly is now admitted law that not only may corporations (the art of pleading by attorney having been discovered) be indicted for nonfeasance, but for such deeds of misfeasance as are complete by the mere doing a thing prohibited, e. g.: violation of the 8-hour law, U. S. v. John Kelso Co. 86 Fed. 304; receiving usurious interest, State v. First Nat. Bank, 2 S. D. 568, 51 N. W. 587; not stopping gaming at a fair, Com. v. Pulaski County Agricultural, etc. Assoc. 92 Ky. 197. . . . These defendant corporations claim that since in conspiracy evil intent is of the essence of the crime, accusation is futile. This is but the remnant of a theory always fanciful and now in process of abandonment. In Telegram Newspaper Co. v. Com. 172 Mass. 294, 44 L.R.A. 159, 70 Am. St. Rep. 280, it was held: "We think that a corporation may be liable criminally for certain offenses of which a specific intent may be a necessary element. There is no more difficulty in imputing to a corporation a specific intent in criminal proceedings than in civil. To same effect State v. Baltimore, etc. R. Co. 15 W. Va. 362, 36 Am. Rep. 803."

In People v. Star Co. 135 App. Div. 517, 120 N. Y. S. 498, it is held that a corporation can be convicted of a malicious libel, the Court adopting the following statement by Bishop in his New Crim. Law, sec. 417: "Within the sphere of its corporate capacity and to an undefined extent beyond, whenever it assumes to act as a corporation it has the same capabilities of criminal intent and of act—in other words, of crime—as an individual man sustaining the like relations. . . . Some have stumbled on the seeming impossibility of the artificial and soulless being, called a corporation, having an evil mind, or criminal intent. . . . But the author explained in another work that, since a corporation acts by its officers and agents, their purposes, motives, and intent are just as much those of the corporation as are things done."

It was recently said by the Supreme Court of the United States: "It is true that there are some crimes which in their nature cannot be committed by corporations. But there is a large class of offenses wherein the crime consists in purposely [369] doing things prohibited by statute. In that class of crimes we see no good reason why corporations may not be held responsible for and charged with the knowledge and purpose of their agents, acting within the authority conferred upon them." 212 U. S. 481, 29 S. Ct. 304, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 613.

In Grant v. U. S. 114 Pac. 955, it is held: "A corporation can form a criminal intent and have the knowledge essential, provided the officers representing it have such knowledge or intent." To the same effect, U. S. v. Union Supply Co. 215 U. S. 50, 30 S. Ct. 15, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 87, and Standard Oil Co. v. State, 117 Tenn. 664, 100 S. W. 705, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1015, in which last the Court cited many cases holding "the criminal intent of the agent is imputed to the corporation."

Indeed, Revisal, 2831 (6), provides: "The word 'person' shall extend, and be applied, to bodies politic and corporate as well as to individuals, unless the context clearly shows to the contrary." The word "person" in Revisal, 3432, therefore, embraces corporations. This is fully discussed and sustained upon a similar statute in State v. Belle Springs Creamery Co. 83 Kan. 389, 111 Pac. 474, L.R.A.1915D 515.

Indeed, so many businesses of every kind are now carried on by corporations that it would render nugatory many criminal statutes for, the protection of the public if they did not apply to the misconduct of corporations when the statute would apply to the same conduct by an individual. In this present case the business of selling coal and ice is carried on by a corporation, and it violated the statute by the false pretense of selling a ton of coke when it delivered in fact only 1,750 pounds, intending to cheat, as fully as an individual could have done. It is true that when the statute imposes a penalty of a fine or imprisonment, that only the fine can be placed upon a corporation. But this is no reason why that should not be imposed. The corporation should not be wholly exempted from punishment because it cannot be imprisoned. The remedy is that the officer or agent may be indicted jointly with the corporation as a coprincipal or accessory, as the case may be, as has been done in the enforcement of the statutes against illegal trusts.

The defendant contends that he is not guilty, because the prosecutor was not deceived. Of course, to constitute the offense the conduct of the defendant must be "intended and calculated to [370] deceive, and did deceive." The evidence was sufficient to establish these facts, and was properly submitted to the jury, and it was so found by their verdict. It is true, the prosecutor had a strong suspicion that the defendant was selling by short weight, but he could not have testified to it as a fact. His testimony is: "I have to buy from you to find out whether you were (selling by short weight) or not." In another place he says that to the best of his judgment the defendant was selling in this mode, but he did not know this and could not know it till he had tested the matter, as he did.

The defendant offered a ton of coke for $5, the offer was accepted and it was paid for as a ton. The prosecutor acted in good faith, because he paid the purchase price for a ton, and on weighing it, the only possible method, he found that there was not a ton. He was therefore induced to part with his $5 in reliance upon the assertion of the defendant that a ton of coke had been sent him. He could not possibly know beforehand whether this would be done or not, nor indeed after he saw the coke until he had actually weighed it. However much he might have mistrusted the defendant's representation, he relied on it by paying the $5 charged.

A very similar case is State v. Smith, 152 N. C. 798, 67 S. E. 508, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 946, for selling whiskey contrary to the statute, in which case a police officer, suspecting the defendant, employed one to buy whiskey from the defendant and furnished the money. The defendant, like all victims caught in a trap, viciously assailed the trap. He said he ought not to be punished, because the prosecutor had "connived" at his offense. This Court said: "It is not the motive of the buyer, but the conduct of the seller, which is to be considered," and held that the defendant was properly convicted. This was approved in State v. Hopkins, 154 N. C. 622, 70 S. E. 394, where Brown, J., says: "However much the defendant, when caught, may criticise the methods used to catch him, it has been held that the transaction is, so far as the defendant is concerned, a violation of law, if the evidence is deemed by the jury sufficient proof of the facts."

No error.

I. Introductory.

In the development of the law relating to the criminal liability of corporations, liability for a failure to perform a duty is more readily deemed to be within the scope of corporate power than liability for a positive act. (See State v. Ohio, etc. R. Co. 23 Ind. 362, and State v. Great Works Mill, etc. Co. 20 Me. 41, 37 Am. Dec. 38.) The cases concerning the liability of a corporation to indictment for nonfeasance are collated in the note to Southern R. Co. v. State, 5 Ann. Cas. 411. The purpose of the present note is to consider cases concerning the criminal liability of a corporation, as affected by its corporate character, for acts of misfeasance other than homicide. The liability of a corporation to indictment for homicide is fully treated in the notes to People v. Rochester R. etc. Co.

18 Ann. Cas. 837, and Com. v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. Ann. Cas. 1915B 617.

II. Liability in General.

There have been decisions contrary to this rule. Anonymous, 12 Mod. (Eng.) 559, State v. Ohio, etc. R. Co. 23 Ind. 362 (changed by statute—see Indiana citations under general rule, supra); State v. Great Works Mill, etc. Co. 20 Me. 41, 37 Am. Dec. 38 (overruled in State v. Portland, 74 Me. 268, 43 Am. Rep. 586); Com. v. Swift Run Gap Turnpike Co. 2 Va. Cas. 362 (decided in 1823). In an Anonymous case, 12 Mod. (Eng.) 559, the following was reported: "Per Holt, Chief Justice. A corporation is not indictable, but the particular members of it are." Concerning this report, the court in State v. Morris, etc. R. Co. 23 N. J. L. 360, said: "It may well be doubted whether this is not one of those cases which extorted from Lord Holt the bitter complaint of his reporters, 'that the stuff which they published would make posterity think ill of his understanding, and that of his brethren on the bench.' Aside from the apocryphal character of the report, it is hardly credible that so learned and accurate a judge as Lord Holt should have laid down the broad proposition imputed to him by his reporter. It is certain that while he was chief justice of the King's Bench, there were cases before that court of indictments against quasi corporations for neglect to repair roads and bridges."

In two jurisdictions it has been held that corporations are indictable only in those cases in which the legislature has specifically provided therefor. State v. Ohio, etc. R. Co. 23 Ind. 362; State v. Sullivan County Agricultural Soc. 14 Ind. App. 369, 42 N. E. 963; Paragon Paper Co. v. State, 19 Ind. App. 314, 49 N. E. 600; State v. Cincinnati Fertilizer Co. 24 Ohio St. 611; Leo Ebert Brewing Co. v. State, 25 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 601. See also State v. West Baden Springs Co. 42 Ind. App. 282, 85 N. E. 724.

2. REASON OF RULE.

The basis of the general rule heretofore stated was set forth in Com. v. New Bedford Bridge, 2 Gray (Mass.) 339, wherein the court said: "The indictment in the present case is for a nuisance. The defendants contend that it cannot be maintained against them, on the ground, that a corporation, although liable to indictment for nonfeasance, or an omission to perform a legal duty or obligation, are not amenable in this form of prosecution for a misfeasance, or the doing of any act unlawful in itself and injurious to the rights of others. There are dicta in some of the early cases which sanction this broad doctrine, and it has been thence copied into text writers, and adopted to its full extent in a few modern decisions. But if it ever had any foundation, it had its origin at a time when corporations were few in number, and limited in their powers, and in the purposes for which they were created. Experience has shown the necessity of essentially modifying it; and the tendency of the more recent cases in courts of the highest authority has been to extend the application of all legal remedies to corporations, and assimilate them, as far as possible, in their legal duties and responsibilities, to individuals." The rule contended for "would, in many cases, preclude all adequate remedy, and render reparation for an injury, committed by a corporation, impossible; because it would leave the only means of redress to be sought against irresponsible servants, instead of against those who truly committed the wrongful act by commanding it to be done. There is no principle of law which would thus furnish immunity to a corporation. If they commit a trespass on private property, or obstruct a way to the special injury and damage of an individual, no one can doubt their liability therefor. In like manner, and for the same reason, if they do similar acts to the inconvenience and annoyance of the public, they are responsible in the form, and mode appropriate to the prosecution and punishment of such offenses. . . . It may be added, that the distinction between a nonfeasance and a misfeasance is often one more of form than of substance. There are cases where it would be difficult to say whether the offense consisted in the doing of an unlawful act, or in the doing of a lawful act in an improper manner. In the case at bar, it would be no great refinement to say, that the defendants are indicted for not constructing their draws in a suitable manner, and thereby obstructing navigation, which would be a nonfeasance, and not for unlawfully placing obstructions in the river, which would be a misfeasance. The difficulty in distinguishing the character of these offenses strongly illustrates the absurdity of the doctrine that a corporation are indictable for a nonfeasance, but not for a misfeasance."

And the soundness of the rule was demonstrated by the court in State v. Morris, etc. R. Co. 23 N. J. L. 380, as follows: "It being conceded that an indictment will lie against a corporation aggregate for a nonfeasance, or for any cause, whatever, all preliminary and formal objections arising out of the invisibility and intangibility of the body aggregate, the impossibility of arresting it, its inability to appear, its incapacity for punishment, and the injustice of punishing innocent stockholders for the acts of others, are at once disposed of. These objections apply, it is obvious, with equal force to indictments for acts of nonfeasance. If they are invalid as to the one, they are equally so as to the other. But it is said, that although a corporation may omit to perform acts made obligatory upon it by law, and thus be liable for nonfeasance, yet from its very nature it cannot use force, and therefore cannot commit any act involving force, and which must be charged to have been committed vi et armis. This argument rests entirely upon the disability of the corporation to commit any act of trespass or positive wrong, and applies to its capacity to commit civil as well as criminal injuries. It is the very argument by which it was sought to be established that "no action for a trespass or tort would lie against a corporation. But it has been well said, that if a corporation has itself no hands with which to strike, it may employ the hands of others." In Grant Bros. Constr. Co. v. U. S. 13 Ariz. 388, 114 Pac. 955, the court said: "A corporation, as well as an individual, is capable of forming a guilty intent and capable of having the knowledge necessary, provided the officers of the corporation capable of voicing the will of the corporation have such knowledge or intent."

The statement of the rule by Bishop, quoted in the reported case, that "within the sphere of its corporate capacity and to an undefined extent beyond, whenever it assumes to act as a corporation it [a corporation] has the same capabilities of criminal intent and of act—in other words, of crime—as an individual man sustaining the like relations," has also been regarded as authoritative in the following cases: Joplin Mercantile Co. v. U. S. 213 Fed. 926, 131 C. C. A. 160; U. S. v. Alaska Packers' Assoc. 1 Alaska 217; People v. Star Co. 135 App. Div. 517, 120 N. Y. S. 498.

III. Crime Requiring Specific Intent.

The weight of authority supports the holding of the reported case that a corporation can be convicted of a crime requiring a specific intent. U. S. v. MacAndrews, etc. Co. 149 Fed. 823; Joplin Mercantile Co. v. U. S. reported in full, post, this volume, at page 470; Telegram Newspaper Co. v. Com. 172 Mass. 294, 52 N. E. 445; 70 Am. St. Rep. 280, 44 L.R.A. 159; People v. Star Co. 135 App. Div. 517, 120 N. Y. S. 498; People v. Dunbar Contracting Co. 165 App. Div. 59, 151 N. Y. S. 164, affirmed 215 N. Y. 416, 409 N. E. 554; State v. Rowland Lumber Co. 133 N. C. 810, 69 S. E. 58; State v. Eastern Coal Co. 29 R. I. 254, 17 Am. Cas. 96; 70 Atl. 1, 132 Am. St. Rep. 817. See also Kaufman v. U. S. 212 Fed. 613, 129 C. C. A. 149; Chicago, etc. Coal Co. v. People, 214 Ill. 421, 76 N. E. 770; State v. Passaic County Agricultural

Soc. 54 N. J. L. 260, 23 Atl. 680; State v. Atchison, 3 Lea (Tenn.) 729, 31 Am. Rep. 663; Standard Oil Co. v. State, 117 Tenn. 618, 100 S. W. 705, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1015; State v. Baltimore, etc. R. Co. 15 W. Va. 362, 36 Am. Rep. 803; D'Ivry v. World Newspaper Co. 17 Ont. Pr. 387. Thus in Telegram Newspaper Co. v. Com. supra, the court, in affirming a conviction of criminal contempt, said: "We think that a corporation may be liable criminally for certain offenses of which a specific intent may be a necessary element. There is no more difficulty in imputing to a corporation a specific intent in criminal proceedings than in civil. A corporation cannot be arrested and imprisoned in either civil or criminal proceedings, but its property may be taken either as compensation for a private wrong or as punishment for a public wrong. In most of the states of this country corporations may be formed under general laws for the purpose of doing almost any kind of business as easily as partnerships, and many of the newspapers are published by corporations. Although natural persons who publish or assist in publishing a libel in a newspaper owned by a corporation may be punished criminally by fine or imprisonment, or both, yet if the corporation cannot be punished by a fine it will escape all criminal liability. The authors of libels are often irresponsible persons, and the remedy by private action against corporations for the publishing of libellous statements is often inadequate."

In a case in which the facts were somewhat similar to those appearing in the reported case, a corporation was convicted of grand larceny. People v. Hudson Valley Constr. Co. 165 App. Div. 626, 151 N. Y. S. 314.

But in Androseoggin Water Power Co. v. Bethel Steam Mill Co. 64 Me. 441, the court in construing a statute said: "It is obvious that the defendant corporation could not be indicted under this last section. The intent, with which the act prohibited is done, is individual, not corporate intent. Larceny cannot, by any existing law, be predicated of any corporate action of a corporation, nor is there any provision for its punishment for the crime, if it were one which it is capable of committing." And in Cumberland, etc. Canal Corp. v. Portland, 56 Me. 77, the court said: "The question presented, is whether a suit for the penalty given by this section can be maintained against a corporation, by whose servants the acts prohibited have been done. The language of the section manifestly refers only to individuals—persons—offenders, those who could 'wilfully, maliciously, or contrary to law,' do the several acts forbidden. But malice and wilfulness cannot be predicated of a corporation, though they may well be of its members."

In a number of cases there are dicta to the effect that a corporation cannot be convicted of a crime requiring specific intent. Pearks v. Ward (1902) 2 K. B. (Eng.) 1, 20 Cox C. C. 279; Com. v. New Bedford Bridge, 2 Gray (Mass.) 339; State v. Delmar Jockey Club, 200 Mo. 34, 92 S. W. 185, 98 S. W. 539; State v. Morris, etc. R. Co. 23 N. J. L. 360; People v. Dunlep, 32 Misc. 390, 66 N. Y. S. 161.

See especially in connection with this subject the cases relating to the liability of a corporation to indictment for homicide which are collated in the notes to People v. Rochester R. etc. R. Co. 16 Ann. Cas. 867, and Com. v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. Ann. Cas. 1915B 817.

IV. Corporation as "Person" within Penal Statute.

The term "person" used in a statute imposing criminal liability is regarded as including corporations where that construction is warranted by the spirit and purpose of the statute. See the notes to Willmotts v. London Road Car Co. 20 Ann. Cas. 733 and State v. Rutland, etc. R. Co. Ann. Cas. 1914A 1305.

V. Particular Crime.

1. CONSPIRACY.

A corporation can be indicted for conspiracy. Joplin Mercantile Co. v. U. S. reported in full, post, this volume at page 470; U. S. v. MacAndrews, etc. Co. 149 Fed. 823; People v. Dunbar Contracting Co. 165 App. Div. 59, 151 N. Y. S. 164, affirmed 215 N. Y. 416, 109 N. E. 554; State v. Eastern Coal Co. 29 R. I. 254, 17 Ann. Cas. 96, 70 Atl. 1, 132 Am. St. Rep. 817. See also Chicago, etc. Coal Co. v. People, 214 Ill. 421, 73 N. E. 770; Standard Oil Co. v. State, 117 Tenn. 618, 100 S. W. 705, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1015. In People v. Dunbar Contracting Co. supra, the court said: "The defendants demurred to the indictment upon various grounds, the defendant company basing its demurrer in part upon the contention that the crime of conspiracy requires a specific criminal intent and that a corporation is incapable of committing any crime requiring criminal intention, because of which the indictment against it would not lie. The demurrers were severally overruled at Special Term, and it is now contended that this was error. This contention is without merit. Upon both principle and authority, a corporation may be indicted and convicted for conspiracy and similar crimes of which specific intent is the necessary and controlling element."

Where, however, it appeared that the indictment charged the defendant in one count with a conspiracy to commit two distinct offenses, the indictment was held to be bad for duplicity. John Gund Brewing Co. v. U. S. 204 Fed. 17, 122 C. C. A. 331.

2. CONTEMPT.

It has been held that a corporation can be guilty of criminal contempt of court. Telegram Newspaper Co. v. Com. 172 Mass. 294, 52 N. E. 445, 70 Am. St. Rep. 280, 44 L.R.A. 159, wherein a newspaper company was adjudged guilty of criminal contempt for publishing in a paper circulated in the place where a trial was pending an article concerning the cause on trial and calculated to influence the jury.

3. LARCENY.

In People v. Hudson Valley Constr. Co. 165 App. Div. 628, 151 N. Y. S. 314, the defendant corporation was convicted of grand larceny in the second degree, no question being raised as to its power to commit the crime. Compare the dictum in Androscoggin Water Power Co. v. Bethel Steam Mill Co. 64 Me. 441.

4. LIBEL.

A corporation can be indicted for criminal libel. People v. Star Co. 135 App. Div. 517, 120 N. Y. S. 498; State v. Atchison, 3 Lea (Tenn.) 729, 31 Am. Rep. 663; D'Ivry v. World Newspaper Co. of Toronto, 17 Ont. Pr. R. 387. In People v. Star Co. supra, the court after reviewing the authorities said: "We find no difficulty, therefore, in holding that a corporation may be indicted for and convicted of the crime of criminal libel, the evil intent of its agents who write and print the libel being attributable to it."

5. NUISANCE GENERALLY.

A corporation is liable to indictment for committing a nuisance. State v. Louisville, etc. R. Co. 86 Ind. 114 (by statute); Paragon Paper Co. v. State, 19 Ind. App. 314, 49 N. E. 600 (by statute); Acme Fertilizer Co. v. State, 34 Ind. App. 346, 72 N. E. 1037, 107 Am. St. Rep. 190 (by statute); State v. Portland, 74 Me. 268, 43 Am. Rep. 586, overruling State v. Great Works Mill, etc. Co. 20 Me. 41, 37 Am. Dec. 38; People v. Detroit White Lead Works, 82 Mich. 471, 46 N. W. 735, 9 L.R.A. 722; State v. Paggett, 8 Wash. 579, 36 Pac. 487. See also Morris, etc. R. Co. v. Prudden, 20 N. J. Eq. 530. Accordingly it has been held that a corporation can be indicted for keeping a disorderly house. State v. Passaic County Agricultural Soc. 54 N. J. L. 260, 23 Atl. 680. And a municipal corporation has been held to be liable to indictment for the negligent construction of a public sewer which caused a nuisance. State v. Portland, 74 Me. 268, 43 Am. Rep. 586. Where it appeared that a paper company in the conduct of its business caused the pollution of a river, to the injury of persons living near the river, it was held that the company could be prosecuted under a statute providing for the indictment of a corporation for maintaining a public nuisance. Paragon Paper Co. v. State, 19 Ind. App. 314, 49 N. E. 600. But under a statute providing that corporations can be prosecuted for maintaining a public nuisance, it has been held that a corporation could not be indicted for keeping a tenement for gaming, where it did not appear that gaming was carried on to such an extent as to become a nuisance. State v. Sullivan County Agricultural Soc. 14 Ind. App. 369, 42 N. E. 963.

6. OBSTRUCTION OF PUBLIC ROAD OR WATERWAY.

A particular form of nuisance for which corporations have in a number of cases been prosecuted is the unlawful obstruction of a public road or waterway. Reg. v. Great North of England R. Co. 9 Q. B. (Eng.) 315, 58 E. C. L. 315, 2 Cox C. C. 70, 10 Jur. 755, 16 L. J. M. C. 16; Reg. v. Longton Gas Co. 2 El. & Bl. 651, 105 E. C. L. 651; Reg. v. United Kingdom Electric Tel. Co. 2 B. & S. 647, 110 E. C. L. 647 note; St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. State, 52 Ark. 51, 11 S. W. 1035; Palatka, etc. R. Co. v. State, 23 Fla. 546, 3 So. 158, 11 Am. St. Rep. 395; State v. Baltimore, etc. R. Co. 120 Ind. 298, 22 N. E. 307 (by statute); State v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 77 Ia. 442, 42 N. W. 365, 4 L.R.A. 298; Cincinnati R. Co. v. Com. 80 Ky. 137; State v. Freeport, 43 Me. 198; Com. v. Nashua, etc. R. Corp. 2 Gray (Mass.) 54; Com. v. New Bedford Bridge, 2 Gray (Mass.) 339; Com. v. Vermont, etc. R. Corp. 4 Gray (Mass.) 22; Com. v. New York Cent. etc. R. Co. 206 Mass. 417, 19 Ann. Cas. 529, 92 N. E. 766; State v. Morris, etc. R. Co. 23 N. J. L. 360; State v. Warren R. Co. 29 N. J. L. 353; State v. Western North Carolina R. Co. 95 N. C. 602; Northern Cent. R. Co. v. Com. 90 Pa. St. 300; Com. v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 165 Pa. St. 162, 30 Atl. 836, 27 L.R.A. 231; Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. State, 3 Head (Tenn.) 523, 75 Am. Dec. 778; State v. Louisville, etc. R. Co. 91 Tenn. 445, 19 S. W. 229; State v. Vermont Cent. R. Co. 27 Vt. 103. See also State v. White, 96 Mo. App. 34, 69 S. W. 684; State v. Central R. Co. 32 N. J. L. 220. Contra, Com. v. Swift Run Gap Turnpike Co. 2 Va. Cas. 362 (decided in 1823). Thus in State v. Louisville, etc. R. Co. supra, the court said: "That railway corporations are liable to indictment for obstructing a public highway has been long settled. . . . Being a corporation, it necessarily acts only through its agents. If the obstruction is the act of its agent, it is the act of the corporation; provided the agent did the act in the course and scope of his duty as an agent. It is immaterial that the agent was, by the rules of the company, instructed not to permit such obstruction to continue for a time deemed by the corporation to be unreasonable. If such agent disobeys the reasonable requirement of the corporation, it becomes liable for the nuisance, because the agent was within the scope of his duty in operating the train and in stopping it across a public road. This principle is necessary to be enforced in regard to acts of misfeasance by corporations of this character. Otherwise, the public would be required to look alone to subordinates, in general unknown and irresponsible."

The necessity under certain circumstances for bringing the indictment against the corporation, instead of against individuals only, was pointed out in State v. Morris, etc. R. Co. 23 N. J. L. 360, as follows: "If the rights of the corporation are to be concluded by the judgment, as in the present case, a valuable building, erected by the company at great cost for their own convenience, is to be ordered to be torn down as an encroachment upon the highway, there is peculiar propriety in making the corporation itself a party, and giving it an opportunity of being heard in defense. To condemn the property of the corporation to destruction upon an indictment against an irresponsible individual who was employed in the construction of the work, but who has no interest in the company, and who perhaps is hostile to its interests, savors strongly of the injustice of condemning them unheard. And it is not clear how the sentence is to be executed against the corporation, who are in possession, and in no sense parties to the proceeding."

Accordingly, a corporation has been indicted and convicted for leaving a hand car at the intersection of its track with a public road. Cincinnati R. Co. v. Com. 80 Ky. 137. But where it appeared that a railroad company had the right to erect a bridge "so constructed as not to prevent" navigation, it was held that the company could not be indicted for building a bridge so as to obstruct and impede navigation. State v. Portland, etc. R. Co. 57 Me. 402.

7. UNJUST DISCRIMINATION.

Corporations are liable to indictment under statutes forbidding unjust discrimination in transportation. New York Cent. R. Co. v. U. S. 212 U. S. 481, 29 S. Ct. 304, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 613. See also State v. Southern R. Co. 122 N. C. 1052, 30 S. E. 133, 41 L.R.A. 246; State v. Southern R. Co. 125 N. C. 666, 34 S. E. 527. In New York Cent. R. Co. v. U. S. supra, the court said: "There is a large class of offenses, of which rebating under the federal statutes is one, wherein the crime consists in purposely doing the things prohibited by statute. In that class of crimes we see no good reason why corporations may not be held responsible for and charged with the knowledge and purposes of their agents, acting within the authority conferred upon them. 2 Morawetz on Corporations, sec. 733; Green's Brice on Ultra Vires, 366. If it were not so, many offenses might go unpunished and acts be committed in violation of law, where, as in the present case, the statute requires all persons, corporate or private, to refrain from certain practices forbidden in the interest of public policy. It is a part of the public history of the times that statutes against rebates could not be effectually enforced so long as individuals only were subject to punishment for violation of the law, when the giving of rebates or concessions inured to the benefit of the corporations of which the individuals were but the instruments. This situation, developed in more than one report of the Interstate Commerce Commission, was no doubt influential in bringing about the enactment of the Elkins Law, making corporations criminally liable.

We see no valid objection in law, and every reason in public policy, why the corporation which profits by the transaction, and can only act through its agents and officers, shall be held punishable by fine because of the knowledge and intent of its agents to whom it has intrusted authority to act in the subject matter of making and fixing rates of transportation, and whose knowledge and purposes may well be attributed to the corporation for which the agents act. While the law should have regard to the rights of all, and to those of corporations no less than to those of individuals, it cannot shut its eyes to the fact that the great majority of business transactions in modern times are conducted through these bodies, and particularly that interstate commerce is almost entirely in their hands, and to give them immunity from all punishment because of the old and exploded doctrine that a corporation cannot commit a crime would virtually take away the only means of effectually controlling the subject matter and correcting the abuses aimed at."

8. VIOLATION OF BANKRUPTCY LAW.

It has been held that a bankrupt corporation is capable of committing the criminal offense of knowingly or fraudulently concealing its property from its trustee. Kaufman v. U. S. reported in full, post, this volume at page 466. U. S. v. Young, etc. Co. 170 Fed. 110; Cohen v. U. S. 157 Fed. 651, 85 C. C. A. 113. But of course it could not be punished for that offense under a statute providing for imprisonment only. Cohen v. U. S., supra.

9. VIOLATION OF LABOR LAW.

A corporation has been held to be criminally liable under a statute providing that the employment of children under age shall constitute a misdemeanor. Overland Cotton Mill Co. v. People, 32 Colo. 263, 75 Pac. 924, 105 Am. St. Rep. 74.

Likewise it has been held that a corporation can be convicted under a statute regulating the hours of labor. U. S. v. John Kelso Co. 86 Fed. 304. See also People v. Chicago, 256 Ill. 558, Ann. Cas. 1913E 305, 100 N. E. 194, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 954.

10. VIOLATION OF LIQUOR LAW.

A corporation can be indicted under a statute forbidding the solicitation or taking of orders for intoxicating liquors in certain localities. R. M. Rose Co. v. State, 4 Ga. App. 588, 62 S. E. 117. Likewise a corporation may be guilty of a conspiracy to carry liquor into prohibited territory. Joplin Mercantile Co. v. U. S., reported in full, post, this volume, at page 470. And a corporation may be guilty of furnishing liquor to a minor. Southern Express Co. v. State, 1 Ga. App. 700, 53 S. E. 87. A contrary result has been reached in a case wherein it was held that the statute making the act unlawful applied only to natural persons. Leo Ebert Brewing Co. v. State, 25 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 601.

11. MISCELLANEOUS.

Corporations have been held liable to prosecution under statutes making criminal the following acts:

Advertising to practice medicine by a person not a registered physician: People v. John H. Woodbury Dermatological Institute, 192 N. Y. 454, 85 N. E. 697, affirming 124 App. Div. 877, 109 N. Y. S. 578.

Collecting excessive toll: Nashville, etc. Ridge Turnpike Co. v. State, 96 Tenn. 249, 34 S. W. 4.

Fishing: U. S. v. Alaska Packers' Assoc. 1 Alaska 217.

Inclosing public domain: U. S. v. Pacific Live Stock Co. 192 Fed. 443.

Sabbath breaking: State v. Southern R. Co. 119 N. C. 814, 25 S. E. 892, 56 Am. St. Rep. 689.

Selling adulterated milk: Com. v. Graustein, 208 Mass. 88, 95 N. E. 97.

Selling food which was not of the nature, substance and quality of the article demanded: Pearks v. Ward [1902] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 1. See also Small v. Com. 134 Ky. 272, 120 S. W. 361.

Use of false weights and measures: State v. Belle Springs Creamery Co. 83 Kan. 389, 111 Pac. 474, L.R.A.1915D 515.

Willful destruction of premises by tenant: State v. Rowland Lumber Co. 153 N. C. 610, 69 S. E. 58.

VI. Punishment.

A corporation is punished for its criminal acts by fine. New York Cent. R. Co. v. U. S. 212 U. S. 481, 29 S. Ct. 304, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 613; John Gend Brewing Co. v. U. S. 304 Fed. 17, 124 C. C. A. 268; U. S. v. Alaska Packers' Assoc. 1 Alaska 217; Overland Cotton Mill Co. v. People, 32 Colo. 263, 75 Pac. 924, 105 Am. St. Rep. 74; State v. Belle Springs Creamery Co. 83 Kan. 389, 111 Pac. 474, L.R.A.1915D 515; People v. Detroit White Lead Works, 82 Mich. 471, 46 N. W. 735, 9 L.R.A. 722; American Fork City v. Charlier, 43 Utah 231, 134 Pac. 739. And see the reported case.

Of course a corporation cannot be imprisoned. Cohen v. U. S. 157 Fed. 651, 85 C. C. A. 113.

The fact that a corporation can be fined but not imprisoned does not render penal statutes, prescribing fine or imprisonment, and applying alike to individuals and corporations, open to the objection of unequal operation. State v. Belle Springs Creamery Co. 83 Kan. 389, 111 Pac. 474, L.R.A.1915D 515; Small v. Com. 134 Ky. 272, 120 S. W. 361, wherein the court said: "That an individual guilty of an offense may be both fined and imprisoned, and a corporation likewise guilty only fined, does not affect the validity of the statute. The apparent discrimination grows out of conditions that cannot be avoided, and the corporation that is favored by the discrimination cannot complain."

UNITED STATES.

United States Circuit Court of Appeals,
Second Circuit—March 17, 1914.

212 Fed. 613.

Bankruptcy — Concealing Assets — Felony.

Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 29b, 30 Stat. 554 (Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 646), provides that a person shall be punished by imprisonment for not to exceed two years on conviction of having knowingly and fraudulently concealed while a bankrupt, or after his discharge, from his trustee any of the property belonging to his estate in bankruptcy. Cr. Code section 332 (Act March 4, 1909, c. 321, 35 Stat. 1152 [Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 495]), declares that whoever commits any act constituting an offense defined in any law of the United States, or aids, abets, counsels, demands, induces, or procures its commission, is a principal, and section 335 provides that all offenses which may be punished by death or imprisonment for a term exceeding one year shall be deemed felonies. It is held that an indictment charging the president and manager of a bankrupt corporation with knowingly and fraudulently aiding and abetting the concealment of its assets charged a felony.

Criminal Law — Principal in Second Degree — Prosecution.

Under Cr. Code (Act March 4, 1909, c. 321, 35 Stat. 1152 [Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 495]) § 332, providing that all aiders or abettors of any crime are principals, where defendant was charged with knowingly and fraudulently aiding and abetting a bankrupt corporation, of which he was president and general manager, to conceal its assets from its trustee, it is not necessary that the corporation should be first convicted before the conviction of accused.

Corporations — Criminal Liability.

A bankrupt corporation is capable of committing the offense of knowingly and fraudulently concealing its property from its trustee in violation of Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 29b, 30 Stat. 554 (Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 646).

[See note at end of this case.]

Bankruptcy — Concealment of Assets.

Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 29b, 30 Stat. 554 (Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 646), providing that a person shall be punished, etc., on conviction of the offense of having knowingly and fraudulently concealed, while a bankrupt, or after his discharge, from his trustee any of the property belonging to his estate in bankruptcy, applies only to one who has been adjudicated a bankrupt, and not to one guilty of aiding and abetting the bankrupt in knowingly and fraudulently concealing its assets.

Same.

Where an alleged concealment of assets of a bankrupt corporation begins before the appointment of a trustee and continues after such appointment, it constitutes a concealment from him, within Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 29b, 30 Stat. 554 (Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 646), making such concealment a felony.

Witnesses — Privileged Communications — Attorney and Client.

Where accused is charged with aiding and abetting a bankrupt corporation, of which he was president and manager, to conceal its assets from its trustee, evidence of defendant's attorney that he was retained by defendant as attorney for the corporation, and also to represent defendant individually, is not objectionable as privileged.

Instructions — Matters Covered by General Charge.

Where the court's charge is explicit and fair, and covered all the aspects of the case requiring that all the facts must be proved against defendant beyond a reasonable doubt, and defines reasonable doubt in the language of defendant's counsel, it is not error to refuse a charge that if on the whole case the jury should find that the evidence was evenly balanced, or they were unable to determine where the truth lay, that created a reasonable doubt, and defendant would be entitled to an acquittal.

Bankruptcy — Abetting Concealment of Assets.

In a prosecution of the president and manager of a bankrupt corporation for aiding and abetting the concealment of its assets from its trustee, the fact that there is no evidence that defendant was holding the moneys under an agreement with the bankrupt to do with them what it requested does not impair the government's case.

Same.

In a prosecution of the president and manager of a bankrupt corporation for aiding and abetting the concealment of its assets from its trustee, evidence held to sustain a conviction.

Error to United States District Court, Southern District of New York.

Criminal action. Henry Kaufman convicted of aiding and abetting Daisy Shirt Company, bankrupt corporation, to conceal its assets from its trustee, and brings error. AFFIRMED.

[615] Henry Kaufman was convicted of aiding and abetting the Daisy Shirt Company, a bankrupt corporation, to conceal its assets from its trustee, and he brings error. Affirmed.

The plaintiff in error, Henry Kaufman, hereinafter referred to as the "defendant," was president of the Daisy Shirt Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of New York, and was in charge of the company. This company was engaged in the manufacture and sale of shirts and had its principal place of business in the city of New York. On November 5, 1910, an involuntary petition in bankruptcy was filed against the company and it was duly adjudicated a bankrupt. The evidence discloses that between October 24 and November 2, 1910, Kaufman assigned a large portion of the outstanding accounts of the company to the Federal Finance Company for $2,718.15. He assigned other accounts to one Silverstone for $900. He sold to other parties a large quantity of merchandise belonging to the company receiving altogether $12,653.72. A large part of this was paid to him in cash and some of it in checks which he cashed. On or about November 3d, a few days before the company was thrown into bankruptcy, Kaufman left New York for California, stopping at Montreal on his way where he remained a month. He was arrested in California and brought from there to New York to answer an indictment charging him with aiding and abetting a bankrupt corporation to conceal its assets. He never turned over any of the money he had received as hereinbefore set forth. The defendant undertook to account for the money which he had received before leaving for California by claiming that he had paid certain specified amounts to his wife, his sister, his brother, his father, his mother-in-law, and to certain other persons including $495 to his attorney.

The defendant's testimony was that he had invested $16,000 in the business, which was inadequate for the demands made upon it; that it became necessary to borrow money, and the defendant secured a loan of $5,000 from the Madison Trust Company, which he put into the treasury of the corporation; that he raised $1,200 on his mother-in-law's jewels, which sum was deposited in the bank account of the corporation, as well as $375 on life insurance belonging to her, likewise paid to the corporation; that his sister loaned the company $2,400 in various amounts; that his father paid $2,500 to avoid foreclosure of mortgage assigned to the Franklin Trust Company as security for its loan to the corporation; that he pledged his wife's jewels with the Provident Loan Association for $1,600, which went into the treasury of the [616] corporation; that he borrowed $400 from one Gutkin. He testified that things were going very badly with the corporation and that great pressure was brought to bear on him to pay the debts thus incurred; that he yielded to these demands and paid from the moneys received upon the assignment of the outstanding accounts and sale of merchandise sums aggregating $11,438, part of which went to merchandise creditors also.

The other witnesses for the defense corroborated his statements to some extent.

Aaron William Levy for plaintiff in error.
H. Snowden Marshall and Roger B. Wood for defendant in error.

Sitting: Lacombe, Ward, and Rogers, Circuit Judges.

ROGERS, J.—(after stating the facts).—The plaintiff in error who was the defendant below has been convicted of the crime of having aided and abetted the Daisy Shirt Company in concealing its assets in violation of section 29b of the Bankruptcy Act. He was not charged with having concealed the assets of the company from the trustee in bankruptcy. The indictment charged the Daisy Shirt Company with having concealed its assets from its duly qualified trustee in bankruptcy to an amount exceeding $5,000, and further charged that the defendant "under the circumstances aforesaid did knowingly and fraudulently cause, procure, aid and abet, the Daisy Shirt Company while the said Daisy Shirt Company was a bankrupt as aforesaid, knowingly and fraudulently to conceal in the manner and form aforesaid, from William P. Myhan, the duly qualified trustee in bankruptcy of the said Daisy Shirt Company, the aforesaid sums of money and the aforesaid property belonging to the estate in bankruptcy of the said Daisy Shirt Company."

The provision of section 29b of the Bankruptcy Act reads as follows:

"A person shall be punished, by imprisonment for a period not to exceed two years, upon conviction of the offense of having knowingly and fraudulently concealed while a bankrupt, or after his discharge, from his trustee any of the property belonging to his estate in bankruptcy." (Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 646).

The Criminal Code in section 332 provides that:

"Whoever directly commits any act constituting an offense defined in any law of the United States, or aids, abets, counsels, commands, induces, or procures its commission, is a principal." (Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 495.)

The federal courts have such criminal jurisdiction only as is given by act of Congress. Jones v. U. S. 137 U. S. 202-211, 11 S. Ct. 80, 34 U. S. (L. ed.) 691. The defendant was indicted as a principal under section 332 of the Criminal Code, and the case was tried on that theory.

The offense of concealing the assets from the trustee in bankruptcy is a felony as one committing the offense may be punished by imprisonment for more than one year. Section 335 of the Penal Laws, Act March 4, 1909 (Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 495). In the case of felonies the common law recognized the distinction of principals and accessories, a distinction it refused to apply to persons participating in treason and in misdemeanors. In the case of treason and misdemeanors all persons [617] who were guilty at all were punishable as principals and indictable as such. In the case of felonies one who aided and abetted the principal, but was absent when the crime was committed, or who after the crime was committed assisted the perpetrator, was simply an accessory. And according to the common law an accessory could not be tried before the conviction of the principal. But under section 332 of the Criminal Code of the United States all abettors of any crime are made principals. It is not necessary, therefore, that a bankrupt corporation should first be convicted before bringing to trial one charged with aiding and abetting in the concealment of its assets from a trustee in bankruptcy.

It is undoubtedly the case that decisions and dicta can be found denying that a corporation can be indicted. Lord Holt is reported as having said that "a corporation is not indictable, but the particular members of it are." Anonymous, 12 Mod. (Eng.) 559. But it is a well-established principle of modern jurisprudence that an indictment will lie against a corporation, although there are some crimes, as treason, or felony, or breach of the peace, in respect of which it is agreed that an indictment could not be maintained against it, and it has been held that where a statute prescribes fine and imprisonment it is not applicable to a corporation because a corporation cannot be imprisoned. U. S. v. Braun, 158 Fed. 456. But in Cohen v. U. S. 157 Fed. 651, 85 C. C. A. 113 (1907), this court decided that a bankrupt corporation was capable of committing the criminal offense of knowingly or fraudulently concealing its property from its trustee defined and made punishable by the Bankruptcy Act, and that persons who conspire to cause a corporation to commit such an offense are indictable for the conspiracy, and that it is immaterial that the corporation is not or cannot be indicted as one of the conspirators. We know of no reason why we should not adhere to the opinion we then expressed. We are compelled therefore to disregard the defendant's contention that, if the corporation could not be convicted of the offense described in section 29b of the Bankruptcy Act, he could not be convicted of aiding and abetting in the commission of such an offense. There is no distinction in principle between the Cohen Case, supra, and the case at bar. The fact that in the Cohen Case the indictment was for conspiracy under section 5440 of the Revised Statutes (2 Fed. St. Ann. 247) while in this case the indictment is based on a concealment of assets, is a distinction without a difference so far as the principle involved is concerned.

It may be conceded that defendant could not be convicted under section 29b of the Bankruptcy Act. That section applies only to one who has "knowingly or fraudulently concealed while a bankrupt or after his discharge." As the defendant is not alleged ever to have been a bankrupt the section is without application to him. It was held in Field v. U. S. 137 Fed. 6, 69 C. C. A. 568, that the present or past bankruptcy of the person accused was an indispensable element of the offense created by that section. The defendant, however, is mistaken in supposing that the principle announced in the Field Case is so far applicable to his case as to require this court to [618] set aside his conviction. He loses sight of the fact that his own conviction is not under section 29b of the Bankruptcy Act which was under discussion in the Field Case, but is under section 332 of the Criminal Code.

The offense with which the defendant is charged is that he aided and abetted the Daisy Shirt Company while the said company was a bankrupt knowingly and fraudulently to conceal from the duly qualified trustee property belonging to the estate in bankruptcy. The concealment must be a concealment from the trustee. In re Adams, 171 Fed. 599. In the case at bar the funds were taken and the concealment began before the appointment of the trustee. But if the concealment which began before the appointment of the trustee continued after the appointment was made, and there was evidence in this case showing that it did, it constituted concealment from him. This we decided in the Cohen Case, supra.

The defendant took the stand and testified in his own behalf. It is urged upon us that error was committed at the trial in the admission of certain evidence. The defendant's attorney was permitted to say:

"I was retained by Mr. Kaufman (the defendant) as attorney for the Daisy Shirt Company, and also to represent him individually."

It was objected that this evidence was calculated to bias or prejudice the defendant in the eyes of the jury. We see no valid objection to the admission of the testimony. If the attorney was retained by the defendant to represent him personally in the bankruptcy proceedings, the fact cannot be regarded as privileged. It was necessary for the witness to give this testimony before he could claim his privilege as to communications which passed between him and the attorney about which he was asked and which were excluded upon the theory that they were privileged. Whether any error was committed in refusing to allow the communications which may have passed between the defendant and his counsel in respect to the commission of a crime or a fraud, the legal adviser being ignorant of the purpose for which the advice was wanted, is not before us. But it may be remarked in passing that it has been held in England that communication made in furtherance of any criminal or fraudulent purpose is not privileged. Reg. v. Cox, L. R. 14 Q. B. 153. And the English rule appears to have been regarded with favor in the Supreme Court of the United States in Alexander v. U. S. 138 U. S. 353, 11 S. Ct. 350, 34 U. S. (L. ed.) 954, the rule being limited to cases where the party is tried for the crime in furtherance of which the communication was made, although the attorney declared in the case at bar that he had been retained by the defendant, the defendant while on the stand positively denied that he had been so retained. In view of his testimony on that point, we fail to see what right he has to raise the question of privilege at all. He cannot blow hot and cold at the same time. But irrespective of his right to raise the question, there is nothing in the point which he seeks to make.

The defendant predicates error upon a refusal to charge "that if upon the whole case the jury should find that the evidence is evenly [619] balanced, or that they are unable to determine where the truth lies, then that would create a reasonable doubt, and the defendant is entitled to an acquittal." The charge was a full, clear, explicit, and fair one, covering all the aspects of the case. The instructions upon the law were sufficiently distinct and precise. On the subject of reasonable doubt the jury was charged as follows:

"Now, in this, as in all other criminal cases, all of the facts must be proved against the defendant beyond a reasonable doubt, which is, as Mr. McIntyre (the defendant's counsel) told you. That does not mean that you should look around to see what remote or unreasonable theory you can imagine that might throw it out. If every suggestion which is not obviously fictitious is excluded from your mind, so that your minds are settled that the man is guilty, then you bring a verdict against him. It is only in case you shall have some doubt, for which you can give a sensible reason, that you are to bring in a verdict of guilty."

What Mr. McIntyre had told the jury about "reasonable doubt" does not appear in the record. If he thought that what he said to the jury on the subject, which the court adopted and supplemented, was not adequate, he should have had what he said on that subject incorporated into the record for our information. The accused was entitled to have the jury instructed that the prosecution must prove the charge against him beyond a reasonable doubt. Some courts have declared that it is not necessary for the trial judge to define or explain the words "reasonable doubt." State v. Davis, 48 Kan. 1, 28 Pac. 1092; State v. Reed, 62 Me. 129; State v. Robinson, 117 Mo. 649, 23 S. W. 1066. The Supreme Court of the United States, in Miles v. U. S. 103 U. S. 304, 312, 26 U. S. (L. ed.) 481, said "Attempts to explain the term 'reasonable doubt' do not usually result in making it any clearer to the minds of the jury." And the same court, speaking through Mr. Justice Brewer, in Dunbar v. U. S. 156 U. S. 185, 199, 15 S. Ct. 325, 39 U. S. (L. ed.) 390 (1894), referred approvingly to what was said in the Miles Case. We are not now expressing any opinion upon whether the trial judge is or is not bound to define a reasonable doubt. But we fail to discover after what had already been said upon the subject any reason why the court should have enlarged upon it by complying with the request of counsel to charge in the words requested. The subject had already been adequately covered.

There was no evidence that Kaufman was holding the moneys under an agreement with the bankrupt to do with them what it asked. Of course, if there had been such evidence, it would have been important in establishing the guilt of the defendant. But the absence of such evidence does not impair the government's case, for it is not at all important whether the defendant in taking and concealing the assets was concealing them on behalf of the bankrupt or for himself. The offense consists in concealing from the trustee any of the property belonging to the bankrupt. What may be the purpose of the concealment and who is to benefit by it does not enter into the matter. The wrong that is being punished is the withholding from the trustee, and therefore from the creditors, property to which they are entitled.

There is no error of law and the evidence abundantly supports [620] the verdict of the jury. The jury has found under instructions of the court that the assets were secreted under a general scheme and that the defendant aided and abetted the bankrupt corporation in the concealment of its assets from its trustee in bankruptcy. The defendant admitted he had taken the moneys and that he had never turned over a dollar to the trustee. His claim that he paid $400 to one Kuntz on a debt due to the latter from the corporation was denied by Kuntz. Neither his wife, nor his mother-in-law nor his brother were called to corroborate him in the story he told as to payments made to them in payment of debts due to them likewise from the corporation. His sister took the stand to corroborate him as to payments made to her by him, but her testimony was properly characterized by the trial judge as extraordinary and was evidently not believed by the jury. As soon as he obtained the money of the bankrupt, he left the United States without informing any one where he was going. He did not even wait to surrender the lease to his apartment or to look after the storage of his furniture. He never communicated with the trustee, nor did he in any way assist in straightening out the affairs of the bankrupt corporation of which he was president and general manager. The case is a particularly flagrant one, and the majority of the court discover no reason for reversing the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE.

The reported case supports the rule that an indictment will lie against a corporation and distinctly holds that a bankrupt corporation is capable of committing the criminal offense of knowingly or fraudulently concealing its property from its trustee, although the corporation cannot be punished by imprisonment. For an exhaustive discussion of the criminal liability of a corporation for acts of misfeasance, see the note to State v. Salisbury Lee, etc. Co. reported ante; this volume, at page 456.

UNITED STATES.

United States Circuit Court of Appeals,
Eighth Circuit—April 3, 1914.

218 Fed. 920.

Indians — Shipments of Liquor into Indian Territory.

Act March 1, 1895, c. 145, § 8, 28 Stat. 697 (3 Fed. St. Ann. 424), which inter alia prohibits the carrying of intoxicating liquors into Indian Territory, was enacted as a part of the recognized guardianship by the United States of the Indians as a separate but independent people, and in the exercise of the constitutional power of Congress to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes, and was not repealed by the Enabling Act of Oklahoma, and the admission of the state thereunder, as to importations from parts of the state not within the former Indian Territory, and an indictment for conspiracy to violate said act by carrying liquor into such territory need not allege that it was to be imported from without the state of Oklahoma.

Same.

In none of the legislation of Congress prohibiting the introduction of liquor into the Indian country have state lines been recognized, but the acts prohibited have always been held unlawful whether the liquor was introduced from points within the same state or from without.

Corporations — Criminal Liability.

A corporation may be indicted and convicted under section 37 of the Criminal Code (Act March 4, 1909, c. 321, 35 Stat. 1096 [Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 415]), for conspiracy to commit an offense against the United States by carrying liquors into Indian Territory or introducing liquors into the Indian country, although under section 335 of the Criminal Code (Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 495) the offense is a felony.
[See note at end of this case.]

Error to United States District Court, Western District of Missouri.

Criminal action. Joplin Mercantile Company et al., convicted of conspiracy and brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Paul A. Ewert for plaintiffs in error.

Leslie J. Lyons and Thad B. Landon for defendant in error.

Sitting: Hook and Smith, Circuit Judges, and Amidon, District Judge.

[927] SMITH, J.—An indictment was returned for conspiracy under section 37 of the Penal Code (Act March 4, 1909, c. 321, 35 Stat. 1096, Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 415), charging that the Joplin Mercantile Company, a corporation existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Missouri, and one Joseph Filler, and one Ben Due, and one Martin F. Witte, and other persons to the grand jury unknown, hereinafter called the defendants, then and there being, did then and there unlawfully, willfully, knowingly, and feloniously conspire together to commit an offense against the United States of America, to wit, to unlawfully, knowingly, and feloniously introduce and attempt to introduce malt, spirituous, vinous, and other intoxicating liquors into the Indian country which was formerly the Indian Territory and now is included in a portion of the state of Oklahoma, and into the city of Tulsa, Tulsa county, Okla., which was formerly within and is now a part of what is known as the Indian country and into other parts and portions of that part of Oklahoma which lies within the Indian country. Certain overt acts were then alleged all of which charged that the defendants shipped liquors from Joplin, Mo., to Tulsa, Okl.

Ben Due pleaded guilty. The case against the Joplin Mercantile Company, Joseph Filler, and Martin F. Witte was tried to a jury who found the Mercantile Company and Filler guilty and acquitted Martin [928] F. Witte, and the Joplin Mercantile Company was fined, and Filler sentenced to the Leavenworth penitentiary, and they sued out a writ of error.

The only errors assigned which can be considered by us are:

(1) The court erred in overruling the demurrer of the defendants and each of them to the said indictment herein.

(2) The court erred in overruling the motion to quash said indictment herein made by the defendants and each of them.

(3) The court erred in overruling the motion in arrest of judgment herein made by the defendants and each of them.

Neither the evidence nor the charge of the court are before us.

The other questions covered by the assignments are with reference to the motion for a new trial which cannot be considered here and the admission of certain evidence which does not appear in the transcript.

The questions, therefore, before this court can be resolved into one: Did the indictment charge an offense?

There are two separate systems of laws on the subject of liquors imported into the territory here in question. The Fifty-Second Congress, on July 23, 1892 (chapter 234, 27 Stat. 260), enacted the following as a substitute for section 2139 of the Revised Statutes:

"Sec. 2139. No ardent spirits, ale, beer, wine, or intoxicating liquor or liquors of whatever kind shall be introduced, under any pretense, into the Indian country. Every person who sells, exchanges, gives, barter, or disposes of any ardent spirits, ale, beer, wine, or intoxicating liquors of any kind to any Indian under charge of any Indian superintendent or agent or introduces or attempts to introduce any ardent spirits, ale, wine, or beer, or intoxicating liquor of any kind into the Indian country shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than two years, and by a fine of not more than three hundred dollars for each offense. But it shall be a sufficient defense to any charge of introducing or attempting to introduce ardent spirits, ale, beer, wine, or intoxicating liquors into the Indian country that the acts charged were done under authority in writing from the War Department, or any officer duly authorized thereunto by the War Department. All complaints for the arrest of any person or persons made for violation of any of the provisions of this act shall be made in the county where the offense shall have been committed, or if committed upon or within any reservation not included in any county, then in any county adjoining such reservation; and, if in the Indian Territory, before the United States court commissioner, or commissioner of the circuit court of the United States residing nearest the place where the offense was committed, who is not for any reason disqualified; but in all cases such arrests shall be made before any United States court commissioner residing in such adjoining county, or before any magistrate or judicial officer authorized by the laws of the state in which such reservation is located to issue warrants for the arrest and examination of offenders by section ten hundred and fourteen of the Revised Statutes of the United States. And all persons so arrested shall, unless discharged upon examination, be held to answer and stand trial before the court of the United States having jurisdiction of the offense." (3 Fed. St. Ann. 382.)

January 30, 1897, it being doubtful whether land allotted to Indians remained Indian country under the existing laws, the Fifty-Fourth Congress enacted Act Jan. 30, 1897; c. 109, 29 Stats. 506, in part as follows:

"Any person who shall introduce or attempt to introduce any malt, spirituous, or vinous liquor, including beer, ale, and wine, or any ardent or intoxicating liquor of any kind whatsoever into the Indian country, which [929] term shall include any Indian allotment while the title to the same shall be held in trust by the government or while the same shall remain inalienable by the allottee without the consent of the United States, shall be punished by imprisonment for not less than sixty days, and by a fine of not less than one hundred dollars for the first offense and not less than two hundred dollars for each offense thereafter." (3 Fed. St. Ann. 384.)

But almost midway between the enactment of these two statutes the Fifty-Third Congress on March 1, 1895, enacted, chapter 145, 28 Stats. 692, 697:

"Sec. 8. That any person, whether an Indian or otherwise, who shall, in said [Indian] territory, manufacture, sell, give away, or in any manner; or by any means furnish to any one, either for himself or another any vinous, malt, or fermented liquors, or any other intoxicating drinks of any kind whatsoever, whether medicated or not, or who shall carry, or in any manner have carried, into said territory any such liquors or drinks, or who shall be interested in such manufacture, sale, giving away, furnishing to anyone, or carrying into said territory any of such liquors or drinks shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by fine not exceeding five hundred dollars and by imprisonment for not less than one month nor more than five years." (3 Fed. St. Ann. 424.)

It will be observed that the first two statutes prohibited introducing liquor into the Indian country, but the last prohibited their introduction, not into the Indian country, but into the Indian Territory which had boundaries fixed by law.

The term "Indian country" has a constantly changing application, but the Indian Territory referred to is a well-defined and perpetually existing region.

In U. S. Express Co. v. Friedman, 191 Fed. 673, 112 C. C. A. 219, this court held that the two first statutes above quoted were still applicable to a considerable portion of the old Indian Territory.

In Ex p. Webb, 225 U. S. 663, 32 S. Ct. 769, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 1248, the Supreme Court held that the last-mentioned act, that of 1895, was still in force as applied to shipments from without Oklahoma.

In this situation this case was brought here in the belief that the decision in Ex p. Webb practically nullified our decision in U. S. Express Co. v. Friedman, but in U. S. v. Wright, 229 U. S. 226, 33 S. Ct. 630, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 1160, the Supreme Court also held, as held by this court in U. S. Express Co. v. Friedman, that the acts of 1892 and 1897 remained in force where applicable in Indian Territory, and the effect of this holding was that the acts of 1892, 1897, and 1895 all remained in force concurrently in Indian Territory.

If an indictment was returned which charged a defendant with introducing liquor into the Indian country upon the trial a question of fact would at once arise as to whether the place to which they were imported remained Indian country under the acts of 1892 and 1897; but, if the charge was under the act of 1895, the sole question would be whether the liquor had been carried into a geographical location fixed and determined.

It must be borne in mind that this was not an indictment for either of these offenses, but was an indictment for a conspiracy to violate both of these laws—introducing liquors into the Indian country which was formerly the Indian Territory. That one conspiracy could be [930] formed to violate any number of laws of the United States seems beyond question. Here the conspiracy was the crime charged and not the introduction of liquors into the Indian country or the carrying of them into the Indian Territory.

It is contended that this conviction could not stand upon the act of 1895 because the indictment failed to charge that the conspiracy was to introduce liquors from without Oklahoma and that the overt acts alleged could not be utilized as the equivalent of such an allegation in the indictment, and reliance is placed upon Ex p. Webb, 225 U. S. 663, 32 S. Ct. 769, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 1248. In that case it was claimed the liquors were shipped from Joplin, Mo., and manifestly it could not involve the question as to whether the act of 1895 was repealed as to importations from parts of Oklahoma not in Indian Territory. It is true that in the Webb Case the Supreme Court said:

"We may thus proceed at once to the question of the effect upon the act of 1895 of the Oklahoma Enabling Act of June 16, 1906 (34 Stat. 267, c. 3335), and the admission of the state of Oklahoma into the Union pursuant thereto. Since the government concedes that the act of 1895 has been thereby repealed saving so far as it prohibited the carrying of intoxicating liquors, etc., from another state into the territory, the matter to be discussed is still further narrowed."

Again the court said:

"No doubt the Enabling Act, followed by the adoption of the Constitution therein prescribed and the admission of the new state, had the effect of remitting to the state government the enforcement of the prohibition respecting the manufacture, sale, barter, etc., of intoxicating liquors within the state, and respecting commerce in such liquors conducted wholly within the state; and, to the extent that the scheme of prohibition established by the Enabling Act covered the same field that had been covered by the act of 1895, the latter act must be considered as impliedly repealed."

If this latter clause stood alone, we would be much inclined to think the act of 1895 had been repealed as to carrying liquors from other parts of Oklahoma into Indian Territory, but the question was again before the Supreme Court in U. S. v. Wright, 229 U. S. 226, 33 S. Ct. 630, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 1160. In that case the Supreme Court said:

"In the Webb Case, as appears from the opinion [225 U. S. 676, 32 S. Ct. 769, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 1248], the government conceded that the act of 1895 had been repealed by the Enabling Act and the admission of the state thereunder, saying so far as it prohibited the carrying of intoxicating liquors, etc., from another state into the territory. The statement to the like effect in the opinion [225 U. S. 681, 32 S. Ct. 769, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 1248] was made in view of this concession; but we see no reason for recalling it."

The latter case, like the former, was a case of importation into the Indian country, but it was a case of importation into the Indian country from Oklahoma. The indictment was not under the act of 1895, but under the acts of 1892 and 1897.

Schaap v. U. S. 210 Fed. 853, 127 C. C. A. 415, involved an indictment for introducing liquor into the Indian country and did not involve the carrying of liquor into Indian Territory. In that case it appears that the liquor was deposited at Ft. Smith, Ark., for transportation [931] into the part of Oklahoma that was formerly Indian Territory. It was an attempt at an interstate shipment. We are therefore of the opinion that it did not involve a decision upon the application of the act of 1895 to transactions wholly within the state of Oklahoma. In other words, that manifestly it did not involve the question whether the importation of liquors from other points in Oklahoma was illegal. In the opinion in that case the court said:

"General expressions, in every opinion, are to be taken in connection with the case in which those expressions are used. If they go beyond the case, they may be respected, but ought not to control the judgment in a subsequent suit when the very point is presented for decision. Cohen v. Virginia, 6 Wheat. 264, 393, 5 U. S. (L. ed.) 257; King v. Pomeroy, 121 Fed. 287, 294, 58 C. C. A. 209, 216; Traer v. Fowler, 144 Fed. 810, 817, 75 C. C. A. 540, 547; Mason City, etc. R. Co. v. Wolf, 148 Fed. 961, 968, 78 C. C. A. 589, 596."

These are all the cases that touch upon the question as to whether the act of 1895 was repealed as to the balance of Oklahoma. This question is now first presented to this court. We feel that, by so specifically pointing out in the Wright Case that all that was said upon the subject in the Webb Case was based upon the admission of the Government, it was distinctly foreshadowed that it would not be binding upon the court in the future, even though it was then said, "We see no reason for recalling it."

It seems time that some one discuss the question, as the government has heretofore conceded it without discussing it.

The effect of holding that the Enabling Act for the admission of the state of Oklahoma repealed the law of 1895 as to importations from parts of Oklahoma not in Indian Territory would in effect hold that importations remained prohibited from the north, south, and east of Indian Territory, but from the west they were turned over to the state.

The provisions of the Enabling Act requiring the prohibition provisions in the Constitution of Oklahoma is of no validity if Oklahoma sees fit to repeal it. She is on an equality with all of the states and can repudiate that and other provisions of the Enabling Act whenever she sees proper. The states are equal in power, and a new state when admitted is clothed with all the power of the original states and she can repudiate all the restrictions placed upon her that do not amount to a contract. Coyle v. Oklahoma, 221 U. S. 559, 31 S. Ct. 688, 55 U. S.

(L. ed.) 853. Why then would the admission of the state repeal the west boundary limit of this law?

In the exercise of its powers to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes, Congress has never recognized the boundaries of states as existent. As pointed out in the Friedman Case, the power to legislate in general with reference to liquor and the Indians is derived from: First, the treaty-making power; second, the power to regulate interstate commerce; third, the power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes; fourth, the ownership, as sovereign, of lands to which the Indian title has not been extinguished; and, fifth, the plenary authority arising out of the guardianship of the Indians as an alien but dependent people.

[932] Prior to the admission of the last of the territories here at home, Congress was also vested with the power to legislate on this subject by the provisions of the Constitution that:

"The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States."

If the act of 1895 was enacted in the exercise of the second of the powers enumerated in the Friedman Case, viz., the power to regulate interstate commerce, then it might well have been that the admission of Oklahoma repealed the statute so far as it applied to the introduction of intoxicating liquors from points of the state of Oklahoma not in Indian Territory. If it was enacted solely in the exercise of the power to enact legislation for the territories, then the admission of the state repealed the act in toto but did not repeal it upon the western side and leave it standing upon the north, south, and east sides.

Quite a different rule would prevail if it was enacted in the exercise of the third, fourth, or fifth powers enumerated in the Friedman Case, namely, the power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes, the power to pass laws by virtue of its ownership as sovereign of land to which the Indian title had not been extinguished, and the authority of Congress arising out of its guardianship of the Indians as an alien but dependent people.

The law could not be assigned to the power to enact laws for the government of the territories because there is not an instance in the whole history of the federal government's dealing with the territories of a federal statute regulating the liquor business. That subject has been uniformly left to the territorial authorities, and the business has been carried on under such licenses or regulation as those authorized saw fit to impose.

Many considerations indicate that the act was passed as a part of the guardianship of the Indians and as a part of the power of Congress to regulate commerce with the Indians.

1. The federal government was under the most solemn pledges, contained in repeated treaties from the time the Indians were first removed to this district, to protect the Indians in their person and property against the evils of intercourse with people of the white race. History clearly shows that the greatest of those evils was the sale of intoxicating liquors.

2. Indian Territory contains the largest body of Indian population in the United States. It is not to be presumed that Congress intended to turn these Indians over to the protection of local authorities. This would be contrary to the uniform practice of the federal government in dealing with other Indian tribes in the various states.

3. Section 1 of the Enabling Act expressly reserves full authority to the national government for the protection of the Indians and their property, and thus shows clearly that it was not the intent of Congress in admitting Oklahoma, to remit the Indians to the control of the state. Protection of them against the liquor traffic has always been their greatest need, and it would be contrary to reason to suppose that the [933] reservation in the first section of the Enabling Act was not intended to cover that subject.

4. The numerous statutes passed by Congress at about the time Oklahoma was admitted, to protect these Indians against the evils of intoxicating liquor, show plainly that Congress intended to exercise this protection itself, and not to remit it to the state. It would be strange, indeed, if out of its abundant caution such a conflict has arisen as to wholly defeat this clear purpose of the federal government.

It is true that subdivision 2 of section 3 of the Enabling Act, containing provisions to be inserted in the constitution of the new state, provided that the Legislature might provide for one agency under the supervision of said state in each incorporated town of not less than 2,000 population and for one to a county in which there was no town of 2,000 inhabitants, for the sale of liquors for medicinal purposes and for the sale of denatured alcohol for industrial and scientific purposes.

This provision probably contemplated the repeal of so much of the act of 1895 as was necessary to enable the proprietors of such dispensaries to obtain intoxicating liquors, but there was no contemplation that if the state authorized such agencies they must obtain their liquors from within the state of Oklahoma. In other words this would be a repeal pro tanto of the act of 1895 upon all sides and not upon the western side. But such proviso or repeal in part of the act of 1895 need not be negative even in an indictment for carrying liquors into Indian Territory. U. S. v. Cook, 17 Wall. 168, 21 U. S. (L. ed.) 538; Ledbetter v. U. S. 170 U. S. 606, 18 S. Ct. 774, 42 U. S. (L. ed.) 1162. Still less would it be necessary to negative the proviso in an indictment for conspiracy to carry liquors into Indian Territory.

The same section of the Enabling Act required the state to prohibit for twenty-one years the sale of intoxicating liquors in Indian Territory. This was to secure the co-operation of the state authorities and was not intended to remit to the state the whole subject of the guardianship of the Indians on approach from the west.

[2] The courts have always held that state lines had nothing whatever to do with this subject. This has been in effect held in every case where a conviction has been had for introducing liquors into the Indian country from within the same state, but it has been squarely so held in U. S. v. Holliday, 3 Wall. 407, 18 U. S. (L. ed.) 182; U. S. v. 43 Gallons Whisky, 93 U. S. 188, 23 U. S. (L. ed.) 846; U. S. v. 43 Gallons Whisky, 108 U. S. 491, 2 S. Ct. 906, 27 U. S. (L. ed.) 803; Dick v. U. S. 208 U. S. 340, 28 S. Ct. 399, 52 U. S. (L. ed.) 520; U. S. v. Sutton, 215 U. S. 291, 30 S. Ct. 116, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 200; Hallowell v. U. S. 221 U. S. 317, 31 S. Ct. 587, 55 U. S. (L. ed.) 750; U. S. v. Wright, 229 U. S. 226, 33 S. Ct. 630, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 1160; U. S. v. Sandoval, 231 U. S. 28, 34 S. Ct. 1, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 107; Perrin v. U. S. 232 U. S. 478, 34 S. Ct. 387, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 691; Pronovost v. U. S. 232 U. S. 487, 34 S. Ct. 391, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 696; U. S. v. Barnhart, 22 Fed. 285.

It thus appears that there was absolutely nothing even after the admission of the state to prevent Congress from prohibiting the importation of liquors into the Indian Territory peopled as it was so largely [394] by Indians, and there is therefore no reason to believe that the admission of the state was intended to repeal this law on the western boundary of the Indian Territory.

If the United States had power to prohibit the introduction of liquors illegally from Oklahoma and from other states into Indian Territory, upon what basis could it be held that the admission of the state repealed the western boundary of prohibition but left standing the prohibition upon the north, south, and east?

Why were these two systems of laws originally enacted? The general allotment law had been in force some years when the act of 1895 was passed. It was manifest that much of what had heretofore been Indian country would soon cease to be such, but Congress wanted to protect the Indians against intoxicating liquors and did not want them admitted to the territory and therefore prohibited their importation absolutely. Nothing could better illustrate the danger than what has happened. It is now lawful under the acts of 1892 and 1897 to ship liquors across Indian country if the point of destination is not Indian country and Indian Territory may be flooded with liquors under the acts of 1892 and 1897. On the other hand, if the act of 1895 was alone in force prohibiting the carrying of liquor within the Indian Territory, why would it be unlawful to transport liquor from a point within the Indian Territory to an allotment therein? It was therefore necessary to maintain the provisions of 1892 and 1897 prohibiting the introduction of liquor into the Indian country.

It is claimed that in some way the western boundary of 1895 was taken down and the government turned over to the state of Oklahoma the guardianship of its wards.

So long as Congress had the right to prohibit the introduction of liquor from Oklahoma into Indian Territory, there should be some clearly defined statute to indicate that Congress abandoned its guardianship and turned it over to the state, and neither the government nor the defendants have ever attempted to point out how was thus abdicated the exercise of congressional powers.

It was not necessary, therefore, for the indictment to allege the conspiracy was to import liquors into the Indian Territory from without Oklahoma.

The conviction may also be sustained upon another ground. The indictment charged a conspiracy to violate the laws of 1892 and 1897 to introduce or attempt to introduce liquors into the Indian country and into the city of Tulsa, which is now a part of what is known as the Indian country, and to other parts and portions of Oklahoma which lie in the Indian country.

That the laws of 1892 and 1897 are in force in the territory named is beyond question since the decision in U. S. v. Wright, 229 U. S. 226, 33 S. Ct. 630, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 1160.

An inspection of the opinion in Schaap v. U. S. of America will show that this court held that, if the place which was charged to be within the Indian country was not so situated, that was a matter for proof upon the trial, and we have before us none of the evidence, and no objection to the indictment could be made upon that ground.

[935] If we should even take judicial notice of the fact that Tulsa was not in the Indian country, the indictment charged that the conspiracy was to introduce liquors into other parts or portions of Oklahoma which lie within the Indian country, and, until we should take judicial notice that no portion of Oklahoma was within the Indian country, the objection to the indictment could not be sustained.

The plaintiffs in error suggest the question: "Can a corporation be lawfully indicted and convicted for a conspiracy which by statute is declared a felony?"

This question was not especially called to the attention of the District Court by any of the subdivisions of the demurrer, motion to quash, or motion in arrest of judgment; but, as the counsel for the plaintiffs in error says that this was presented to the court below upon the argument, we will briefly consider it, although we are not prepared to say that it is pending for consideration here.

"All offenses which may be punished by death, or imprisonment for a term exceeding one year, shall be deemed felonies. All other offenses shall be deemed misdemeanors." Penal Code, § 335 (Fed. St. Ann. 1909, Supp., p. 495).

It follows as the offense of conspiracy may be punished by imprisonment for not more than two years, Penal Code, § 37 (Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 415) the offense here charged was a felony. The statute provides, however, that each of the parties to the conspiracy shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than two years or both. The mercantile company in this case was fined.

Owing to the changes from time to time by statute in the meaning of the term "felony," it is perhaps more apt to become misleading than otherwise. The meaning of the term "felony" is a growth. Originally it meant an offense which occasioned a forfeiture of the lands or goods of the offender as distinguished from a mere money fine. The actual offense here charged was subject to the same punishment before the enactment of the Criminal Code. Rev. St. § 5440; Act May 17, 1879, c. 8, 21 Stat. 4 (2 Fed. St. Ann. 247). Yet it was not a felony. Bannon v. U. S. 156 U. S. 464, 15 S. Ct. 467, 39 U. S. (L. ed.) 494.

In that case, as if anticipating the action of Congress by nearly 15 years, the court said:

"And even if it were made a felony by statute, the indictment would not necessarily be defective for failing to aver that the act was feloniously done."

It is manifest that whether a corporation can be convicted of a criminal offense depends, not upon technical name, treason, felony, or misdemeanor, attached to the crime, but is one of whether the crime is such that the corporation is capable of committing it.

In Bishop's New Criminal Law, par. 417, upon the sole authority of the author, it is said:

"2. Criminal Capabilities Defined.—A corporation cannot in its corporate capacity commit a crime by an act in the fullest sense ultra vires and contrary to its nature. But within the sphere of its corporate capacity, and to an undefined extent beyond, whenever it assumes to act as a corporation it has the same capabilities of criminal intent and of act—in other words, of crime—as an individual man sustaining to the thing the like relations."

[1986] As the evidence is not here, it cannot be told what was the scope of the authority of this particular corporation; but it was doubtless its business to sell liquors.

In Cook on Corporations (6th ed.) vol. 1, p. 94, it is said:

"Even where it is necessary to prove a fraudulent and malicious intent it is held by the great weight of modern authority that the fraud and malice of the authorized agents of a corporation may be imputed to the corporation itself."

See, also, on the imputability of crime to corporations, Wharton's Criminal Law (11th ed.) par. 119.

It has been repeatedly held in civil cases that a corporation may be a party to a conspiracy. Aberthaw Constr. Co. v. Cameron, 194 Mass. 208, 90 N. E. 478, 120 Am. St. Rep. 542; White v. Apsley Rubber Co. 194 Mass. 97, 80 N. E. 500, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 484; Buffalo Lubricating Oil Co. v. Acme Oil Co. 106 N. Y. 660, 12 N. E. 825.

In Thompson on Corporations (2d ed.) 5440, it is said:

"A corporation is liable for conspiracy to the same extent as are individuals under like circumstances."

And see Id., par. 5632.

And in Chicago, etc. Coal Co. v. People, 214 Ill. 421, 73 N. E. 770, it was expressly held that a corporation could be indicted and convicted of a conspiracy at common law.

The plaintiffs in error cite State v. Delmar Jockey Club, 200 Mo. 34, 92 S. W. 185, 98 S. W. 539.

That was a civil case, and its statement therefore in accordance, however, with the ancient holdings that a corporation could not be guilty of a felony, while somewhat persuasive, is not controlling with us because the question was not involved in that case.

They also cite Com. v. New Bedford Bridge, 2 Gray (Mass.) 339. That also was a civil case, but held the company liable for nuisance.

These are the only cases cited on the subject by the plaintiffs in error.

Upon the other hand, see U. S. v. Union Supply Co. 215 U. S. 50, 30 S. Ct. 15, 54

U. S. (L. ed.) 87; Cohen v. U. S. 157 Fed. 651, 85 C. C. A. 113, and U. S. v. MacAndrews, etc. Co. 149 Fed. 823.

The whole growth of the modern law tends to subject corporations, as nearly as may be, to the same pains and penalties imposed upon individuals. Of course, if the law imposed a death penalty or personal imprisonment, a corporation could not be subjected thereto.

Suffice it to say that we think that a corporation could be guilty of a conspiracy to carry liquor into Indian Territory and to introduce it into the Indian country.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

NOTE.

The criminal liability of a corporation is considered in the reported case, which holds that a corporation can be guilty of a conspiracy to violate a liquor law. The cases discussing the criminal liability of a corporation for conspiracy and for other acts of misfeasance are collected in the note to State v. Salisbury Ice, etc. Co. reported ante, this volume, at page 456.

NIEBERG

v.

COHEN ET AL.

Vermont Supreme Court—November 10, 1914.

58 Vt. 281; 92 Atl. 214.

Husband and Wife — Alienation of Affections — Right of Recovery.

A wife at common law had no remedy for alienation of her husband's affections and consequent loss of his society and aid; such right being conferred on her by modern statutes empowering her to sue alone and to hold separate property.

[See Ann. Cas. 1912C 1179.]

Same.

The ordinary right of action of a wife for the alienation of affections and loss of society of her husband through criminal conversation is against the husband's paramour alone.

Same.

A single act of sexual intercourse by a man accustomed to marital infidelities, with a prostitute, on a chance occasion, does not constitute the "enticement" and "alienation" essential to a recovery by the wife in a suit for alienation of affections.

Torts — Incidental Injury to Third Person.

Where one is injured by the wrongful act of another, and a third person suffers an indirect loss because of some contract obligation to the injured party, such loss is not actionable; but where one is injured by the wrongful act of another, and a third person is indirectly and consequently injured in his business relations, the injury to the latter is actionable, though not directly committed on him, if it was maliciously and fraudulently done.

Husband and Wife — Imprisonment of Husband — Right of Wife to Recover.

Defendant C., believing that plaintiff's husband was immorally intimate with C.'s wife, with certain others carried out a scheme to take the husband in flagrante delicto with another woman, that he might be imprisoned for adultery. Held that, defendants wrongful act being leveled at the husband only, and not at plaintiff, she could not recover damages from defendants because of the loss of her husband's affections, society, support, etc., due to his incarceration for such offense. [See note at end of this case.]

Exceptions from Chittenden County Court:
STANTON, Judge.

Action for damages. Lena M. Nieberg, plaintiff, and Victor Cohen et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants allege exceptions. REVERSED.

[232] The statement referred to in the opinion is as follows:

The Niebergs and Cohen were located at St. Albans, where the latter kept a store with his wife in attendance; Agel was an acquaintance of Cohen residing in Boston, who made occasional trips to Burlington and St. Albans; and Hattie Cushing was apparently a resident of Burlington or Winooski. There was evidence that Nieberg had a bad reputation for chastity, and that Mrs. Nieberg had once made a specific complaint to the State's attorney touching his conduct in that respect; that Cohen was suspicious of Nieberg's relations with his wife, and had forbidden his coming to the store, and on subsequently finding him there had beaten him severely.

An officer in St. Albans testified that shortly before the affair in question he went to Cohen's store at his request, and found Cohen and Agel there; that Cohen told him Nieberg was then in a certain house and that he wanted to catch him and asked the witness to go and arrest him; that witness told him he could not do this without papers, but that if he would get a warrant he would make the arrest; that Cohen offered him twenty-five dollars to do the job, and that witness suggested getting some one whom Nieberg would not mistrust; and that Agel then said that he could do the business—that he was going to Burlington, and that Nieberg was often there on business and he could catch him there.

A Burlington attorney testified that Cohen and Agel came to his office together on a Saturday, and talked together about getting Nieberg to come to Burlington, having some laughter between them in connection with it; and that after this Agel had a telephone talk with Nieberg at St. Albans, in which it was agreed that they should meet at Essex Junction at noon the following day about some matter of business. Agel and Nieberg met at Essex Junction as agreed, and came to Burlington together later in the day. Agel testified that the meeting at the Junction was agreed upon for the purpose of going to Montpelier to transact [283] some business, but that he learned Sunday morning that the appointment there was cancelled. Nieberg testified that Agel so informed him, and said, "Come to Burlington."

Defendant Cohen testified in substance that he saw Nieberg take the noon train from St. Albans going south; that he himself took the evening train and arrived in Burlington about eight o'clock, and went to the junction of Bright Street with Winooski Avenue, and remained in that vicinity until about 10:30; that he knew from Agel that Nieberg would be in Burlington that day, and that he expected to see him going to Winooski, and was there watching for him; that when the hackman came along he fell in behind the sleigh, and ran after it, about 25 or 30 rods behind, until it got to the Allen House; that there were only three people in the sleigh; that he saw Nieberg go in with the woman, told the hackman to wait, went to where he could look through the window, saw Nieberg register, then went to the police and communicated with the State's attorney, and after some going about, in which he made use of the hackman, obtained a warrant, which was served between two and three o'clock; that he followed Nieberg to watch him and catch him and have him convicted of adultery; that he did not hire the hackman for that occasion, but paid him two dollars for what he did for him. There was also evidence that Cohen had said that he wanted his revenge and he had got it, and that he paid the hackman thirty dollars for the job. The hackman was put off the State at the time of the trial, and had been for some months.

Agel and Nieberg took an electric car from Essex Junction, and stopped at Braxton's, a disreputable resort near Fort Ethan Allen, and stayed there five or six hours. Agel testified that he had no previous knowledge of the place; that Nieberg wanted to go in and get a drink, and that both drank; that the women there called Nieberg by name, and that he called them by name, and that he told witness about his previous experiences with them; that Nieberg took nothing but a glass of beer, and paid for it himself. Nieberg testified that Agel wanted to stop at Braxton's and get a drink; that he (Nieberg) did not know the women there; that he drank beer, whiskey and brandy, and that Agel paid the bills; that he wanted to take a car back to Essex Junction to get the seven o'clock train, the earliest train by which he could return, but that Agel urged him to go to Burlington. They reached Burlington about seven or eight o'clock, [284] and went to the house of Rabbi Sacks, who was Agel's father-in-law, for some supper. Agel testified that they did not get any because the Rabbi's family were away. Nieberg testified that Mrs. Sacks and the children were there, that both he and Agel had supper, and that he drank two glasses of brandy. Rabbi Sacks testified that he and his wife were about leaving the house when Nieberg came; that he called Nieberg to supper, and that he went to the table; that it was a feast day, and there might have been brandy on the table. Agel and Nieberg went next to Klinkerstein's, where they stayed awhile, but without drinking. For some purpose, as to which they are entirely disagreed, they went from Klinkerstein's to Dorn's saloon on Main Street, and remained in that vicinity until about ten o'clock, but had no drink.

Agel testified that while they were in front of Dorn's Nieberg motioned to the hackman, who was on the other side of the street, to drive over, and that they both got into the sleigh, Nieberg asking him to do so; that they went up Winooski Avenue until they came to a woman who was walking along the sidewalk alone going north, when Nieberg stopped the team and spoke to the woman, and she got in; that he remained in the sleigh until it got as far as Klinkerstein's, when he jumped out and went to his father-in-law's; that he did not know the woman, but that Nieberg called her by name and she called him by name.

Nieberg testified that while he and Agel were talking the hackman came along and Agel said to witness, "come along," and they drove up Winooski Avenue; that the hackman saw the woman and turned the team around and took her in, and that when they got as far as Klinkerstein's Agel jumped out and told the hackman to drive along on Winooski Avenue to the Allen House, and said, "I will be there soon;" that he went there and waited for Agel; that in the warm room the liquor went to his head, and he got very sick and didn't know much; that he did not engage the hack, nor motion it to come across the street; that he did not know the woman, and did not ask the hackman to stop nor ask her to get in. Nieberg registered as "J. M. Thompson and wife, Montpelier, Vt." Agel testified that Nieberg was not drunk when he left him. The officer who arrested him testified that he had been drinking, but was not drunk. There was no evidence of the administering of drugs.

[285] Theodore E. Hopkins and Sherman E. Moulton for defendants.

E. A. Ashland and H. S. Peck for plaintiff.

MUNSON, J.—Louis M. Nieberg was found guilty of committing adultery with Hattie Cushing, and was sentenced to the State prison and served a part of his term. His wife brings this suit against Victor Cohen, Max Agel, and Hattie Cushing to recover damages for the loss she sustained in being thus deprived of his affection, society and support; charging that the defendants conspired together to procure, and did procure, the commission of the offense by means of persuasions and the administering of intoxicating liquor and drugs. Hattie Cushing has not been personally served, nor been within the State since the writ issued, and the trial proceeded against Cohen and Agel alone.

The only exception argued is that taken to the refusal of the court to direct a verdict for the defendants. It was claimed below, and is now argued, that there was no evidence tending to establish the alleged conspiracy, and none tending to show that the defendants did anything to influence Nieberg to commit the crime; that in doing all that the evidence tended to establish, the defendants did nothing but what they had a legal right to do, and that the motive with which one does a legal act is not material.

A somewhat particular presentation of the evidence will be found in the statement of the case.

There was certainly evidence tending to show that Cohen and Agel were acting in concurrence in the execution of a plan previously agreed upon. The claim made by the defendants raises [286] the question whether the undertaking which the evidence tends to establish was merely to keep Nieberg under observation to get evidence of a crime likely to be committed and secure his punishment, or whether it covered a purpose and attempt to bring about the commission of a crime through agencies of their own. The use of the word "persuasions" in the declaration did not confine the plaintiff to influences by word of mouth. The influence may have been exerted through surrounding conditions for which the defendants were responsible. We think the evidence tends to show that Cohen and Agel conspired to bring about the commission of an offence at a time opportune for discovery and proof, by creating conditions calculated to secure the desired result; and that they were actuated therein solely by a desire to injure Nieberg. But it cannot be said that the evidence fairly and reasonably tends to show that Nieberg was so intoxicated as not to be master of himself. We know of no other case like this, and before carrying our conclusions further we give some preliminary consideration to the relation between husband and wife as bearing upon the latter's rights of action.

The wife had no remedy at common law for the alienation of her husband's affection and the consequent loss of his society and aid. This was partly because of her inability to sue independently of her husband, and partly because she was not considered to have any property interest in her husband's services. Knapp v. Wing, 72 Vt. 334, 47 Atl. 1075. But in nearly all jurisdictions where the wife is now empowered to sue alone and to hold separate property, she is held entitled to recover damages of the person causing the alienation, and this without the aid of any special statute. Note, 46 Am. St. Rep. 472.

In other instances of a wrongful deprivation of the husband's support the right of recovery is given by statute. The right to recover for the pecuniary injury resulting to a widow from the loss of her husband's support through his death from a wrongful act did not exist at common law and depends wholly upon the statute. Legg v. Britton, 64 Vt. 652, 659, 24 Atl. 1016. A wife who has lost the support of her husband through the disabling effects of intoxicating liquor unlawfully furnished recovers solely by force of the statute. Enactments of this nature, known as the Civil Damage Acts, give a cause of action where none existed at common law. Campbell v. Harmon, 96 [287] Me. 87, 51 Atl. 801; Volans v. Owen, 74 N. Y. 526, 30 Am. Rep. 337. The recognition of the right of the wife to recover for the loss of support resulting from an alienation of her husband's affection, as a right in existence when her common law disabilities are removed, is doubtless due to the nature of the marriage relation and the mutuality of its peculiar obligations. See Bennett v. Bennett, 116 N. Y. 584, 590, 23 N. E. 17, 6 L.R.A. 553.

It may aid us somewhat in giving this case its proper status if we contrast it with the familiar cases of our reports. The case is not the ordinary suit for alienation of affection and loss of society through an adulterous intercourse. Hattie Cushing, and she alone, would have been the respondent to such a charge. The husband's failure to give his wife the further benefit of his society was not from any lack of willingness on his part, but because he was prevented from living with her by his incarceration. Nor is the case one against relatives or friends who have sought from motives good or bad to separate husband and wife. The defendants have not tried to get the plaintiff's husband to abandon her, nor proceeded from any malicious feeling against her, nor in fact caused her any pecuniary loss except that incident to the husband's punishment for crime.

If this had been the usual suit against the woman whose act is the basis of the plaintiff's claim, there could have been no recovery. A single instance of adultery, had by a man accustomed to marital infidelities with a common prostitute who serves his purpose on a chance occasion, does not constitute the enticement and alienation essential to a recovery. This action is not an alienation suit, but is like it in respect to the damage claimed. The suit seeks a recovery for the same loss of society and support that is sustained in an alienation case, but with the loss due to an imprisonment for the crime of adultery instead of to an alienation of affection. The immediate cause of the damage sued for was the imprisonment. The more remote cause was the action of the defendants.

It may be said generally that when one is injured by the wrongful act of another, and a third person suffers an indirect and consequential loss because of some contract obligation to the injured party, the loss suffered by such third person does not constitute a cause of action. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. New York, etc. R. Co. 25 Conn. 265, 65 Am. Dec. 571; Rockingham Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Boshier, 39 Me. 253, 63 Am. Dec. 618; Ashley v. Dixon, [288] 48 N. Y. 430, 8 Am. Rep. 559; Anthony v. Slaid, 11 Metc. (Mass.) 290. It has been held, however, that where one is injured by the wrongful act of another, and a third party is indirectly and consequentially injured, the injury of the latter is actionable, although not directly committed upon him, if it was maliciously and fraudulently intended to affect, and did injuriously affect, him in his contract or business relations. Gregory v. Brooks, 35 Conn. 487, 95 Am. Dec. 278; McNary v. Chamberlain, 34 Conn. 384, 91 Am. Dec. 732.

The above cases deal with injuries indirectly affecting a third person through his contract obligations to the party immediately injured. There are other cases where the consequential injury is suffered by reason of a natural relation to such injured party. The father, being entitled to the services of his children during their minority, may recover for any injury wrongfully inflicted upon his child which causes a loss of service. A husband has a right to recover for any injury wrongfully inflicted upon his wife, physical or otherwise, which deprives him of her services. The wife has no corresponding general right. But husband and wife each have the same right to recover for an alienation of the other's affection and the consequent loss of society and support. The right of the wife seems not to have been extended beyond this otherwise than by special enactment.

The position of the wife will appear more fully from a reference to some cases where the loss of the husband's society and support was due to other causes than alienation of affection. In Clark v. Hill, 69 Mo. App. 541, the husband, a strong and healthy man, was made incurably insane by the defendant's repeated threats of violence; and the wife brought suit for the loss of her husband's support, comfort and society, and recovered. The ground stated was that under the statutes then existing a married woman could maintain an action in her own name for this loss. It appears from a case cited in the opinion that the statute referred to specifically included in the rights of action which were a part of the property rights conferred, those growing out of any violation of her personal rights. So the decision may be viewed as a construction of the Missouri statute. No such clause is contained in our statute, and it is not necessary to inquire as to the effect of such a provision upon the common law rule.

[289] Where the wife has been deprived of the support of her husband by reason of his injury through the negligent act of another, she is held to have no separate remedy. In Feneff v. New York Cent. etc. R. Co. 203 Mass. 278, 89 N. E. 436, 133 Am. St. Rep. 291, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1024, decided in 1909, it was said that no case had been referred to or found in which an action for a loss of consortium had been maintained because of a personal injury to the other spouse for which that spouse was entitled to recover full compensation; that persons whose relations to the injured party are purely domestic should not be permitted to share in, nor receive a sum in addition to, the compensation to which the injured person is entitled; that their damages are too remote to be made the subject of an action. It is said in Lush's Husband and Wife, ed. 1910, p. 13, that there is no reported case of an action by a wife, or by husband and wife, for consequential damage to the wife through the negligent act of a defendant causing personal injuries or other damage directly to the husband.

The only cases we know of where the loss of support resulted from the husband's imprisonment for crime were cases which arose under the Civil Damage Acts. Most of these statutes provide that the wife may recover for a loss of the means of support as well as for injuries to person and property. This provision regarding the means of support is held to apply to both the direct and indirect results of the intoxication; and in actions brought under the statutes containing it the wife is allowed to recover for the loss of support which she suffers because of her husband's imprisonment. Beers v. Walhizer, 43 Hun 254, 4 N. Y. St. Rep. 377; Homire v. Halfman, 156 Ind. 470, 60 N. E. 154. In other cases, where the statutory remedy is confined to injuries to person and property, a recovery for the loss of support resulting from the husband's imprisonment is denied. Bradford v. Boley, 167 Pa. St. 506, 31 Atl. 751; See Dennison v. Van Wormer, 107 Mich. 461, 65 N. W. 274.

It is evident that the plaintiff cannot recover the damages claimed in the absence of a statutory authorization, unless upon some special ground. It is true that the loss she suffered resulted from an intentional and malicious act. But the malicious purpose and act of the defendants were directed against the husband and not against the wife. Whatever Nieberg's right against the defendants might have been if their acts had deprived him of [290] his will, he certainly could not have recovered upon the case as presented. The reasoning in the Feneff case, based upon the husband's right of recovery, is not to be taken as implying that the wife may recover where the husband cannot. It is not the deprivation of the husband's support, but the cause of the deprivation, which determines the question of remedy. If the deprivation is due to an alienation of the husband's affection, the wife has a right of action corresponding to that of the husband. If the deprivation is due to causes for which the husband may recover, his recovery is deemed to be partly for the wife's benefit, and the remedy is clearly to the husband and not to the wife. If the conduct of the husband was such that he cannot recover, there can be no recovery by the wife, unless upon grounds directly personal to her. In such a case the damage would be considered immediate and not consequential. It is said in the work above cited that no action will lie at the suit of the wife for loss of consortium, or indeed for any other consequential damages which she may have suffered from an act of trespass to her husband, except possibly when the trespass is committed upon the husband with intent to injure the wife. As this case shows no intent to injure the wife, it is not necessary to pursue the argument further.

As the case stands, the situation is the same as in any case where the head of a dependent family is convicted of crime and sentenced to imprisonment. The rights of all persons entitled to the support of a relative are subject to the right of the State to exact the penalty for his breach of the law. The wife is in a class by herself, but she is not the only one entitled to support. The obligations of support are both natural and statutory. The family may consist of a wife, or a dependent child, or other relative entitled to support,—as a dependent parent or grandparent, brother or sister, or grandchild,—or of all these together. It would be difficult to place a recovery in this case upon grounds which would not be equally available to other relatives entitled to support.

Our conclusions upon the points considered are such that it is not necessary to characterize the nature of the defendants' acts more fully than was done in opening the discussion; nor to consider the proper application of the rule regarding the motive with which a lawful act is done; nor to inquire as to the [291] rights of private persons with reference to the detection and punishment of crime.

Judgment reversed and judgment for defendants.

NOTE.

Right of Wife to Recover Damages for Imprisonment of Husband.

The reported case, dealing with what appears to be a novel situation, holds that a wife has no cause of action against persons who entice her husband into the commission of a crime, by reason of which he is legally imprisoned and she loses his support and society. While the decisions are not in accord, it appears that by the weight of authority a wife may, even in the absence of a statute, recover for a tortious act resulting in loss of consortium. See the note to Flandermeyer v. Cooper, Ann. Cas. 1913A 983. Though that doctrine has been invoked most frequently in actions for enticement or alienation of affections it has in several cases cited in the note referred to, been applied to wrongs to the husband resulting in a loss of consortium. Thus in Flandermeyer v. Cooper, supra, a recovery by a wife was sustained against a person who by furnishing morphine to the husband eventually produced a condition requiring his confinement in an asylum, the court in that case forcibly combating the position assumed in the reported case that malice against the wife or intent to injure her was necessary. So in Clark v. Hill, 69 Mo. App. 541, it was held that an action could be maintained by a wife for loss of consortium due to her husband's becoming insane by reason of threats of violence.

KULESH ET AL.

Iowa Supreme Court—December 13, 1913.

163 Ia. 748; 144 N. W. 306.

Landlord and Tenant — Rights of Tenant — Use of Wall for Advertising.

Where a lease is of "the lower floor and shed" of a brick building, the lessee has the right to use reasonably the columns or walls of the building for advertising his business, as by painting a sign thereon, etc., unless such use is unusual, unreasonable, or harmful as against the objection by the landlord that he wishes himself to use the columns for advertising his own business in the same building.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from District Court, Pottawattamie county: ARTHUR, Judge.

Action for injunction. Sam Snyder, plaintiff, and H. N. Kulesh et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

A. W. Askwith for appellants.
Saunders & Stuart for appellee.

[749] DEEMER, J.—Plaintiff is the owner of a two-story, brick and stone building on one of the main streets of Council Bluffs, and in the year 1911 leased the defendants the first floor and basement of the building for the term of two years, with an option on their part to extend the term three years after the expiration of the one created by the lease. The premises were rented for a pawnshop, a jewelry, and firearms business. The building fronts on what is known as Broadway street, in Council Bluffs, and the entrance to the front room is near the middle of the building. On either side of the entrance there are plate glass windows, and on the outer side of each of the windows are stone columns, each from fourteen to eighteen inches wide, made to support the upper story and to hold the front in place. On the west side of the west column is a stairway leading to the upper story, and this stairway is a common one used not only for entrance to the second story of plaintiff's building, but also to the second story of an adjoining one; and one-half of this stairway is on plaintiff's property, the column on that side of the building being wholly on plaintiff's lot. Just before the commencement of this action, defendants were about to paint a sign, advertising their business, upon the west column, above described, and had employed a sign painter to paint one, some sixteen or eighteen inches square, when plaintiff commenced this action to [750] enjoin them from so doing. He claimed that defendants had no right to use the outside of his building, and secured a temporary injunction restraining them from painting any sign on the front of the building. The case was not presented to the lower court on the theory that the painting of the sign upon the column would greatly disfigure and damage the same, although in a reply plaintiff alleged that the use of black paint upon the stone column would mar the same, and further pleaded that defendants were proposing to erect or paint their sign for the purpose of injuring him, he being a competitor of theirs in business; and that he wished to use the column as a place for painting a sign of his own.

We are not advised as to the reason why the trial court entered the decree it did; for it certainly could not have been upon the theory that the painting of the sign, which defendants were proposing to put upon the column, would in any way injure, mar, or deface it. The record shows that this paint could easily have been removed from the stone at any time, without leaving any stains thereon. So that there is nothing upon which to base the claim of defacement. Plaintiff, before commencing the suit, said to several people that he rented the inside and not the outside of the building to the defendants, and that they had no right to put a sign upon any of the walls or columns. This may have been the basis of the decree, but it has no support either in fact or in law. The lease covered "the lower floor and shed of the brick building and also the basement," and it was without any reservations or covenants which either expressly or impliedly prohibited the use of the walls or columns of the building in any manner not harmful to them or injurious to the building as a whole. Defendants had the right to reasonably use these columns or the walls of the building, if they were exposed, for the purpose of advertising their business, and should not be restrained from such use, unless it was unusual, unreasonable, or harmful. Lowell v. Strahan, 145 Mass. 1, 12 N. E. 401, 1 Am. St. Rep. 422; Forbes v. Gorham, 159 Mich. 291, [751] 123 N. W. 1089, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 318, 134 Am. St. Rep. 718. Indeed, this proposition seems to be so fundamental that no authority need be cited in support thereof.

The lease of the lower floor, which, in the absence of reservation, covers the walls and supporting columns, gave the tenant the right to a reasonable use thereof for the purpose of advertising his business, so long as he did not permanently mar or deface the building; and, conceding arguendo that the landlord might use part of the space for the purpose of notifying his customers as to where he might be found, it does not follow that in so doing he might deprive his tenant of the reasonable use of the exposed walls or columns to advertise his own business. The sign which defendants proposed to have painted would not interfere with the landlord's use of it for any legitimate and proper purpose, and if it did we are not prepared to say on this record that plaintiff had a prior and superior right to the use of this column for the purpose of advertising his business. There was a sign over the entrance to the building notifying the public that plaintiff was in business in that building and the character thereof, and, while there is some testimony that defendants were not particular in directing customers to him, this did not deprive them of their right to a reasonable use of the building under their lease.

Plaintiff was not, under the showing made, entitled to a permanent injunction. On the contrary, his petition should have been dismissed.

The decree will therefore be and it is reversed, and the cause remanded.

Reversed and remanded.

NOTE.

Right of Tenant of Building to Use of Front Wall for Advertising Purposes.

The earlier cases which discuss the right of a tenant to use the front wall of the leased building for advertising purposes are collected in the note to Broads v. Mead, Ann. Cas. 1912C 1125. It is intended in the present note to review the more recent decisions on the subject.

The rule laid down in the earlier cases that a tenant, irrespective of any provision to that effect in his lease, has a right to make reasonable use of the front wall or walls of the leased building for advertising purposes, finds support in a few late cases. Joseph v. London, County Council, 111 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 276, [1914] W. N. 204, 30 Times L. Rep. 508, 58 Sol. J. 579; Di Marco v. Isaac, 74 Misc. 459, 132 N. Y. S. 363. And see the reported case. Thus in Joseph v. London County Council, supra, it appeared that a lease contained the following covenant: "The lessee will not during the said term without the previous written license of the lessors, their successors or assigns, cut or maim any of the principal walls or timbers of the buildings for the time being on the ground hereby demised, commit or permit any waste or damage to the said buildings or to the floors or timbers thereof, or make or permit to be made any alteration in the elevation of the buildings or in the architectural decoration thereof, or permit any steam engine or furnace or any additional building, chimney, or flue to be erected on the said demised premises, or use, exercise, carry on, or permit to be used, exercised, or carried on in any part of the said demised premises any dangerous, noxious, noisome, or offensive trade or business whatsoever, or any trade or business whereby the insurance against fire may be vitiated or lessened in value." It was held that the words of the covenant referred to an alteration in the fabric of the premises, and therefore the lease was not broken by the erection by the tenant of an electric light advertisement which was supported by an iron frame work hung by steel bands affixed to the ornamental stonework in the front of the premises, all of which could be removed at any time and would leave the building the same as before.

In Goldfoot v. Walch [1914] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 213, 83 L. J. Ch. 360, 109 L. T. N. S. 820 [1913] W. N. 357, a tenant of the first and second floors of a business building, who under his lease had a right to exhibit on the premises certain advertisements, was granted a mandatory injunction to compel his landlord to remove from the wall of the second story of the building two large advertising boards.

In Alfre Peats Co. v. Bradley, 149 N. Y. S. 613, wherein a tenant sought to enjoin his landlord from erecting an electric advertising sign on that part of the common roof of a row of stores below which was the shop that had been leased to the plaintiff, it was said by the court that there was no reason or principle for treating the roof of such a building as the one in question differently than the outer walls, and that a tenant had a right to use the walls and roof for advertising purposes provided that in so doing he did not commit waste or violate the law, and he was therefore entitled to the relief asked for.

In Just v. Stewart, 23 Manitoba 517, 12 Dominion L. Rep. 65, 24 West L. Rep. 433, it appeared that a tenant had occupied premises subsequently leased to him and had, during such occupation, erected a sign on the wall of the building. The lease which he later signed prohibited the erection of signs of this kind. The landlord contended that the lease had been broken and a forfeiture incurred but the court held that as the sign was on the structure at the time the lease was signed and as the landlord knew it was there and had not objected to it, there was not such a violation of the lease, as would result in a forfeiture.

The principle underlying the foregoing decisions also finds support in Hope v. Cowan [1913] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 312, 82 L. J. Ch. 439, 108 L. T. N. S. 945, 57 Sol. J. 559, 29 Times L. Rep. 520, which was an action by a landlord to restrain a tenant of an office room on the first floor of a building from placing on his office window sills flower boxes which rested on brackets screwed into the lower part of the window frames. The court dismissed the action, and said: "Now, after the arguments I have heard, it appears to me that speaking generally in the case of a demise of one floor of a building, or of a room on any floor which is bounded or enclosed on one or more sides by an outside wall, unless the outside wall be excepted or reserved or there be some context which leads to a contrary conclusion, prima facie the premises demised comprise the whole; that is to say, both sides of the outside wall. This is so prima facie, and as far as I am aware the contrary has never been suggested in reference to a ground floor nor in reference to a top floor; but it has been suggested—certainly it was argued—in this case with reference to a room on the middle floor. I do not see what difference the particular floor makes. The demise of a room must necessarily include, unless it be excepted, some part of the wall which bounds it."

However, the right of the tenant cannot be so exercised as to cause material injury to the building. Hayman v. Rownd, 82 Neb. 598, 118 N. W. 328, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 623. In that case it appeared that a tenant for years was about to drive wooden plugs into a brick wall of the leased premises to which a sign was to be attached, and that this would do considerable damage to a wall of the kind in question. The landlord brought an action to restrain the tenant from carrying out his plans and the court ordered a restraining order to be issued as prayed for.

SHINAULT ET AL.

Arkansas Supreme Court—April 27, 1914.

113 Ark. 19; 166 S. W. 740.

Appeal — Review of Facts.

A finding not contrary to the preponderance of the evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.

Schools — Use of School Building — Lodge Meetings.

Kirby's Dig. § 7643, authorizing school directors to permit a private school to be taught in the schoolhouse while not occupied by a public school, unless otherwise directed by the voters of the district, does not exclude other uses of school buildings, where the same do not interfere with the schools nor injure the buildings, and does not render invalid a contract authorizing a local lodge of a secret society to use a school building for a lodgeroom; the use not interfering with the school nor injuring the building.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Kirby's Dig. § 7614, conferring on school directors the power to control the school affairs with the custody of the schoolhouses and grounds, and preserve the same, vests in the directors discretion in arrangements for the interest of the district and they may, with the approval of the voters of the district, permit a secret society to use the school building as a lodgeroom, where such use does not interfere with the school nor injure the building, but is advantageous to the district in view of its financial condition.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Chancery Court, Lawrence county: HUMPHRIES, Chancellor.

Action for injunction. A. B. Cost et al., plaintiffs, and J. F. Shinault et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

W. A. Cunningham for appellants.

W. E. Beloate for appellees.

[20] SMITH, J.—Appellants were plaintiffs below, and alleged the following facts in their complaint: That they were citizens and taxpayers of School District No. 64 of Lawrence County, Arkansas, and interested in the educational interests of that district, and that appellees, who were defendants below, were school directors of said district, and as such had control of the schoolhouse and grounds, and that school was being taught in the school building, all of which was needed for the accommodation of the children attending school. That the said directors, notwithstanding that fact, are about to lease a part of said building to the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, as a lodge hall, and are about to cause said building to be remodeled without right or authority from the voters of said district, by causing the stairway to be moved and other changes to be made, and that if such changes are made it will entirely unfit the building for the use for which it was originally designed, and will make the same totally unfit for use as a school building.

That the use of said building as a lodge room is entirely inconsistent with its use as a school, and will interfere with the use and enjoyment of the other rooms of the building as schoolrooms, and will cause great and irreparable injury to the public and interfere with the educational interests of said district.

Plaintiffs prayed that said directors and all other persons be forever enjoined from changing or altering [21] said building in any way, without first submitting the plans thereof to the voters of said district, and that said directors be enjoined from leasing any part of the building to any person, for any purpose whatever, except for the conduct of schools.

The answer denied that the directors were about to make any change in the building, which was detrimental to it, or any contract or lease with reference to the use of the building, which would in any way interfere with the school being taught therein.

There was offered in evidence a contract dated December 27, 1911, made between representatives of the local Odd Fellows Lodge and the directors of the district, under the terms of which for the consideration of $50, to be paid on or before October 1, 1912, the directors rented to said lodge the upper part, or second story, of the school building for the use of said lodge, for a term of one year from January 1, 1912, with an option to renew said lease for a period of five years. The school district, however, reserved the right to use the building for school exhibitions and entertainments of its own.

At the annual school election in May, 1912, the directors caused the question of the ratification of this lease to be submitted to the electors voting at that election, and it was ratified by a vote of nineteen for, and one against.

It appears that the revenues of the district had been insufficient to provide the necessary funds for school purposes, and subscription lists had been circulated upon which private contributions were asked for school purposes. The evidence was conflicting as to the interference with the school on account of this lease, and of the damage to the building in adapting it to the uses of the Odd Fellows. But the court found the fact to be that no damage was occasioned to the said school building by reason of the changes made in the building by the Odd Fellows Lodge, and that no interference had resulted, or would result, to the school being taught, or that would thereafter be taught in said building, by reason of the upper story thereof being used as a lodgeroom, and that the [22] plaintiffs' complaint should be dismissed for want of equity.

We think this finding was not contrary to the preponderance of the evidence.

Appellants cite us to section 7643, of Kirby's Digest, which provides that directors may permit a private school to be taught in the district schoolhouse during such time as the said house is not occupied by a public school, unless they be otherwise directed by a majority of the legal voters of the district, and contend that the express granting of power for this purpose is in effect a denial of power to let it for any other purpose. But we do not agree with that contention. Section 7614, of Kirby's Digest, provides that the directors shall have charge of the school affairs and the school educational interests of their district, and shall have the care and custody of the schoolhouses and grounds and property of the district, and shall carefully preserve same, and gives to them authority to purchase or lease a schoolhouse site and to rent, purchase or build a schoolhouse with the funds of the district. And this section vests them with the duty and discretion of making the most advantageous arrangements possible, within the powers conferred, for the interest of the district. In the case of Boyd v. Mitchell, 69 Ark. 202, 62 S. W. 61, this section was construed to give school directors the right to prohibit the use of a school building for religious worship, where it was shown the building and contents were being injured, notwithstanding the land on which the school building was situated was conveyed to trustees for the purpose of religious worship, and was by them conveyed to the school directors for the same purpose, and the building was erected in part by subscriptions, with the understanding that it was to be so used under the charge of the directors. The court pretermitted any discussion of the power of the directors to make any arrangement to build a house to be used as a schoolhouse, and also as a church or as a place for religious [23] worship, as it found, under the facts in that case, that the schoolhouse was, when built, to be under the control of the directors of the school district and the property of said district, and after so finding the facts to be, it was there said: "If it was to be under their control, in contemplation of law it was within their province, and was, perhaps, in strictness, their duty, not to allow it used for purposes other than school purposes. It seems that this is apparent. They have no power beyond those expressly granted or arising by necessary implication." The court found in that case that the schoolhouse was being damaged by the use which was being made of the building, and that the directors in the exercise of their power of control, and their duty to preserve the property of the district, had the right to prohibit the use of the schoolhouse for religious purposes, and that this was true notwithstanding the individual contributions which had been made, and which were used in erecting the schoolhouse, upon the understanding that the house was to be used as a schoolhouse and for religious worship.

So here, we should not hesitate to hold that the contract was void, if its performance interfered with the school. But the chancellor has expressly found that such was not the case. The electors of that district, who were the patrons of that school, voted for the ratification of the contract, and in their depositions made it appear, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the schools were not being interfered with nor the building damaged. Upon the contrary, the revenues of the district were being supplemented by the annual rental in the sum of $50, and under the circumstances we think the contract was not an unlawful one, nor void as being against public policy. Of course, the district could not divert its funds for the purpose of building or providing lodge rooms for any association or society, however benevolent its purposes might be, neither would the directors have the right to make any contract which authorized the use of the school property in a manner which interfered with the schools. But as has been stated, that was not done in this case.

[24] It is a matter of common knowledge that many quasi-public uses are made of the rural school buildings of the State. We do not believe it was the purpose of the Legislature in granting express authority for private schools to be taught in the public school building, to exclude other uses where such uses do not interfere with the schools nor injure the buildings.

We think the decree of the chancellor is correct, and it is affirmed.

NOTE.

Power of School Authorities to Permit Use of School Building for Other than Religious or Public School Purposes.

It is of course obvious that a school building built and maintained by public funds cannot be put to a use inconsistent with the welfare of the school (Sugar v. Monroe, 108 La. 677, 32 So. 961, 59 L.R.A. 723, theater) unless the use of the building for school purposes has been discontinued. Gottlieb Knabe Co. v. Macklin, 109 Md. 429, 16 Ann. Cas. 1092, 71 Atl. 949, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 580. But aside from the question of the use of a school building for religious purposes (see the note to Reichwald v. Catholic Bishop, Ann. Cas. 1914B 301) it is held in several jurisdictions that school authorities may permit the use of a school building for an occasional or incidental purpose not inconsistent with the welfare of the school. Lagow v. Hill, 238 Ill. 428, 87 N. E. 369, affirming 143 Ill. App. 523 (lodge); Royse Independent School Dist. v. Reinhardt (Tex.) 159 S. W. 1010 (campus leased for baseball ground during school vacation). And see the reported case. See also State v. Kessler, 136 Mo. App. 236, 117 S. W. 85 (wherein it was held that an order prohibiting the use of a school building for certain entertainments was illegal because made at a meeting held outside the district); Rhodes v. Maret, 102 Tex. 519, 119 S. W. 1139 (building constructed by public subscription for joint use as lodgeroom and public school). In Sugar v. Monroe, 108 La. 677, 32 So. 961, 59 L.R.A. 723, the court said: "We do not wish to be understood as going to the extreme of holding that the city authorities may not make such casual and incidental use of the building in question, not inconsistent with, or prejudicial to, the main purpose for which it was erected, as they may deem advisable, nor as holding that changed conditions in the future may not justify them in devoting it to some other purpose. The question here presented is, whether they have the legal right, at this time, to make use of it, or any part of it, for the purpose of maintaining a theater therein, or of giving theatrical performances, as a business, and this question we decide in the negative." In Greenbanks v. Boutwell, 43 Vt. 207, it was said: "In the present case, if the hall was designed to accommodate the schools and the inhabitants of the district for the purpose of examinations and exhibitions and other such things as are proper and customary in connection with district schools, and it was adopted in that view, the purpose was legitimate and within the province of the district to carry out by making the hall. On the other hand, if the view and purpose were not such, but the design was, to use the occasion of building a schoolhouse as a pretext for making a public hall for town meetings, religious meetings, lectures, concerts, dances, picnics, and the other uses to which such halls are ordinarily put, then the district was doing what it had no lawful authority to do. If again, the hall was designed and adapted to serve the interests of the district in respect to its schools, the making of the hall would not be rendered illegal if, when not wanted for school purposes the district should permit it to be used for other purposes, having no relation to the schools. While it would not be lawful for the district to make lofts, or rooms, for the mere purpose of realizing profit by renting for pay, it would not be unlawful for the district to receive pay and profit for the use of rooms legitimately made for school purposes, when not in use for those purposes, and when they may be used for other purposes without detriment to the district in respect to its schools. We can readily conceive that the prospect of being able to derive income from such outside use of a hall, like the one in question, which may be really needed for the occasional accommodation of the schools, may properly operate as an influence upon the district in forming the determination to build one. While, but for such prospect, the district might feel too poor to make the outlay, still, with such prospect, it may regard it judicious to do so, and thus provide a desirable appendage to the school house for the service of the interests of the schools, which otherwise the district would feel compelled to forego." In Sheldon v. Centre School Dist. 25 Conn. 224, it was held that the fact that the vote for the construction of a school building authorized its use for lectures and other incidental purposes did not invalidate the vote or warrant an injunction against the collection of the tax thereby levied.

The permitting of the use of a school building for a private school or private instruction has been sustained in several cases. Barnes's Appeal, 6 R. I. 591; Chaplin v. Hill, 24 Vt. 528; Russell v. Dodda, 37 Vt. 497. And see Townsend v. Hagan, 35 Ia. 194. Thus in Barnes's Appeal, supra, holding that the school authorities could permit the use of a school building for private instruction in music the court said: "Instruction in this art, is quite commonly furnished in our public schools, to enable the children to join in an exercise always agreeable to them, and to fit them to participate in one of the ordinary acts of public devotion. The use of the school house, when not needed for the regular course, that the like instruction may be imparted to the scholars and others of the district, so that the knowledge and taste of all in this excellent accomplishment may be promoted, is quite in accordance with the uses to which such property is appropriated by law; and the last objection which a friend of public education should make to such a use is, that the people of the district are so desirous of such instruction, that they are willing to pay for it themselves." However, in Weir v. Day, 35 Ohio St. 143, it was held that the use of a school building for private instruction cannot be permitted if it is inconsistent with the public use.

It has been held in Indiana that the use of a school building for township meetings may be permitted. Harmony Tp. v. Osborne, 9 Ind. 458. However, a subsequent statute in that jurisdiction provides that a vote of the electors of the school district is essential to authorize a use for other than school purposes. Hurd v. Walters, 48 Ind. 148.

In a few jurisdictions it is held that, even under a statute authorizing the school authorities to permit the use of a school building for such purposes as they deem proper, they cannot permit its use for any private purpose. Spencer v. Joint School Dist. 15 Kan. 259, 22 Am. Rep. 268; Bender v. Streabich, 182 Pa. St. 251, 37 Atl. 853; Lewis v. Bateman, 26 Utah 434, 73 Pac. 509; School Dist. v. Arnold, 21 Wis. 657; Tyre v. Krug, 159 Wis. 39, 149 N. W. 718, L.R.A.1915C 624. In Spencer v. Joint School Dist. supra, it was said: "The question as it comes before us may fairly be thus stated: May the majority of the tax-payers and electors in a school district, for other than school purposes, use or permit the use of the schoolhouse built with funds raised by taxation? The question is one which in view of the times, and the attacks made in so many places, and from so many directions, upon our public school system, justifies, as it has received at our hands, most serious consideration. We are fully aware of the fact that all over the state the schoolhouse is, by general consent, or at least without active opposition, used for a variety of purposes other than the holding of public schools. Sabbath schools of separate religious denominations, church assemblies, sometimes political meetings, social gatherings, etc., are held there. Now, none of these can be strictly considered among the purposes for which a public building can be erected, or taxation employed. But it often happens, particularly in our newer settlements, that there is no other public building than the schoolhouse—no place so convenient as that. The use for these purposes works little damage. It is used by the inhabitants of the district whose money has built it, and used for their profit or pleasure. Shall it be said that this is illegal? Doubtless, if all in the district are content, no question will ever be raised; and, on the other hand, if a majority object, the use for such purposes will cease. It is only when the majority favor, and a minority object, that the courts are appealed to. That minority may be but a single individual,—may be influenced by spite or revenge, or any other unworthy motive; but, whatever the motives which prompt the litigation, the decision must be in harmony with the absolute right of all. It seems to us that upon well-settled principles the question must be answered in the negative. The public schoolhouse cannot be used for any private purposes. The argument is a short one. Taxation is invoked to raise funds to erect the building; but taxation is illegitimate to provide for any private purpose. Taxation will not lie to raise funds to build a place for a religious society, a political society, or a social club. What cannot be done directly cannot be done indirectly. As you may not levy taxes to build a church, no more may you levy taxes to build a schoolhouse and then lease it for a church. Nor is it an answer to say that its use for school purposes is not interfered with, and that the use for the other purposes works little, perhaps no immediately perceptible, injury to the building, and results in the receipt of immediate pecuniary benefit. The extent of the injury or benefit is something into which courts will not inquire. The character of the use is the only legitimate question. A municipal bond of five cents in aid of a purely private purpose is as void as one of a thousand dollars; and that, too, though the actual benefit to the municipality far exceeds the amount of the bond. The use of a public schoolhouse for a single religious or political gathering is legally as unauthorized as its constant use therefor. True, a court of equity would not interfere by injunction after a single use, and where there was no likelihood of a repetition of the wrong, for it is only apprehended wrongs that equity will enjoin. Here the unauthorized use is charged as a frequent fact, and one likely to occur hereafter." So in Bender v. Streabich, 182 Pa. St. 251, 37 Atl. 853, it was said: "The use of school buildings by the community at large for public meetings for the discussion of subjects of general interest may be said to be in the line of their use for educational purposes, but it is not the use intended by law. The public school system is for the instruction of pupils who may attend the schools, and not for the instruction or entertainment of other persons. The school directors are trustees of the school property for that use, and they may not against objection authorize or permit its use for other purposes. If the school buildings may be used for meetings for the convenience, pleasure or instruction of the general public, all other school property may with equal propriety be so used, and it would be but a step further to apply a part of the school funds to the same use. This view of the law does not forbid the use of the buildings for any purpose directly related to the instruction of the pupils of the schools, and it does not exclude their use for lectures or debates which are made a part of the course of instruction."

THOMAS CUSACK COMPANY

v.

CITY OF CHICAGO ET AL.

Illinois Supreme Court—December 16, 1914.

267 Ill. 344; 108 N. E. 340.

Municipal Corporations — Regulation of Bill Boards.

A city has power to enact an ordinance requiring the consent of a majority of the residence owners to the erection of a billboard in a residence block, under Hurd's Civ. St. 1913, c. 24, § 696, giving cities power to regulate the location of billboards, etc., upon vacant property and upon buildings.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

On a question of the reasonableness of a city ordinance requiring the consent of the majority of the residence owners in accordance with frontage, evidence tending to show that the erection of billboards is productive of fire, and that residence districts are not so well protected as the business district, is admissible.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

On the question of the reasonableness of a city ordinance requiring the consent of residence owners as a condition to the erection of a billboard in a residence block, evidence that such boards offered a protection to disorderly and lawbreaking persons, and that residence districts were not so well policed as other districts, is admissible.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

An ordinance requiring the consent of residence owners to the erection of a billboard in a residence block is not discriminatory in that there is no difference between fences, buildings, and billboards.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

An ordinance requiring the consent of the majority of residence owners according to frontage to the erection of a billboard in a residence block is not unreasonable in view of the liability of fire, the liability of a use by disorderly persons for unlawful and immoral purposes, and the difference between fire and police protection in residence districts and other districts.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

An ordinance requiring the consent of the majority of residence owners according to frontage to the erection of a billboard in a residence block is not unreasonable because it requires the consent of a majority of the owners of property on both sides of the street where the billboard is to be erected.

Appeal from Superior Court, Cook county:
FOELL, Judge.

Action for injunction. Thomas Cusack Company, plaintiff, and City of Chicago, et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

John W. Beckwith, William H. Sexton and Loring R. Hoover for appellants.

John S. Hummer for appellee.

[345] VICKERS, J.—The Thomas Cusack Company, a corporation, filed a bill in equity in the superior court of Cook county against the city of Chicago, the mayor of the city, and other officials, to restrain the enforcement of an ordinance regulating the erection and maintenance of bill-boards in residence blocks in said city. The bill alleges that the complainant is engaged in the business of outdoor advertising in Chicago and elsewhere, and that it maintains bill-boards on private property in residence blocks without having complied with an ordinance of the city of Chicago passed and in force December 5, 1910. The section of the ordinance the validity of which is involved is as follows:

"707. Frontage consents required.—It shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation to erect or construct any bill-board or sign-board in any block on any public street in which one-half of the buildings on both sides of the street are used exclusively for residence purposes, without first obtaining the consent, in writing, of the owners or duly authorized agents of said owners owning a majority of the frontage of the property, on both sides of the street, in the block in which such bill-board or sign-board is to be erected, constructed or located. Such written [346] consents shall be filed with the commissioner of buildings before a permit shall be issued for the erection, construction or location of such bill-board or sign-board."

The bill alleges that a large number of bill-boards have been erected since the passage of said ordinance without complying with its provisions in regard to obtaining the consent of the majority of the property owners fronting on both sides of the street in the blocks in which such bill-boards have been erected and maintained; that the occupation of lots with these bill-boards is under leases made with the owners of the lots, and that the complainant has made contracts with its customers for the maintenance of said boards and the display of advertisements thereon. The bill alleges that the section of the ordinance above set out is invalid for the reason that it is discriminatory and unconstitutional, in that it deprives property owners of their property without due process of law, in violation of the constitutions of the United States and of the State of Illinois. The bill also alleges that the bill-boards erected in violation of said ordinance do not in any way interfere with the public health, safety, welfare or comfort, and alleges that the city of Chicago has no power to pass said ordinance, and that if said city has power to pass any ordinance on the subject of bill-boards, the one in question is void for unreasonableness. The prayer is for a perpetual injunction against the city and its officials enjoining them from the enforcement of said ordinance.

The defendants below answered the bill, in which the alleged invalidity is denied. The answer alleges that the ordinance was regularly passed by the city council pursuant to expressed legislative authority, and that it is a proper exercise of the police power of the city of Chicago, and the State of Illinois. The answer sets up that bill-boards are dangerous to the public health, safety, morals, welfare and comfort in that they afford protection to disorderly persons, who conceal themselves behind them; that the space behind [347] bill-boards is used in such manner as to create nuisances by reason of the shelter and protection afforded by said bill-boards; that the maintenance of such bill-boards causes the accumulation of inflammable material, thereby increasing the danger of fires. The answer denies that the ordinance is invalid for any reason, and particularly that it is not invalid because discriminatory, oppressive or unreasonable.

The cause was heard upon evidence produced in open court, and a decree was entered in accordance with the prayer of the bill, perpetually enjoining the enforcement of the ordinance. The defendants below have prosecuted an appeal to this court.

The sole question involved for our consideration is the validity of section 707 of the municipal code of Chicago, which is quoted above. The contentions in support of the decree are, first, that the municipality had no power to pass the ordinance in question; and second, conceding that the city has the power to pass proper regulatory ordinances in regard to the erection and maintenance of bill-boards, the ordinance here involved is void because it is not a proper exercise of such power, in that it is oppressive and unreasonable.

This court held in Chicago v. Gunning System, 214 Ill. 628, 2 Ann. Cas. 892, 73 N. E. 1035, 70 L.R.A. 230, that under paragraph 66 of section 1 of article 5 of the Cities and Villages act, relating to the police power, and under paragraph 75 of said section, relating to nuisances, a city has power to enact and enforce reasonable regulations respecting bill-boards within the corporate limits, whether upon public streets or private property. On page 639 this court summed up its view upon this question, as follows: "We think it clear that either under paragraph 66 or 75, supra, full power and authority are conferred upon cities, towns and villages to regulate the construction and use of bill-boards within their corporate limits, provided the regulation is not unreasonable. Moreover, paragraph 78 of section 1, article 5, confers upon cities and villages [348] the right 'to do all acts, make all regulations which may be necessary or expedient for the promotion of health or the suppression of disease.' No argument need be advanced that the structures described in the bill before us may become a menace to the safety of the public, and hence the subject of control and regulation. They may be erected in such a manner as to be dangerous to the public by falling or being blown down, or constructed of such materials and dimensions as to be dangerous, or placed upon buildings or other structures in such a manner as to endanger the life and limb of the citizen, or erected within the fire limits in such proximity to buildings as to increase the danger of loss by fire, or so as to obstruct the view of railroad crossings and thus endanger life by accident, or have printed or displayed upon them obscene characters tending to demoralize and injure the public morals. If boards are erected in violation of any of these public rights or interests, and of others which might be mentioned, there is ample power within the statute to regulate them, provided such regulations are reasonably necessary for the protection of the public health, morals or safety. Nor will the mere fact that such structures are placed upon private property, and not on the public streets, protect those owning or using them against such reasonable regulations."

While the particular ordinance that was involved in the Gunning System case was held invalid, the decision did not rest on the want of power in the municipality to pass reasonable ordinances upon that subject. To remove any doubt as to the existence of the power, the legislature in 1912 passed an act providing "that the city council in cities and the president and board of trustees in villages and incorporated towns shall have the power to license street advertising by means of bill-boards, sign-boards and signs, and to regulate the character and control the location of such bill-boards, sign-boards and signs upon vacant property and upon buildings." (Hurd's Stat. 1913, chap. 24, par. 696.) [349] Whether this statute enlarges the powers which existed, as declared by this court in the Gunning System case, or not, it is not necessary to inquire. It is at least a clear legislative declaration which unmistakably manifests an intention that the subject of bill-boards and bill-board advertising shall be subject to municipal regulation.

The existence of the power to legislate upon the subject of bill-boards being established, the next inquiry is whether the ordinance in question is a reasonable exercise of such power. Upon the question of the reasonableness of the ordinance such evidence was introduced by the appellants showing the detrimental results that have followed the erection and maintenance of bill-boards in the residence districts. It was shown by the testimony that fires had been started from the accumulation of combustible material that had lodged against the base of bill-boards. As bearing upon this question and as affording a justification for requiring frontage consents in residence districts, evidence was offered to show that the residence territory of the city is not so well protected with fire extinguishing apparatus as is the business district. This evidence was objected to and the court sustained the objection. In this the court erred. When the reasonableness of an ordinance is under investigation as a question of fact, any pertinent matter which may reasonably be supposed to have influenced the enactment of the ordinance would seem to be proper evidence. If, as a matter of fact, the erection of bill-boards would increase the hazards of fire in residence districts, that fact, together with any other attending circumstance which would show that fires in residential districts would be more disastrous to life and property and that their extinguishment would be attended with greater difficulties than in other districts, would have a direct bearing upon the reasonableness of the requirement for frontage consent. Welch v. Swasey, 214 U. S. 91, 29 S. Ct. 567, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 923.

[350] Appellants also offered to show that bill-boards offered a protection to disorderly and law-breaking persons and the residence districts are not afforded as full police protection as other districts in the city of Chicago, and the court refused to hear this evidence, and in this the court also erred. It did, however, appear from the testimony that women and children are on the streets, unaccompanied, in larger numbers and more frequently in residence districts than in other places, and that the crimes against women and children the most frequent are indecent exposure and offenses against the person. It is shown by the testimony that the two elements contributing to crime in cities are, in the order of their importance, first, absence of police; and second, darkness. It was shown by appellee that in some instances lights were maintained upon the front surface of its bill-boards, but in answer to this it was shown that the space behind the boards remained dark, and that the rear was even darker than it would have been if there were no lights at all. It was shown that nuisances were permitted to exist in the rear of surface bill-boards, and physicians testified that deposits found behind bill-boards breed disease germs, which may be carried and scattered in the dust by the wind and by flies and other insects. It was shown that dissolute and immoral practices were carried on under the cover and shield furnished by these bill-boards. The answer made to all this is, that any other structure or building which would afford a like screen from view would produce similar results, and herein is found the basis for the contention that the ordinance is discriminatory; but we are of the opinion that the surface bill-board is unlike, in several particulars, structures that are erected for other purposes, such as fences, barns and other out-buildings that may be used in connection with a residence. This argument was made in the case of St. Louis Gunning Advertising Co. v. St. Louis, 235 Mo. 99, 137 S. W. 929, and we quote the answer of that court to this argument, as follows: "While that is [351] possible yet it is not probable. Nor does the erection and maintenance of a building or a fence along the lines of private property bordering upon public streets have the natural tendency to create any such nuisance as those mentioned. Buildings and fences are erected for the purpose of enclosing grounds and excluding therefrom strangers and trespassers, and common experience teaches us that they are effectual for that purpose, which is inconsistent with the idea that they promote and harbor nuisances, as bill-boards do, which rarely, if ever, enclose the grounds upon which they stand. That is not the purpose of their erection. Generally they are built along only one end or side of a lot or plot of ground, but occasionally upon two sides, and in rare instances upon three, but I have never seen or heard of a lot being enclosed upon all four sides by bill-boards. The end of the lot fronting upon an alley is almost invariably left open, for the simple reason that the alley is not conspicuous in the public eye, and for that reason it would be useless to display advertisements at such places where they could not be seen."

Under the state of facts shown by the evidence here, we cannot agree with the court below that the ordinance in question is void for unreasonableness. Before the court will be justified in declaring the ordinance invalid the unreasonableness should be made to clearly appear. It should be manifest that the discretion reposed in municipal authorities has been abused in the exercise of the power conferred. (Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Carlinville, 200 Ill. 314, 93 Am. St. Rep. 190, 60 L.R.A. 391, and cases there cited.) The case of Chicago v. Gunning System, supra, is clearly distinguishable from the case at bar. The ordinance there held unreasonable and void was general in its terms and prescribed restrictive conditions in regard to the erection and maintenance of bill-boards, and made no exception whether the bill-boards were in a thickly settled part of the city or in an open block or field. Mr. Justice Wilkin said [352] on this point in the Gunning System case: "It must be apparent to all reasonable minds that provisions which are necessary in one of such cases would be wholly unnecessary and unreasonable in others, and that a provision might be a reasonable police regulation in the one case and in one locality which would be wholly unreasonable under other circumstances in another locality. This ordinance is, however, without qualification or limitation applicable to signs and bill-boards alike in all portions of the great city of Chicago, applicable alike to every portion of its extended territory. We do not hold that this ordinance is so unreasonable as to be void if it were limited to particular districts of the city." In Haller Sign Works v. Physical Culture Training School, 249 Ill. 436, 94 N. E. 920, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 998, we held a statute which prohibited the erection of any character of signs for advertising purposes within five hundred feet of any public park or boulevard, illegal and void, for the reason that it did not tend to promote the safety, health, comfort or general welfare of the public but was manifestly passed solely from aesthetic considerations. The ordinance here under consideration is not open to the objections that were apparent upon the fact of the statute in the Haller Sign Works case, and the evidence in the record clearly distinguishes this case from the Gunning System case.

The ordinance is not unreasonable or oppressive because it requires the consent of a majority of the owners of property, within certain limits, on both sides of the street where such bill-boards are to be erected. In respect to occupations or structures the location and maintenance of which are subject to regulation under the police power of the municipality, a requirement of frontage consents of property owners, within reasonable limits, is a proper mode of exercising the power of regulation vested in the municipality. Ordinances of this general character have been upheld in regard to livery stables in Chicago v. Stratton, 182 Ill. 494, 44 N. E. 853, 53 Am. St. Rep. 325, 35 L.R.A. 84; in regard to dram-shops in Swift v. People, 162 [353] Ill. 534, 44 N. E. 528, 33 L.R.A. 470, and in respect to garages in the late case of People v. Ericsson, 263 Ill. 368, Ann. Cas. 1915C 183, 105 N. E. 315, L.R.A.1915D 607.

It follows from the views herein expressed that the court erred in entering a final decree perpetually enjoining the enforcement of section 707 of the municipal code of Chicago.

The decree of the superior court is reversed and the cause remanded to that court, with directions to dismiss the bill for want of equity.

Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Municipal Regulation of Billboards and Signs.

Introductory, 491.

Moral Welfare and Public Safety, 491.

Aesthetic Considerations, 493.

Introductory.

This note reviews the recent cases discussing the municipal regulation of billboards and signs. The earlier cases on this subject are collated in the notes to Chicago v. Gunning System, 2 Ann. Cas. 892; State v. Whitlock, 16 Ann. Cas. 765; Ex p. Savage, Ann. Cas. 1913D 951; and Varney v. Williams, 132 Am. St. Rep. 88.

For a discussion of the subject of false, fraudulent, immoral, or other objectionable advertising, see the note to People v. Kennedy, Ann. Cas. 1916A 895.

Moral Welfare and Public Safety.

The recent cases support the rule that a municipality may by virtue of its police power enact and enforce reasonable regulations with reference to billboards and signs, in order to preserve the health, safety, and good morals of its inhabitants. Haskell v. Howard, 269 Ill. 550, 109 N. E. 992; Southern Leasing Co. v. Ludwig, 168 App. Div. 233, 153 N. Y. S. 545, reversed on other grounds 217 N. Y. 100, 111 N. E. 470; People v. Ludwig, 158 N. Y. S. 208; Horton v. Old Colony Bill Posting Co. 36 R. I. 507, Ann. Cas. 1916A 911, 90 Atl. 822; Cream City Bill Posting Co. v. Milwaukee, 158 Wis. 86, 147 N. W. 25. And see the reported case. Thus, under a delegation of the police power by a general welfare clause it has been held that a city council can place billboards in a class by themselves and legislate in reference thereto. Cream City Bill Posting Co. v. Milwaukee, supra. And in People v. Ludwig, 158 N. Y. S. 208, an ordinance regulating roof signs was held to be valid, even though its effect was to revoke a permit previously issued.

In considering an ordinance regulating billboards, the court, in Cream City Bill Posting Co. v. Milwaukee, 158 Wis. 86, 147 N. W. 25, said: "The only question before the court is whether the council went too far in prescribing the means by which these objects should be accomplished. It must be admitted that in some respects the ordinance approaches closely to the point of unreasonableness. Between the point where an ordinance is obviously reasonable and the one where it is obviously unreasonable there is a wide range, a broad field for the exercise of legislative discretion. The action of the municipal authorities within that range is conclusive. Reasonable minds may well differ concerning the extent of it, and, this being so, legislative action should not be declared to be without justification unless it is clear beyond reasonable controversy that it is so. . . . In order to support legislation of this kind, a public need therefore must exist, and the act must at least have a tendency to support such need. In discovering the need and the purpose, the legislative branch of the government may exercise its discretion within the realm of reason, and if a public purpose can reasonably be conceived which might rationally justify the act, the court cannot further weigh the adequacy of the need or the wisdom of the method. . . . Considerable evidence was offered in this case tending to show that the public welfare would or might be conserved by the various provisions of the ordinance which were made the subject of attack. In reference to the provision requiring a clear space of three feet between these boards and any adjacent structure, it was said that it was a proper regulation, because otherwise the boards might be an obstruction to the fire department in the event of a fire in a nearby building and also to the police department in the pursuit of criminals. The trial court met this claim by saying that the requirement that there should be a space of not less than two feet between the bottom of the board and the ground was sufficient for the needs of the fire and police departments. It may well be, however, that those needs would be much better subserved by having both provisions instead of only one. The reasonableness of the regulation, requiring a clear space at the ends of roof and coping signs for the convenience of the fire department is more apparent, because the ordinance does not require any space to be left between the bottom of the boards and the roof or coping on which they rest. So it is apparent that these signs might prove to be a serious obstruction. Roofs, particularly where they are not flat, are at best often difficult places from which to fight fire. The regulation in regard to the distance which these boards must be placed from a sidewalk is justified on the ground that it will tend to prevent pedestrians from being injured in case any boards should fall down, and also on the ground that when they are placed near to the sidewalk they afford a convenient hiding place for thieves and thugs who contemplate robbing or assaulting passers by, and on the additional ground that, when placed a reasonable distance from the lot line, those committing crimes or nuisances behind the boards can be more readily discovered." Furthermore, the ordinance that was upheld in that case was retroactive.

An instance of regulation that has recently been held to be unreasonable is found in Haskell v. Howard, 269 Ill. 550, 109 N. E. 992, wherein the court said: "The ordinance purports to prohibit the posting or displaying of any advertisement of intoxicating liquor.

. . . The argument of appellees that the power to pass such an ordinance exists or is implied as incidental to the power to regulate or prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors, or that it arises out of the statute which forbids taking orders for the sale and delivery of intoxicating liquors in anti-saloon territory, is untenable. The ordinance is not limited to advertisements for the sale of liquor in Villa Grove nor to advertisements for taking orders for the sale and delivery of intoxicating liquors in that city. The prohibition of such advertisements is unnecessary to and has no reasonable connection with the power to prohibit the sale of liquor in said city. If the power to prohibit such advertisements is to be implied, it must be because their display affects the public health, safety, morals or welfare. By no stretch of the imagination could it be made to appear that such advertisements threaten or injuriously affect the public health or safety. If the ordinance can be sustained at all it must be because they injuriously affect the morals or welfare of the public. It is a matter of common observation that a great many manufacturers extensively advertise their products by display signs in cities and along the lines of railroads and public highways. So far as we are aware it has never been held that the advertisement of its beer by a brewery was so injurious to the public morals as to make it a nuisance per se and authorize it being prohibited. The use of intoxicating liquors is objectionable to a great many people; but so, also, is the use of tobacco, coca cola and chewing gum, but they are the products of lawful manufacture, and so long as that is so we do not see how their advertisement can be prohibited. It would seem inconsistent to say that a product may be lawfully manufactured for the consumption of all who desire it but the advertisement of it may be prohibited as an offense against public morals. The exercise of the police power is limited to enactments tending to promote the public health, safety, morals or general welfare. It is for the legislature to determine when an exigency exists for the exercise of the police power, but what is the subject of such exercise is a judicial question. Under the guise of police regulation the personal rights or liberties of citizens cannot be arbitrarily invaded."

Aesthetic Considerations.

The rule established by the earlier decisions, that aesthetic or artistic considerations alone will not justify a radical restriction by the police power on the rights of a property owner, is referred to in the reported case. But the objection that an ordinance is passed for aesthetic considerations cannot be raised where the city council has the power to pass the ordinance regardless of motive. New Orleans v. Kaufman (La.) 70 So. 874. In that case it appeared that the defendant was charged with violating an ordinance prohibiting "the erection of signs, sheds, or other obstructions, on or over any part of" certain streets. The defendant demurred to the charge on the ground of the unconstitutionality of the ordinance in that it "was not adopted to safeguard public health, safety, morals, comfort, or for the general welfare, but that it embraces aesthetic considerations only." With respect to the demurrer the court said: "The public right to the use of streets goes to the full width of the street and extends indefinitely upward and downward. . . . It follows that the defendant had no legal right whatever to construct his shed above and over the sidewalk next to his property line, and that it was within the discretion of the commission council to prohibit and to penalize the erection of such an obstruction. Having the power to enact the ordinance, the motives of the council in so doing cannot be inquired into." Obviously, however, the power of the council in that case was on a basis different from that of the general regulation of billboards and signs.

v.

MAY ET AL.

Minnesota Supreme Court—October 2, 1914.

127 Minn. 93; 148 N. W. 893.

Forcible Entry and Detainer — Possession under Claim of Right — Peaceful Entry.

Proceedings under the forcible entry and detainer statute to recover the possession of land alleged to be unlawfully and forcibly detained, cannot be maintained against a person who peaceably and under claim of right entered into possession of the property, and does not forcibly detain the same. Davis v. Woodward, 19 Minn. 137 (174), followed and applied.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The unlawful detention, unaccompanied with force, where the original possession was taken peaceably and under claim of right, is not sufficient to authorize proceedings under section 7657, G. S. 1913. Ejectment is the remedy in such cases.

[See note at end of this case.]

(Syllabus by court.)

Appeal from District Court, Dakota county: Hodson, Judge.

Action of forcible entry and detainer. C. D. Mastin, plaintiff, and A. W. May et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

S. R. Child and Albert Schaller for appellant.

Charles R. Pye and C. S. Lowell for respondents.

[94] BROWN, C. J.—The short facts in this case are as follows: Plaintiff as the owner of certain real property entered into negotiations to sell the same to defendants. Pending the negotiations defendants went into possession of the premises, whether with the knowledge and consent of plaintiff does not appear but, as found by the trial court, peaceably and under claim of right under the oral arrangements of the parties as to the sale. They so entered into possession on October 16, 1912, and have since retained the same. The negotiations for the sale were not completed and were abandoned, and on November 1, 1912, some two weeks after defendants entered into possession of the property, plaintiff demanded that they vacate the same, which defendants refused to do, claiming to have certain rights under the attempted sale, by way of compensation for improvements made upon the premises during the time of their possession. Thereafter, in December, 1912, plaintiff brought this proceeding under the forcible entry and detainer statute to regain possession. There was a judgment for plaintiff before the justice and defendants appealed to the district court. The cause was tried in that court without a jury and the court made findings of fact, substantially as above stated, and, further, "that the entry upon said lands by the defendants was made in a peaceable manner; that the detention of said premises after the first day of November, 1912, by the defendants was unlawful but not forcible or held with strong hands." As conclusion of law the court found that plaintiff was not entitled to maintain the proceeding and that it should be dismissed. Judgment of dismissal was subsequently entered, and plaintiff appealed.

The only question presented is whether the facts stated present a [95] case for proceedings under the forcible entry and detainer statute, or whether plaintiff's remedy was in ejectment.

Our statutes, like those of many of the other states, limit the right to resort to forcible entry proceedings to recover the possession of land, other than the instances specially provided for by section 7658, G. S. 1913, (1) to cases where there has been an unlawful or forcible entry thereon, and (2) where there has been a peaceable entry, and a subsequent unlawful and forcible detention of the premises. If the possession be taken unlawfully or forcibly, the proceeding will lie without regard to the question whether the subsequent possession is maintained by force or violence. If the entry into possession be under claim of right or peaceably, then the proceeding cannot be maintained, unless the possession thus taken be "unlawfully and forcibly" detained. The unlawful detention is not, standing alone, sufficient, where the proceeding is founded upon section 7657, G. S. 1913. Davis v. Woodward, 19 Minn. 174. The statute, with some modifications, is but declaratory of the common law upon the subject, and was designed to provide a speedy remedy to recover the possession of land unlawfully taken or forcibly and unlawfully detained from the person entitled thereto. It was not intended as a substitute for ejectment (O'Neill v. Jones, 72 Minn. 446, 75 N. W. 701), and is only applicable to the cases specially provided for by the statute. In the case at bar the record does not present facts showing either an unlawful or forcible entry of the land in question, the findings negative either theory, and plaintiff cannot recover upon that ground. The case presented is one showing a peaceable entry, pending negotiations for the purchase of the land, and a wrongful or unlawful withholding possession after abandonment of the negotiations, unaccompanied by force or violence. There is no showing of a forcible detention of the land, and therefore plaintiff cannot prevail on that theory of the statute. This was expressly so held in the case of Davis v. Woodward, 19 Minn. 174, supra. The ruling there made is in harmony with the authorities generally. Fults v. Munro, 202 N. Y. 34, 95 N. E. 23, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 600, Ann. Cas. 1912D 871, and note 875; 19 Cyc. 1135. The proceeding cannot be resorted to for the purpose of removing a mere trespasser, who [96] entered into possession peaceably under claim of right and asserts no right of possession by force or violence. Castro v. Tewksbury, 69 Cal.

562, 11 Pac. 339; Wood v. Phillips, 43 N. Y. 152; Smith v. Reeder, 21 Ore. 541, 28 Pac. 890, 15 L.R.A. 172; Foster v. Kelsey, 36 Vt. 199, 84 Am. Dec. 676. The findings of the court to the effect that the entry of defendants was peaceable and under claim of right and not retained by force or a strong hand, dispose of the case and render the forcible entry statute inapplicable. The remedy of plaintiffs was in ejectment.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that an action for forcible entry and detainer will not lie against a person who enters on land peaceably and holds it without violence and under a claim of right. The earlier cases, recognizing this rule and adding by way of qualification that a holding of possession by threat of violence will warrant an action of forcible detainer despite a peaceable entry and a claim of right, are collated in the note to Fults v. Munro, Ann. Cas. 1912D 870.

MATTER OF FARLEY.

New York Court of Appeals—November 10, 1914.

213 N. Y. 15; 106 N. E. 756.

Infants — Contracts.

Attempted contracts by an infant are incomplete and imperfect, and do not become binding except by the act, or failure to act, of the infant after he reaches majority.

Consent to Issuance of Liquor License.

Under Liquor Tax Law (Consol. by Appellate Division of Supreme Court. Petitioner appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Louis M. King and A. M. Sperry for appellant.

Walter Welch for respondent.

[16] HISCOCK, J.—Application was made to the deputy commissioner of excise of the county of Onondaga for the transfer to respondent and to new premises of a liquor tax certificate theretofore issued to another person. The transfer was made by the commissioner and later this proceeding was instituted to have such certificate canceled, on the ground that respondent's application for the issue of the certificate to her falsely stated that she had secured the requisite number of consents to the prosecution of said business in the new location.

The Liquor Tax Law (Consol. Laws, ch. 34, section 15, subd. 8, as amended, L. 1911, ch. 643, section 2) provides that "When the nearest entrance to the premises described in said statement as those in which traffic in liquors is to be carried on is within three hundred feet, measured in a straight line, of the nearest entrance to a building or buildings occupied exclusively for a dwelling, there shall also be filed simultaneously with said statement (on the application for a certificate) a consent in writing that such traffic in liquors be so carried on in said premises during a term therein stated, executed by the owner or owners, or by a duly authorized agent or agents of such owner or owners of at least two-thirds of [17] the total number of such buildings within three hundred feet so occupied as dwellings."

The question whether respondent's statement that she had secured the requisite number of consents of owners of buildings occupied as dwellings within the prescribed limit is true, depends on the further query whether infant owners of such dwellings may give a legal consent. There were one or more dwellings within three hundred feet of the premises where respondent proposed to conduct her liquor business of which infants were owners and consents in the form required by law were obtained from them and filed. If they are valid the respondent had a sufficient number of consents; without them she did not have, and is not entitled to have her certificate and carry on her business.

We do not think that infant owners of property may give a valid consent to the issue of a liquor tax certificate.

At the outset we find in the Liquor Tax Law various provisions which indicate a policy on the part of the state to prevent any relationship between infants and the sale of liquor, which we think are entitled to some consideration in interpreting the particular provision relating to consents.

Section 29 provides in substance that it shall be unlawful to sell, deliver or give away liquor to any minor under the age of eighteen years or to such minor for any other person.

Section 30 provides that it shall not be lawful to permit any minor under such age to sell or serve any liquors or to enter or remain in any barroom where liquors are sold.

Section 21 of said law provides that no person under the age of twenty-one years shall traffic in liquor.

As we read these provisions it would seem to be a fair inference that a legislative policy which prohibited an infant from using, serving or trafficking in liquors did not contemplate that he should be authorized to give a consent [18] that some other person might carry on the business. And in entertaining this view sight is not lost of the argument made by the learned Appellate Division that because the legislature expressly prohibited certain acts such as those mentioned, it may be assumed that it did not intend to prohibit certain other acts which were not mentioned such as the right of an infant to give a consent to traffic in liquors by another person. That argument, however, does not in this case seem to be very persuasive. The legislature might very well prohibit the specific acts which have been mentioned and which without express provision were not unlawful, and rely on general principles for the proper decision of the question whether an infant might perform some other act, such as executing one of the consents required by the statute, and we, therefore, pass to the consideration on such general principles of the question whether an infant ought to be allowed to give such a consent.

The rule is well understood that attempted contracts by an infant are incomplete and imperfect, and do not become valid and binding except by the act or failure to act of the infant after he reaches the age of maturity. He is regarded as not having sufficient capacity to understand and pass upon questions involving contractual rights, and, therefore, a person dealing with him does so at his peril, and subject to the right of the infant to avoid his contract when he becomes of age.

It seems to us that an attempted consent by an infant to the issue of a liquor tax certificate and the prosecution of that business involves considerations which are in the nature of a property right, and is subject to the infirmities of infancy which would attach to an ordinary contract executed by a minor. It appears to have been assumed by the legislature that neighboring property used for dwellings might be affected by opening a saloon, as we very well know might be the case, and, hence, the requirement for consents thereto which are to be given, [19] not by persons dwelling within a certain radius, but by the persons who own property within that radius. If considerations of property rights are involved in giving such a consent it would seem that the act of an infant should be safeguarded in the same way as would be an attempt on his part to sell, lease or mortgage his real estate.

But reverting to the principles governing an ordinary contract by an infant, it is urged that since his contracts are not void but voidable at his election, the same rule should be applied to a consent to the issue of a liquor tax certificate, and that such consent should be held valid until the infant, under proper conditions, disaffirms said act.

There are two answers to this proposition. In the first place, the principle which allows the executed contract of an infant to stand as valid unless the infant shall disaffirm the same after becoming of age is not practically adapted to such an instrument as a consent to the issue of a liquor tax certificate. In many cases at least the office of the certificate would have been completed and any injury flowing from the issue thereof consummated long before the infant would arrive at those years of maturity where the law would regard him as reaching for the first time sound discretion in such a matter.

But the more important objection to this theory rests on the distinction between an act of an infant which only affects himself and his property and an act like that involved in the present proceeding which is also of public consequence. If an infant makes a lease or sale of his real estate it legally touches no one but himself, and if when he becomes of age he chooses to affirm the contract no one should object. But that is not the present case. The People of the state acting within well-defined and established powers have deemed it wise to regulate the traffic in liquor. The Liquor Tax Law with its many provisions is sufficient evidence of the extent to which the legislature has attempted to do this. Amongst other [20] things it has been deemed wise and very just that the prosecution of this traffic should not be permitted in certain localities occupied by dwelling houses unless a large proportion of the owners of such property are in favor of such traffic. As has already been said, a property owner in consenting to the prosecution of this business performs an act which might be regarded as affecting the value of his own property and in that aspect no one has any interest in the question except himself. But in addition to this, each owner of property within the prescribed limit has an interest in the execution of such a consent by every other property owner. His effective opposition or consent to the prosecution of the business depends on the action of other property owners and he is interested in having such other property owners pass on the question intelligently and wisely. It is a matter of importance to every property owner in the neighborhood and to the people of the community that consents should not be given by persons whom the law regards as deficient in judgment and capacity to act. Every property owner is entitled to have every other property owner within the prescribed radius pass intelligently on the question whether it is best to have a saloon within the proposed area, and of course such intelligent action cannot be secured either presumptively or actually if infants may give such consents. In the present case the infants at the time in question were of the ages respectively of fourteen and ten years. Nobody would claim that they could pass with mature judgment on the question whether a saloon should be located at the proposed spot. Moreover if these particular infants can execute valid consents there is no reason why still younger children might not perform similar acts until the process of securing consents from property owners where there happened to be infant owners would be made absurd and ridiculous and any benefits anticipated from these provisions in securing a limited form of local option be lost.

[21] While this question of the power of an infant to execute such a consent has not been heretofore decided by this court, authorities found in other states and entitled to great respect adopt the conclusion which we now reach that such power is lacking (Thompson v. Egan, 70 Neb. 169, 97 N. W. 247; People v. Griesbach, 211 Ill. 35, 71 N. E. 874.)

The consent in question was not only signed by the infants personally but also by "Martin J. McArdle, agent for" said infants, and it is further urged by the respondent that this later signature rendered the consent effective under that provision of the statute which authorizes a consent to be executed not only by the owner of premises but also "by his duly authorized agent."

We do not intend to hold that a consent to the issue of a certificate may not be executed on behalf of an infant by a guardian or by some other person authorized in some unusual manner to execute such consent. We simply do not pass on that question as we do not regard it as here presented. It certainly is clear that an infant who cannot himself execute a consent cannot by himself and in any ordinary manner create an agent who will have greater powers than he himself possesses. The evidence makes it fairly apparent that whatever agency for the infants

McArdle enjoyed sprang from the fact that he collected rents and managed the property. If there was any other agency or power of representation I think that evidence thereof should have been produced by the respondent, and such agency did not clothe the alleged agent with greater powers in respect of this consent than the infants themselves possessed.

The order of the Appellate Division should be reversed and that of the Special Term affirmed, with costs in both courts.

NOTE.

Power of Infant to Consent to Issuance of Liquor License.

The general rule is that an infant owner of property cannot give a valid consent to the issuance of a liquor license. Wray v. Harrison, 116 Ga. 93, 42 S. E. 351; People v. Griesbach, 211 Ill. 35, 71 N. E. 874; Thompson v. Egan, 70 Neb. 169, 97 N. W. 247. And see the reported case. In Thompson v. Egan, supra, the court said: "It is further contended, in the brief, that certain minor children who were heirs to estates in the precinct should have been counted among the legal resident freeholders of the precinct who had not signed the petition. We think that there is little merit in this contention. The statute never contemplated infant children, although residents and heirs to estate of inheritance in the precinct, as proper persons to sign a petition for a license to sell intoxicating liquors. This right was intended to be reserved for the full grown resident freeholders of the precinct." In People v. Griesbach, supra, it was said: "We do not think a minor can be regarded as a qualified petitioner on the application of the appellee for the license to keep a dram shop. . . . The persons authorized by the ordinances of the village of Hyde Park to sign the application of appellee for a license to keep a dramshop in that matter stand for and represent the public, whose interests, rights and welfare, moral and material, are concerned in the granting or refusal of the application. They occupy a position of trust toward the public, and the proper discharge of their duty to the public demands the consideration of the interests of all who are to be affected and the exercise of matured judgment and discretion. A person wanting in mental power to meet the requirements of the duty to the public could not be regarded as a competent applicant. A person who is so affected with insanity as to be irresponsible for his action in the ordinary affairs of life would not be competent to sign an application, although he be the owner of property abutting on the streets in the block whereon the dramshop was to be located. The said Charles Nottbohm, at the time he signed the application, had not reached the age which, in law, is deemed essential to the maturity of the mental faculties. The law did not regard him as possessed of the requisite maturity of mind and soundness of judgment to act in his individual capacity with reference to public and private affairs. He was regarded by our law-makers as particularly incompetent to comprehend the evils likely to result from the use to himself of intoxicating liquors. The statutes adopted by the General Assembly hold him not competent to determine for himself whether and when he shall indulge in intoxicating liquors, and require that persons licensed to sell such liquors at retail shall not sell or give the same to him unless his parents, guardian or family physician shall first determine that he should be permitted to receive it. . . . Being incompetent, by the express provisions of the law, to decide whether he may drink intoxicating liquors or not, because of the immaturity of his mind and judgment, it must be held he is in a far greater degree incompetent to decide for himself, and as a representative of the public, whether or not a dramshop should be permitted to be established and operated by the appellee. He has the qualification of a property owner, but is under the disqualification of nonage and consequent immaturity of his mental powers, in legal contemplation." In Wray v. Harrison, 116 Ga. 93, 42 S. E. 351, it appeared that under the charter of a town the mayor and council were authorized to issue licenses for the sale of spirituous and malt liquors at retail, but no license could be issued unless the applicant for the same presented with his application "a petition signed by two-thirds of the citizens of said town, asking for such license." It was held that the term "citizens" embraced only the qualified voters of the town, and did not include infants. In the reported case it is held that an infant cannot by himself and in any ordinary manner create an agent who may give a valid consent to the issuance of a liquor license.

Whether an infant may give a valid consent through a guardian or through some other person authorized in some unusual manner is an undecided question. See the reported case. But where a guardian for an infant, who was also a doweress in the property owned by the infant, signed an application for a liquor license, without a showing that she signed as guardian for the infant, it was held that her signature would be regarded as placed on the application in her individual capacity, and not as guardian for the infant owner of the property affected. People v. Griesbach, 211 Ill. 35, 71 N. E. 874.

However, in State v. Howard County Ct. 90 Mo. 593, 2 S. W. 788, it appeared that a statute provided that it should not be lawful to issue a license to keep a dramshop in certain towns and cities, until a majority of the taxpaying citizens in the block or square in which the dramshop was to be kept should sign a petition asking for the license. It was held that minor residents, who had guardians and owned property, and were regularly assessed, were to be counted in determining whether a petition presented for a dramshop was signed by a majority of the assessed taxpaying citizens. The court said: "If the design of the legislature in requiring a petition, signed by a majority of the assessed taxpaying citizens, to be presented as a condition precedent to the exercise by the county court of the power to grant a license to keep a dramshop in a block of a city containing twenty-five hundred or more inhabitants, was to afford protection to that extent to the property in the block, no reason is perceived why the word citizen should be restricted in its meaning only to those who are voters, inasmuch as the property of women and minors would be affected as well as that of the citizen clothed with the privilege of voting. If the location of the dramshop in such a block would affect injuriously the property, as to rental value, or otherwise, belonging to a citizen voter, it would also affect in the same way that owned by women and minors, both of which classes would be denied the protection the statute was designed to afford, if we put the construction upon the word citizen the relator's counsel contend for. We think it cannot be reasonably urged that when one citizen entitled to vote owns but one lot in a block, and all the rest of the block is owned by women, either married or single, or minors to the number of twenty, and all of whom are assessed thereon, that a petition signed by the one citizen would be a majority, in the sense of the statute, of the assessed taxpaying citizens, and that the county court would be bound to act upon, and close their eyes on the assessment list, disclosing the fact that these twenty other assessed taxpaying citizens owned property in the block. And yet such would be the result under the construction contended for by the relator."

v.

ARTHUR ET AL.

Iowa Supreme Court—October 25, 1913.

163 Iowa 205; 143 N. W. 556.

Appeal — Entitling Papers — Effect of Error.

Code, § 4108, providing that on appeal the cause shall be docketed as in the court below, being remedial, is simply directory, and the fact that the abstract designated all parties except plaintiff as defendants or appellees, whereas some were defendants in cross-petitions and not in the main action, is not ground for dismissal, where the relation of the parties to the case was disclosed.

Time for Appeal — Competition.

The time allowed for appeal is computed from the entry of the decree, and, though service of the notice of appeal was not acknowledged until more than six months after the judge had filed an opinion, the appeal will not be dismissed where less than six months had elapsed after the entry of the decree.

[See 2 R. C. L. tit. Appeal and Error, p. 104.]

Foreclosure of Mortgages — Defenses — Payment.

Foreclosure of a mortgage cannot be defeated by the defense of payment of the note thereby secured, where such defense is not available against the note because it as well as the mortgage is held by an innocent purchaser for value.

Bills and Notes — Note Secured by Mortgage — Construction Together.

In construing a note, a mortgage executed at the same time and as a part of the same transaction is to be considered along with the note, but that does not mean that the provisions of the mortgage become part of the note.

[See generally 21 Ann. Cas. 1162.]

Negotiability — Uncertainty as to Amount.

Provisions of a mortgage given as security for a note executed at the same time and as a part of the same transaction, making the mortgage security for the payment of taxes and insurance by the mortgagor, but not containing any promise to pay the same, do not render the note nonnegotiable for uncertainty in the amount payable, as such provisions in no way affect the obligation of the note.

[See note at end of this case.]

Note Secured by Mortgage — Separate Actions on Note and Mortgage.

Under the express terms of Code, § 3429, an action may be brought on a note alone without regard to the mortgage given as security, and so an action may be brought on the mortgage alone, unless either is prevented by stipulation in the note or mortgage; but under the express terms of section 4288, when separate actions are brought on the note and mortgage in the same county, the plaintiff must elect between them, and the other will be discontinued.

Negotiability — Uncertainty as to Amount.

A provision in a mortgage that the mortgagor would pay the taxes on the mortgage on a certain contingency did not render the note secured nonnegotiable for uncertainty in the amount payable, since it did not entitle the mortgagee to recover such taxes as a part of the indebtedness, but only made the mortgage a lien therefor.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A stipulation in a note that the payee may recover any taxes on the premises mortgaged as security therefor which the payee shall pay renders it nonnegotiable for uncertainty as to the amount payable, since no one can tell what future tax levies will be.

[See note at end of this case.]

Uncertainty as to Date of Maturity.

Under the Negotiable Instruments Act (Code Supp. 1907, § 3060a1), providing that an instrument to be negotiable "must be payable on demand or at a fixed or determinable future time," a clause in the mortgage given as security that the mortgagee might declare the debt due for default of the mortgagor did not render the note nonnegotiable for uncertainty as to the time of payment.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A mortgage, giving the mortgagee the right to declare the debt due without regard to whether the mortgagor is in default, renders the note for which it is security nonnegotiable for uncertainty as to the time of payment.

[See note at end of this case.]

Corporations — Want of Notice — Proof Sufficient.

Where the president of a bank to which a note was given as security testified that the transaction was with him and he had no notice of any defense thereto, the evidence was sufficient to justify a finding of want of notice to the bank, though the other officers did not testify, and though the burden of proof was on the bank under Code Supp. 1907, §§ 3060a55, 3060a59, because the payee negotiated the note in bad faith.

Appeal from District Court, Madison county: FAHEY, Judge.

Action by Des Moines Savings Bank, plaintiff, against E. O. Arthur et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. REVERSED.

[206] On the 6th day of October, 1900, Thomas and Montana Duff executed to A. B. Shriver their promissory note for $1,800 payable on the 6th day of October, 1910, with interest at the rate of 5½ per cent. per annum payable annually, but, if any part of the principal or interest should not be paid when due, it would bear 8 per cent. per annum.

This note was secured by a mortgage executed by the payors on 101 acres of land. On February 10, 1906, the Duffs conveyed the land to Edwin Trester and the latter negotiated a loan with A. B. Shriver in order to take up that mentioned and pay to the Duffs $1,200 on the purchase price. A note for $3,000 was executed to Shriver by Trester and [207] wife payable five years after date and secured by a mortgage on the land. The $1,200 was received from Shriver and paid over to the Duffs, and Shriver explained that he owned the $1,800 note and mortgage, but that the note was in Des Moines, up as security, and that he would get it in a few days and cancel it. The $3,000 note and mortgage of Trester and wife were assigned to A. B. Anderson, September 22, 1906, and they subsequently conveyed the land to E. E. Gallup and wife, who later conveyed it to E. O. Arthur. The deed of the Duffs to Trester warranted title except as to the $1,800 mortgage. On June 11, 1901, Shriver assigned the mortgage securing the note for $1,800 to the Security Loan & Trust Company, and this assignment was recorded, and there was nothing of record indicating a reassignment thereof to Shriver or any one else. In the fall of 1909, Shriver negotiated a loan of $1,600 with the Des Moines Savings Bank and executed his note for that amount payable ninety days after date with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, and as collateral security for its payment hypothecated the note for $1,800 and assigned to said bank the mortgage securing the same. This action was begun by said bank January 6, 1911, praying for judgment on said note of $1,800 against Montana Duff and demanding foreclosure of said mortgage against the land and that it be established as a lien prior to the $3,000 mortgage held by Anderson. Arthur, the owner of the land, was made a party defendant, and he pleaded that the note of $1,800 and mortgage securing it were executed as one instrument, that the terms of the mortgage rendered the note nonnegotiable, that the note had been paid by the transactions mentioned, and that the plaintiff was not an innocent holder. He also filed a cross-petition praying judgment against Turrill, Elliott, Gallup, and Trester on the warranty deeds for whatever amount might be recovered against him on the $1,800 note and mortgage. Montana Duff filed answer alleging that Trester had assumed and agreed to pay [208] the note of $1,800 and pleaded the same defense as Arthur. A. B. Anderson prayed judgment on the note of $3,000 against the Tresters, Shriver, Elliott, Turrill, and Arthur, and that the mortgage securing said note be foreclosed. Trester answered the cross-petition of Arthur and joined in praying the relief demanded. Shriver filed a disclaimer. Some other matters were in issue not necessary to be mentioned. On hearing, the plaintiff's petition was dismissed and judgment entered on the cross-petition of A. B. Anderson as prayed and decree foreclosing the same. The plaintiff appeals.

John A. Guier for appellant.

Church & McCully, J. F. Gallup and W. S. Cooper for appellees.

LAND, J.—This is an action to recover judgment against Montana Duff, on a promissory note of $1,800 given October 6, 1900, and payable ten years thereafter, given by herself and husband to A. B. Shriver, and to foreclose a mortgage on one hundred and one acres of land executed by them to secure its payment. E. O. Arthur, who had acquired the land, was made defendant, as also was A. B. Anderson, who held a note of $3,000 given by Edwin Trester to Shriver February 10, 1906, payable five years after date and secured by a mortgage on the same land. Plaintiff prayed that the lien of this mortgage be decreed inferior to that sued on. Other parties were brought in as defendants to cross-petitions, and S. H. Arthur by amendment to the petition.

I. In printing the abstract, all parties other than plaintiff were designated appellees without indicating their relation to the case other than as defendants or appellees, and this is one of the grounds of the motion of dismissal. It will be noted that the parties defendant were correctly named, but others who were defendants in cross-petitions were included as [209] though parties to the main action. The statute exacts that the cause be docketed as in the court below (section 4108, Code), and this should have been done. But the section, being remedial, is directory, and, inasmuch as the identity of the action has been preserved and the relation of defendants to the case disclosed in the abstract, there could have been no prejudice and there should not be a dismissal on this ground.

The judge presiding filed an opinion with the clerk November 23, 1911, and service of notice of appeal was not acknowledged until August 7, 1912. As more than six months had intervened, dismissal on this ground is demanded. As time for the purposes of appeal is computed from the entry of decree which occurred February 24, 1912, instead of the announcement of the decision, service of the notice of appeal was in time. Martin v. Martin, 125 Ia. 73, 99 N. W. 719; Sievertsen v. Paxton-Eckman Chemical Co. 160 Ia. 662, 133 N. W. 744, 142 N. W. 424. The record does not bear out the suggestion that there was delay in the final entry because of the trials of issues raised on the petitions of intervention, and, as the record does not disclose that the same attorney represented plaintiff and Anderson, the issuance of execution on the decree of the latter cannot be construed as a waiver of the right of appeal, even were appellee's theory to be adopted. The motion to dismiss the appeal is overruled.

II. The note of $1,800 executed by Montana Duff and husband to A. B. Shriver October 6, 1910, and payable ten years thereafter, was deposited by him with the Des Moines Savings Bank in the fall of 1909 as collateral security of his note of $1,600 payable in 90 days and the mortgage executed by the Duffs to secure payment of their note duly assigned to said bank. It advanced the face of the note less $28, interest for the period until maturity, and the president of the bank, who negotiated the loan, testified that before making it he ascertained that the mortgage was a first lien on land constituting [210] ample security for its payment and that he was without knowledge that the note and mortgage had been paid.

The note and mortgage had been paid by the execution of a note of $3,000 to Shriver by Trester and wife, the former of whom having acquired the land, and a mortgage on the land securing the same. Though the $1,800 note and mortgage were not then in Shriver's possession, he procured the same subsequently; but, instead of canceling the one and releasing the other, he negotiated the loan with the bank as stated. As it acquired these for value and without notice, the defense of payment must fail unless the note is found not to be negotiable, for under the decisions of this state foreclosure of the mortgage may not be defeated by a defense not available against the note. Preston v. Case, 42 Ia. 549.

The theory of defendants is that the mortgage and note are to be construed together and treated as one instrument, and the following clause contained in the mortgage renders the note nonnegotiable:

Said first party shall pay all taxes and assessments upon said property to whomsoever laid, or assessed, and including personal taxes, and should any reduction be made in the assessment of taxes on said land by reason of this mortgage, and payment thereof required of the mortgagee or assigns, then said mortgagor shall pay the taxes on this mortgage and the debt hereby secured before delinquent; and said first party shall not suffer waste; shall keep all buildings thereon insured to the satisfaction of said second party in a sum not less than two hundred dollars, delivering all policies and renewal receipts to said second party, and shall pay, in case of suit, a reasonable attorney's fee and expenses of continuation of abstract, and all expenses and attorney's fees incurred by said second party or assigns by reason of litigation with third parties to protect the lien of this mortgage. A failure to comply with any one of the agreements hereof (including warranty of title) causes the whole debt to at once become due and collectible, if said second party or assigns so elect, and no [211] demand for fulfillment of broken conditions nor notice of election to consider the debt due, shall be necessary previous to commencement of suit to collect the debt hereby secured, or any part thereof, or to foreclose this mortgage. . . . All money paid by said second party or assigns for insurance or taxes shall bear interest at the rate of eight per cent. per annum, payable semiannually, and be a lien on said land under this mortgage.

It is settled, in this state at least, that the note and mortgage, having been executed at the same time and as a part of the same transaction, are to be construed together. Iowa Nat. Bank v. Carter, 144 Ia. 715, 123 N. W. 237; Swearingen v. Lahner, 93 Ia. 147, 61 N. W. 431, 57 Am. St. Rep. 261, 26 L.R.A. 765. And such appears to be the general rule. Brooke v. Struthers, 110 Mich. 562 (68 N. W. 272, 35 L.R.A. 536 and note); 1 Jones on Mtgs. section 71. This is but the application of the familiar doctrine concerning the construction of agreements contemporaneously executed.

But how far under this rule are the collateral agreements contained in the mortgage to be imparted into the note? On the margin of the note were these words: "This note is secured by first mortgage on one hundred and one acres in Madison Twp., Madison county, Iowa." This may have advised the transferee of the security, but did not purport to load the note with any of its particular provisions. The note was complete in itself and, as usual, was given as evidence of the debt and to fix the time and terms of payment. The purpose of the mortgage was to afford security for the payment of the note, and all the conditions in the part quoted, except one, relate to the protection and preservation of the security. These have no bearing on the engagements contained in the note. While the note and mortgage are to be construed together whenever the nature of the transaction becomes material, this does not mean that the provisions of the mortgage are thereby incorporated into and become part of the note. [212] As said in Thorp v. Mindeman, 123 Wis. 149, 101 N. W. 417, 68 L.R.A. 146, 107 Am. St. Rep. 1003.

Construing together simply means that if there be any provisions in one instrument limiting, explaining, or otherwise affecting the provisions of another, they will be given effect as between the parties themselves and all persons charged with notice, so that the intent of the parties may be carried out, and that the whole agreement actually made may be effectuated. . . . The promise to pay is one distinct agreement, and, if couched in proper terms, is negotiable. The pledge of real estate to secure that promise is another distinct agreement, which ordinarily is not intended to affect in the least the promise to pay, but only to give a remedy for failure to carry out the promise to pay. The holder of the note may discard the mortgage entirely and sue and recover on his note; and the fact that a mortgage had been given with the note, containing all manner of agreements relating simply to the preservation of the security, would cut no figure. A pleading alleging such facts would be stricken out as frivolous or irrelevant.

In Garnett v. Meyers, 65 Neb. 280, 91 N. W. 400, 94 N. W. 803, Sedgwick, J., in speaking for the court concisely states the rule:

If the terms and conditions of the mortgage are limited to the proper province of the mortgage—that is, to provide security for the indebtedness—its provisions relating solely to the security will not affect the negotiability of the note. If the holder of the note is compelled to pay the taxes or insurance on the mortgaged property to protect the security, and is afterwards allowed to recover the amount so paid in addition to the principal indebtedness, this does not affect the amount of the indebtedness itself. The mortgagee has no interest in the mortgaged property except a collateral and contingent one. The liability for these expenses is upon the mortgagor. If he shirks this responsibility, and compels the mortgagee to assume it, equity allows the mortgagee to add the payment so made to his mortgage. This right has long been established as an essential element of the mortgage itself. It cannot be held [213] to destroy the negotiability of the note, unless the fact that the execution of the note is accompanied by the execution of a mortgage securing it is to have that effect. This principle applies to all agreements of the mortgagor to preserve the collateral security. It does not affect the rule that the two instruments, when executed at the same time, must be construed together. The provisions contained in the mortgage to protect the securities, which would be implied and enforced upon settled principles of equity, whether expressed in the mortgage or not, cannot be held to render the note nonnegotiable.

See also Kendall v. Selby, 66 Neb. 60, 92 N. W. 178, 103 Am. St. Rep. 697; Frost v. Fisher, 13 Colo. App. 322, 58 Pac. 872; Hunter v. Clarke, 184 Ill. 158, 56 N. E. 297, 75 Am. St. Rep. 160.

It will be observed that the mortgage contains no promise on the part of the mortgagor to repay mortgagee taxes or premiums for insurance which may have been advanced by him. These are to be a lien on the land and, of course, may be recovered upon foreclosure of the mortgage. The maker of the note does not thereby become liable for payment thereof save as he may be required to pay to redeem his land from the proceedings in foreclosure of the mortgage. The obligation of his note was in no manner enhanced or otherwise affected either as to time or amount of payment. As observed in Hunter v. Clarke, supra, "the provisions of the mortgage for the allowance of costs, taxes, assessments, insurance, and attorney's fees apply only in case of foreclosure and do not add to the amount of the note."

A separate action could have been maintained on the note (section 3428, Code) or on the mortgage, unless this is prevented by some stipulation in one or the other, as that execution shall not issue against property other than that mortgaged (Kennion v. Kelsey, 10 Ia. 443); but actions on each cannot be prosecuted in the same county at the same time, for, if undertaken, the plaintiff will be required to elect which he will [214] maintain (section 4288, Code). And as the maker of the note did not agree to pay the items of taxes, insurance, and the like in his note, the amount payable thereon has not been rendered uncertain by the terms of the mortgage.

As intimated, one clause in the mortgage was not inserted to protect the security but to place a burden on the mortgagor: "Should any reduction be made in the assessment of taxes on said land by reason of this mortgage and payment thereof required of the mortgagee or assigns, then said mortgagor shall pay the taxes on this mortgage and the debt thereby secured before delinquent." This merely exacted payment by the mortgagor of taxes assessed on the credits owing the mortgagee which, but for this, the latter must have paid. But as pointed out, if not paid by the mortgagor and discharged by the mortgagee, there is no condition entitling him to recover the same as a part of the indebtedness evidenced by the note or otherwise save by enforcing the lien specifically stipulated against the land mortgaged.

In this respect, the mortgage differs from that considered in Garnett v. Meyers, 65 Neb. 287, 91 N. W. 400, 94 N. W. 803; Consterdine v. Moore, 65 Neb. 291, 91 N. W. 399, 96 N. W. 1021, 101 Am. St. Rep. 620, where it was provided that "the said party of the second part, or the legal holder or holders of said note, . . . may elect to pay such taxes, assessments, . . . and the amount so paid shall be secured by the mortgage and may be collected in the same manner as the principal debt hereby secured, with interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum." In holding that this provision rendered the note nonnegotiable, the court seems to have held that, under this clause, taxes so paid by the mortgagee might be recovered in an action on the note, and therefore the amount payable was uncertain. No one can anticipate precisely what the tax levies of the future will be, and for this reason such a stipulation when contained in a note, renders it nonnegotiable. Farquar [215] v. Fidelity Ins. etc. Co. 13 Phila. 473, 35 Leg. Int. 404, 8 Fed. Cas. No. 4,676; Howell v. Todd, 12 Fed. Cas. No. 6,783; Walker v. Thompson, 108 Mich. 686, 66 N. W. 584; Carmody v. Crane, 110 Mich. 508, 68 N. W. 268. See also Brooke v. Struthers, 110 Mich. 562, 68 N. W. 272, 35 L.R.A. 536.

As the provisions of the mortgage in the case at bar did not render the amount payable on the note uncertain, the note cannot be denounced as nonnegotiable on this ground. Nor did the clause giving the mortgagee on breach of certain conditions the election to declare the entire indebtedness due. Under the Negotiable Instruments Act, an instrument to be negotiable "must be payable on demand, or at a fixed or determinable future time." Section 3060-1a, Code Supp. This note was payable "on the 6th day of October, 1910." It was certain that the time would arrive when the note would be payable, and the circumstances that it might become payable before that time upon the default of the maker in certain respects at the option of the payee or holder did not affect its negotiability. Charlton v. Reed, 61 Ia. 166, 16 N. W. 64; Chicago R. Equipment Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 136 U. S. 268, 10 S. Ct. 999, 34 U. S. (L. ed.) 252; Hunter v. Clarke, 184 Ill. 158, 56 N. E. 297, 75 Am. St. Rep. 160; Mackintosh v. Gibbs, 81 N. J. L. 577, 80 Atl. 554, Ann. Cas. 1912D 163; Merrill v. Hurley, 6 S. D. 592, 62 N. W. 958, 55 Am. St. Rep. 859; Taylor v. American Nat. Bank, 63 Fla. 631, Ann. Cas. 1914A 309, 57 So. 678; Barker v. Sartori, 66 Wash. 260, 119 Pac. 611. See valuable note to Holliday State Bank v. Hoffman, Ann. Cas. 1912D 1.

Decisions to the contrary may be found on both of the foregoing propositions, but our conclusion has the support of the great weight of authority. Appellant relies on Iowa Nat. Bank v. Carter, 144 Ia. 715, 123 N. W. 237, but the chattel mortgage securing the note there held nonnegotiable provided that the note should become due and payable at the election of the payee or holder. This, being independent of any default of the maker, left him without protection, and such a clause is generally [216] held to render the note when construed in connection with the mortgage nonnegotiable, as was decided in the above case. See also Smith v. Marland, 59 Ia. 645, 13 N. W. 852; New Windsor First Nat. Bank v. Bynum, 84 N. C. 24, 37 Am.

Rep. 604; Syracuse Third Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 25 Minn. 531; Carroll County Sav. Bank v. Strother, 28 S. C. 504, 6 S. E. 313. Note in which cases are collected, to Kimp-ton v. Studebaker Bros. Co. 14 Idaho 552, 94 Pac. 1039, 125 Am. St. Rep. 185, 14 Ann. Cas. 1126. The point was not raised in Heard v. Dubuque County Bank, 8 Neb. 10, 30 Am. Rep. 811. Such a condition divests the note of the quality of certainty in time of payment, for this may be hastened at the option of the maker alone. We are of opinion that the note was negotiable, and, as plaintiff acquired it without notice and for value, that it was not subject to the defense of payment.

III. Only the president of the bank testified to the absence of notice that the note had been paid, and it is argued that, as the other officers might have been aware of this, purchase without notice was not proven. But, according to the witness, the transaction was with him, and, though his evidence may not have established the absence of notice conclusively, it was sufficient to justify the finding that the bank was without notice in acquiring the paper. Arnd v. Aylesworth, 145 Ia. 185, 123 N. W. 1000, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 638; Bennett State Bank v. Schloesser, 101 Ia. 571, 70 N. W. 705. Conceding then that Shriver negotiated the papers in breach of faith (see section 3060-a55, Code Supp.), and therefore that burden of proof to show want of notice was on plaintiff (section 3060-a59, Code), such burden was met, and plaintiff rightly held a holder of the note in due course. The cause is remanded for the entry of a decree in harmony herewith.

NOTE.

The reported case, applying the elementary rule that uncertainty as to the amount of a note or as to the date when it is payable destroys its negotiability, holds that a note secured by a mortgage is not rendered non-negotiable by a clause in the mortgage giving the mortgagee the right to pay taxes and hold the mortgagor therefor. It is further held that a clause in a mortgage allowing the mortgagee to declare the entire debt due on a breach of certain conditions in the mortgage does not destroy the negotiability of the note. The question what is a negotiable note is fully discussed in the note to Holliday State Bank v. Hoffman, Ann. Cas. 1912D 1.

v.

McCLOSKEY.

Arkansas Supreme Court—April 27, 1914.

113 Ark. 1; 166 S. W. 944.

Actions — Joinder of Causes.

The refusal to compel an election between causes of action for false imprisonment and for damages for unlawfully shackling a convict laborer is not prejudicial, in view of Acts 1905, p. 798, providing that the court may consolidate causes of like nature when it appears reasonable to do so.

Damages — Instructions — Requiring Verdict to Be Based on Evidence.

An instruction on the measure of damages, which does not tell the jury that their finding must be based on the evidence, is erroneous.

Same.

An instruction on the measure of damages, erroneous because not telling the jury that their finding must be based on evidence, is not prejudicial error, as the oath of the juror is sufficient to compel him to conform his finding to the evidence.

Pardon — When Effective.

A pardon is effective upon delivery and acceptance.

False Imprisonment — Detention of Convict after Pardon.

Where a warden, appointed by a contractor for convict labor and confirmed by the court under the statute, refuses, on the ground of lack of authority, to release a convict laborer of whom he had charge, on delivery of a pardon to him, he is liable for false imprisonment.

Same.

Where a contractor of convict labor delegates his custody of the convicts to a warden appointed by him and confirmed by the court under the statute, it is the duty of the warden, on delivery of a pardon to him, to himself examine the books to see if the pardon covers all the offenses for which the convict was committed if he would escape liability for false imprisonment in holding the convict.

Damages — Excessiveness.

Where a warden, having charge of convict labor hired out to a contractor, refused to release a convict on the delivery of a pardon to him on the mistaken assumption that only the contractor had such authority, and the convict was detained 4 or 5 hours and was compelled to work 2½ hours after receipt of the pardon, but no indignities were offered him, a verdict of $1,000 for the false imprisonment is excessive, and a verdict for $25 would be affirmed.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pulaski county:
HENDRICKS, Judge.

Action for false imprisonment. C. E. McCloskey, plaintiff, and E. N. Weigel, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. MODIFIED.

[2] C. E. McCloskey instituted this action against E. N. Weigel to recover damages for false imprisonment. His complaint also alleges that during the time of his imprisonment he was unlawfully and wrongfully forced to wear upon his leg an iron shackle, commonly known as a "spur," which was very painful, and caused a sore on his leg. The facts are as follows:

The plaintiff, McCloskey, was convicted before a justice of the peace in Pulaski County of two offenses, his fine being fixed in one case at the sum of one dollar, and in the other in the sum of fifty dollars. The defendant, Weigel, at the time had leased the county convicts from the county court, and was working them under his lease. Under the rules adopted by the county court for working county prisoners, the contractor had the right to put fetters, or shackles, upon any prisoner who improperly refused to work or attempted to escape. One of the rules provided that the contractor should use all reasonable means to prevent a convict from escaping. Another one provided that a contractor should appoint a warden and deputy warden, but that before said appointment became effective such appointment must be approved by the county court. After his conviction on the 10th day of June, 1908, the plaintiff was turned over to the defendant to work out his fine and costs. W. H. Rankin applied to the Governor for a pardon for the plaintiff, and the pardon was issued on the 24th day of June, 1908, and delivered to Rankin. Rankin carried the pardon out to the place where the plaintiff, with the other county prisoners, was worked by the defendant. The defendant was not present, and Rankin delivered the pardon to John Harden, who was the warden in charge of the convicts. Harden had been appointed by the defendant, and his appointment had been approved by the county court. The warden refused to turn the [3] plaintiff loose, saying that he had no authority to do so and that the pardon would have to be delivered to the defendant. Rankin testifies that he left the pardon with the warden and attempted to get in communication with the defendant over the telephone, but was unable to do so. On the other hand, the warden denied that Rankin left the pardon with him. The defendant lived about three miles from the camp where the convicts were worked and kept his books at his residence. He states that when he returned home that evening his wife delivered the pardon to him; that he immediately examined his books to see if there were any commitments against the plaintiff other than those named in the pardon, and that when he found there were not he immediately sent a messenger with the pardon to the camp with instructions to the warden to liberate the plaintiff. The pardon, according to the testimony of Rankin, was delivered to the warden at about 2 o'clock in the afternoon. The warden continued to work the plaintiff until about 4:30 o'clock, at which time the shackles were ordered to be cut off his leg, and this was done. The plaintiff, however, was detained in custody until 7 or 8 o'clock in the evening, this being the time that the warden received instructions from the defendant to liberate the plaintiff. The plaintiff testified that he made no effort whatever to escape while he was a prisoner in charge of the defendant, and that the iron spur was placed upon him the first day he was delivered into the custody of the defendant and remained there, both day and night, until he was liberated. He says that he suffered pain on account of the spur being on his leg, and that it caused a sore place to form there. The defendant testified that he was informed by the officers, before the plaintiff was delivered to him, that the plaintiff had a bad reputation and was likely to escape unless precautions were taken to prevent him; that in order to prevent his escape he placed the iron spur on his leg.

[4] Other facts will be referred to in the opinion. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for one thousand dollars for false imprisonment and a separate verdict for one hundred dollars for placing and keeping the iron spur on the plaintiff's leg. Judgment was rendered upon the verdict in each cause of action, and the defendant has appealed.

James A. Comer for appellant.

John F. Clifford for appellee.

[6] *HART, J. (after stating the facts).—*Counsel for defendant made a motion to compel plaintiff to elect upon which cause of action he would proceed to trial, and assigns as error the action of the court in refusing to require plaintiff to make such election. An act of the General Assembly of 1905 provides, in effect, that when causes of a like nature, or relative to the same question, are pending in any circuit court in this State, the court may consolidate said causes when it appears reasonable to do so. Acts of 1905, page 798. If separate actions had been brought, we think the court could have consolidated them under this statute. Therefore, no prejudice could have resulted to the defendant by the court refusing to require plaintiff to elect upon which cause of action he would proceed. See Mahoney v. Roberts, 86 Ark. 130, 110 S. W. 225; Ashford v. Rich- ardson, 88 Ark. 124, 113 S. W. 808; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Shofner, 87 Ark. 303, 112 S. W. 751.

It is next contended by counsel for defendant that the court erred in giving instructions on the measure of damages. He claims that the error consists in the court not telling the jury, in specific terms, that their finding as to the amount of damages must be based on the evidence, and insists that the instructions left it to the jury to find for the plaintiff in any amount that, in their judgment, should be proper. We have condemned instructions similar to the one now under consideration in several cases. See St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. Steed, 105 Ark. 205, 151 S. W. 257; St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. Dallas, 93 Ark. 209, 124 S. W. 247. However, we have never held that such an instruction is reversible error. In the case of St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. Hydrick, 109 Ark. 231, 160 S. W. 196, the court said:

"While it is always better form, and the better practice, for the court to tell the jury that its findings on every issue of fact in the case must be based upon the [7] evidence, yet where it is plain from the charge of the court, taken as a whole, that the jury were told that their findings must be based upon the evidence, the jury could not be misled nor feel authorized to make a finding that was not based upon the evidence because some separate or particular instruction omitted this precaution. The jury were sworn, in the first instance, to try the case and a true verdict render according to the law and evidence. Kirby's Digest, § 4530. That being true, it is not likely that any man of sufficient intelligence to be a competent juror would feel authorized to wander beyond the evidence to find matters upon which to predicate his findings in the case. The conscientious juror would necessarily feel restrained by his oath to base his findings upon the evidence."

It is also insisted by counsel for defendant that the verdict of the jury on the cause of action for false imprisonment is excessive; and in this contention we think he is correct. A pardon is effective upon delivery and acceptance. See Redd v. State, 65 Ark. 485, 47 S. W. 119; Ex parte Hunt, 10 Ark. 284. The plaintiff was lawfully in the custody of the defendant as lessee of the county prisoners under a contract made by him with the county court. While this is true, when the time for which a convict has been sentenced has expired, or when he has been pardoned by the Governor, he is in law no longer a convict, and cannot be held as such. The defendant himself did not remain with the convicts and have direct charge of them. He delegated that authority to a warden who was appointed by him with the approval of the county court. It was the duty of Rankin, who procured the pardon for the plaintiff, to deliver the pardon first to the warden in order that he might examine it and see that it was issued by the Governor and ascertain that it was what it purported to be. It was then the duty of the warden to cease working the plaintiff. It is insisted by counsel for defendant that he should have had a reasonable time to have examined his records in order to ascertain whether or not the plaintiff had been pardoned [8] for all offenses for which commitments had been delivered to him. This is true; but the warden refused to release the plaintiff solely on the ground that he did not have authority to do so. He told the person who had the pardon that the defendant alone reserved the right to discharge the plaintiff. The defendant having delegated to the warden the authority to have charge of the persons worked by him, it was within the scope of the authority of the warden to have examined the records himself and have determined whether there were other commitments under which the plaintiff might be held. It was his duty to have made such an examination, or caused it to have been made at once, or to have discharged the prisoner. A prisoner who has been pardoned by the Governor is entitled to his freedom, and to deprive him of it is unlawful. Therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to a judgment for some amount. As above stated, he was in legal custody of the defendant, and he had suffered all the humiliation it was possible for him to suffer solely on account of being a prisoner. The undisputed evidence shows that the illegal detention of the plaintiff by the defendant was not wilful. No indignities were offered to the plaintiff by the defendant, or his servants, after the pardon had been presented to the warden. It is true he was required to work for about two hours and a half thereafter; but this was done under a misapprehension of the law on the part of the warden who had the legal custody of the plaintiff. Under these circumstances, we think that a judgment for $25 would have been sufficient compensation for the jury to have awarded, and a judgment for that amount will be affirmed.

We find no error in the record on the cause of action for compelling the plaintiff to wear a spur, and the judgment on that count will be affirmed.

I. General Rules.

The amount of damages to be awarded in an action for false imprisonment is a question for the jury, and the general rule is that their verdict will not be disturbed on the ground of excessiveness unless it is so flagrantly large as to evince passion, partiality or corruption.

Thus in Ross v. Kohler, 163 Ky. 583, 174 S. W. 36, L.R.A.1915D 621, the court said: "The rule seems to be that . . . the court will not disturb the verdict of a properly instructed jury, on account of the sum of damages allowed being excessive, unless it appears that there is a flagrant abuse of discretion by the jury, or that the jury was actuated by passion or prejudice." And in Markey v. Sloat, 41 N. Bruns. 234, it was said: "There remains the question of excessive damages. In actions of false imprisonment and other injuries to the person, or character, although the rule remains that only such damages are recoverable as naturally flow from the wrongful act, there is no standard by which the money value of such injuries may be measured, and the only limit to the damages to be awarded is that they must be reasonable in amount. Where the person or character is injured, it is difficult, if not quite impossible to fix any limit, and the verdict is generally a resultant of the opposing forces of the counsel on either side tempered by such moderating remarks as the judge may think the occasion requires. It must not be supposed, however, that even cases of this sort are quite beyond rule. If that were so there could be no such thing as new trial for excessive damages. In cases of contracts a rule can be applied to the facts so accurately, as to make the amount a mere matter of calculation. In cases such as this one is, the rule goes no further than to point out what evidence may be admitted and what grounds of complaint may be allowed for. But when this is done, the amount of damages is entirely in the disposition of the jury. A new trial will only be granted where the verdict is so large as to satisfy the court that it was perverse and the result of gross error; or when it can be shown that the jury have acted under the influence of undue motives or misconception." See also Gomez v. Scanlan, 155 Cal. 528, 102 Pac. 12, wherein the court said: "The amount of money which will compensate one for an unwarranted restraint of his person is not the subject of exact computation. Especially is this true where the invasion of the right of personal liberty is accompanied by circumstances causing humiliation, shame, and public disgrace to the party injured. In cases of this kind the extent to which the allowance may go must, in large measure, be left to the sound discretion of the jury. A court is justified in overturning a verdict as excessive only where its amount is 'obviously so disproportionate to the injury proved as to justify the conclusion that the verdict is not the result of the cool and dispassionate discretion of the jury.'"

The fact that the amount awarded is larger than the court would have allowed, does not make the verdict excessive. Webber v. Kenny, 1 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 345; Biggs v. Schultz, 42 Hun 657, 5 N. Y. St. Rep. 56; Pastor v. Regan, 9 Misc. 547, 30 N. Y. S. 657. In the case last cited, the court said: "The amount fixed by the jury in this case was probably larger than would have been given by the court, but the jury are the tribunal especially charged with the decision of questions involving the amount of damages, and no court is at liberty to interfere with their decision unless there is a plain abuse of their discretion."

However, the verdict will be set aside or a remittitur ordered, when the damages awarded are out of all reason and conscience, and so disproportionate to the injury sustained that they show that the jury were influenced by passion or prejudice. Price v. Severne, 5 M. & P. 125, 7 Bing. 316, 20 E. C. L. 145; Fanjoy v. Portland, 29 N. Bruns. 24; Fotheringham v. Adams Express Co. 36 Fed. 252, 1 L.R.A. 474; McCarty v. Fremont, 23 Cal. 196; Elser v. Southern Pac. Co. 7 Cal. App. 493, 94 Pac. 852; Philadelphia F. Assoc. v. Fleming, 78 Ga. 733, 3 S. E. 420; Johnson v. Von Kettler, 66 Ill. 63; Fadner v. Filer, 27 Ill. App. 506; Moore v. Durgin, 68 Me. 148; Woodward v. Glidden, 33 Minn. 108, 22 N. W. 127; Reuck v. McGregor, 32 N. J. L. 70; McConnell v. Hampton, 12 Johns. (N. Cundiff* (Ky.) reported in full, post, this volume, at page 513. Thus in Reuck v. McGregor, supra, the Court said: "The chief ground upon which a new trial is asked in this case is that the damages are excessive. In these actions of tort, the court has, unquestionably, the power to grant a new trial for that reason. It is a delicate, yet necessary power, and should be exercised whenever it appears that the damages are so exorbitantly high, and so far exceed the injury sustained, as to make it manifest to the court that the minds of the jury have been controlled by passion, partiality, prejudice, or intemperance." And in Woodward v. Glidden, 33 Minn. 108, 22 N. W. 127, it was said: "The action is for false imprisonment, and . . . the plaintiff is clearly entitled to maintain it, and to recover round damages. He is entitled to damages, both compensatory and punitive: the former, to make good the actual injury inflicted upon him; the latter, to punish and make an example of the wrongdoing of the defendant. But, notwithstanding the liberty necessarily allowed juries in estimating damages against a wilful wrongdoer, there must be reason even in verdicts. In this case the jury brought in a verdict for $2,917. It is manifest that the plaintiff was far from being entitled to any such sum as this for his actual or compensatory damages. By far the larger part of the sum must have been intended as punitive damages. But even as to damages of that kind a jury must keep within some reasonable limits. In our judgment the verdict was grossly excessive and exorbitant, and enormously disproportionate to the wrong of which defendant is guilty. We cannot account for it except upon the theory that the jury gave it under the influence of passion or prejudice. We are not unmindful that we are reviewing the action of the trial judge, which is to some extent discretionary, nor of his advantage over this court from the fact that he witnessed the trial; but we are, nevertheless, clear in the opinion that, in the exercise of a sound judicial discretion, the verdict should have been set aside and a new trial granted. We shall, therefore, reverse the order appealed from, and direct a new trial."

What are adequate damages is a question for the jury, and there seems to be no reported decision in which, in an action for false imprisonment, an English or Canadian court has set aside the verdict of the jury on the ground that the damages awarded were inadequate. It seems that such a verdict will never be set aside, in those jurisdictions, on account of the smallness of damages unless there has been an intentional violation of right or duty on the part of the jury. Mauricet v. Brecknock, 2 Dougl. 509; Bradlaugh v. Edwards, 11 C. B. (N. S.) 377, 103 E. C. L. 377; Apps v. Day, 14 C. B. 112, 78 E. C. L. 112; Sam Chak v. Campbell, 45 Nova Scotia 1. See also Barker v. Dixie, 2 Stra. 1051. In Bradlaugh v. Edwards, supra, Erle, C. J., in delivering the judgment of the court, said: "The last ground of the motion was, the inadequacy of the damages, the jury having awarded the plaintiff only a farthing by way of compensation for his detention for several hours at the police station, when the expense actually incurred by him in defending himself and obtaining his release from that unfounded charge was £7. 14s. Now, if I saw clearly that there had been anything like an intentional violation of right or duty on the part of the jury, I should think it a fit case for the interference of the court. But, unless that was very clearly made out, I should be extremely scrupulous to enter into any discussion as to the amount of damages, which is entirely a matter for their consideration. Where a party has been illegally imprisoned, and has been put to expense in procuring his discharge he may very well urge that fact before the jury as an aggravation; but he has no right to demand to be reimbursed ex debito justitiæ. It is in the discretion of the jury to give him such damages as they may consider a sufficient compensation for the wrong the party has sustained, irrespective of any expense he may, perhaps, needlessly have incurred in his defense."

The American courts are likewise reluctant to set aside the verdict of a jury on the ground that the damages awarded are not adequate compensation for the injury received from the false imprisonment, and the general rule is that the verdict will not be set aside on the ground that the damages awarded are too small. Henderson v. McReynolds, 60 Hun 579 mem. 14 N. Y. S. 351; Taylor v. Davis (Tex.) 13 S. W. 642; Wegner v. Risch, 114 Wis. 270, 90 N. W. 168. See also Gregory v. Chambers, 78 Mo. 294; Bergeron v. Peyton, 106 Wis. 377, 82 N. W. 291, 80 Am. St. Rep. 33. However, it has been held that the verdict will be set aside when the damages awarded are grossly inadequate to the injury sustained. Potter v. Swindle, 77 Ga. 419, 3 S. E. 94; Hoagland v. Forest Park Highlands Amusement Co. 170 Mo. 335, 70 S. W. 878, 94 Am. St. Rep. 740.

CUNDIFF.

Kentucky Court of Appeals—November 9, 1915.

166 Ky. 594; 179 S. W. 615.

Officers — Railroad Policemen — Time for Qualifying.

Const. § 236, provides that the general assembly shall prescribe a time when the officers authorized by the constitution to be appointed shall enter upon their duties. Ky. St. § 3755, provides that, if the official bond is not given and the oath of office taken within 30 days after notice of appointment, the office shall be considered vacant. Section 779a provides that railroads, on application to the governor, may have certain persons appointed to act as policemen on trains, who shall qualify by executing bond and taking the oath of office, and be paid by the railroad, which, when it no longer requires their services, may file notice to that effect. Held that, where a special railroad policeman appointed and commissioned in June, 1906, did not take the oath and execute bond until July, 1907, the date of his notice of his appointment should have been avowed to render evidence of his powers to act himself or by deputy admissible, and that there was a presumption that he did not execute the bond and take the oath within the prescribed 30 days after notice of his appointment, so that the office was vacant.

Term of Office.

Under Const. § 93, providing that inferior and state officers may be appointed for a term not exceeding four years and until their successors are qualified, and Ky. St. § 779a, providing for the appointment of railway police officers, to be paid by the railway and to hold office during its pleasure, it was intended to create the office for the four-year term permitted by the Constitution, and the failure to fix the term as one not longer than four years does not make the statute unconstitutional.

Effect of Expiration of Term.

Under Const. § 93, providing that inferior and state officers may be appointed as prescribed by law for a term not more than four years and until their successors are appointed and qualified, the appointment of a special railway police officer under Ky. St. § 779a, on application to the governor to serve during the railroad's pleasure, does not provide for a succession in such office, so that, when the term expires either by operation of law or by the will of the railroad, the office ceases, and another appointee does not take it as successor.

Status as De Facto Officer.

A special railway police officer whose office has become vacant for failure to take the oath and execute his bond within the time prescribed by the constitution is not a "de facto officer."

Same.

The railroad, which has obtained the officer's appointment, has no right to regard him as a de facto officer, since it is incumbent upon it to see or know that he has qualified to act as an officer de jure before he is given employment on its trains.

Right to Summon Bystanders to Assist.

While every citizen is bound to assist a known public officer in making an arrest when called upon to do so, without information as to the offense charged or inquiry into the regularity of the process, and is protected in making such arrest, yet, where a special railway police officer, not a known public officer, but, assuming to act as an officer, summons a railroad employee to aid in ejecting and arresting a passenger the employee is liable as such if the alleged officer was a trespasser.

Responsibility of Railroad for Acts.

In view of Ky. St. § 3755, providing that, if an official bond is not given and the oath of office taken within 30 days after notice of appointment to a public office, it shall be considered vacant, a railroad employing a special police officer is not in the position of a third person who may claim that the acts of a de facto officer are valid as to him, but is responsible for his claim of right, so that for his acts thereunder it is liable.

[See Ann. Cas. 1913D 112.]

False Imprisonment — Acts of Servant — Proof of Motive.

In an action against a railroad, its special police officer and another for wrongful ejection and arrest, where the evidence justifies compensatory damages only, evidence as to the special officer's motive in making the arrest is inadmissible.

Punitive Damages.

Where there was nothing in the conduct of defendant railroad's special police officer and its employee, acting under his direction, in ejecting and arresting plaintiff that can be considered as wanton or reckless disregard of plaintiff's rights as a passenger, and where neither their language nor manner was insulting, punitive damages are not recoverable.

Excessiveness of Damages.

A verdict of $4,000 for alleged wrongful ejection of plaintiff from defendant's train, and his arrest and detention for an hour, without a showing of any excessive force or brutal treatment or physical injury, even if plaintiff was not drunk or disorderly, as alleged, is in excess of what will justly compensate him for the suffering endured.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Boyle County.

Action for false imprisonment. W. C. Cundiff, plaintiff, and Cincinnati, New Orleans and Texas Pacific Railway Company et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Nelson D. Rodes, Charles H. Rodes and John Galvin for appellants.

Robert Harding, Charles Montgomery, Emmet Puryear and John W. Rauchlings for appellee.

[595] NUNN, J.—This is an appeal from a judgment rendered against the appellant railway company, Samuel Morrow, and C. N. Mitchell, in favor of appellee for the sum of $4,000. The petition charges that the railway company and its servants, the co-defendants, wrongfully, maliciously and forcibly ejected him from its train, and caused him to be taken by other railroad servants to a police station at Ludlow and there locked up. The defendants filed separate answers, in which they alleged that Mitchell and Morrow were officers of the Commonwealth and not servants or employees of the railroad. Mitchell and Morrow admitted that they took the appellee, Cundiff, off of the train and delivered him to other police officers at Ludlow, Kentucky, but they say that, acting as police officers of the Commonwealth, they arrested him because he was drunk, using profane language and behaving in a disorderly manner on the train. They claim to have acted in good faith and upon probable cause, and without malice toward appellee. In brief, the facts are as follows:

Appellee was the County Court Clerk of Casey county and a candidate for re-election. In the latter part of August, 1913, a considerable number of men from Casey and surrounding counties went to Cincinnati on a Sunday excursion. Appellee lived at Liberty, the county seat, which was 17 miles from Moreland, the nearest station on appellant's road. In company with many others, they left Liberty on Saturday night about 11 o'clock, and drove overland in order to reach Moreland at 5 o'clock Sunday morning, when the excursion train was due. There was Jamaica ginger in the party before they left Liberty, and it is inferable from the record that on the road to Moreland, and on the train to Cincinnati, members of the party were drinking intoxicants of some [596] kind, although there is no evidence that Cundiff partook until he reached Cincinnati. Just why he went to Cincinnati on a Sunday excursion is not a necessary, if a fair, inquiry. He attempts to excuse the trip, however, by stating that his brother-in-law lived there, and, also, calls attention to the fact that a good many voters from his county were going and he wanted to "electioneer" with them. He admits taking several drinks of beer in Cincinnati, but does not fix the number. His friends count at least six that he drank. How many of these are in addition to those admitted by Cundiff the record leaves in doubt. He maintains, however, that he was not drunk, and his friends, certainly not less drunk, corroborate him. According to his story, he was worn out by the time the train was ready to leave Cincinnati that evening at 6 o'clock, and quite naturally his party were at the station a long while, perhaps an hour, before starting time. Before the train gates were opened they made one or more trips to a nearby saloon, where appellee admits taking a final glass of beer, and Waldon, his closest companion, bought a flask of brandy. When the gates were opened they got aboard the train. It consisted of 14 cars. Appellee and his companions got on the second car from the rear end. It was August, the shed was close, the crowd was large, and the train was next to a stone wall, where the sun had been shining all day. Of course, it was oppressive in the car, and, from these circumstances, it is easy to understand how, in connection with being up all night and going all day in a pair of new shoes, appellee felt the need of rest. He says as much, and immediately they were seated, he put up his hat, pulled off his coat, removed his collar, unbuttoned his shirt, and took off his shoes. In order that he might not be disturbed, he gave his ticket to Waldon, his companion, with request that he hand it to the conductor. Thus relieved, and so clad, he went to sleep. He never knew when the train started. In fact, the first thing he says that he did know was when, in the fifth car from the engine, Morrow caught him by the collar and jerked him out of the seat, and, with the help of Mitchell, marched him to the baggage car, where there were four other drunken passengers. Cundiff says he asked Morrow, "What is the matter? What have I done? What are you doing?" Morrow replied, "I am an officer." Cundiff says, "I am clerk of the [597] county court." To which Morrow replied, "Go on there, I will take care of you." When the train reached Ludlow, Cundiff and the other men in the baggage car were taken off. Cundiff says he then appealed to Morrow for release on the ground of politics and former association with some of Morrow's relatives; but Morrow was obdurate. Cundiff then discovered that he was without coat, collar, hat, or shoes, and asked for time to go aboard to get them. The train was held while Morrow went back for them, but he was only able to find the coat and hat. Cundiff and the baggage car outfit were delivered into the hands of an alleged police officer at Ludlow, while the other men from Casey continued their journey homeward. With Cundiff in his stocking feet, they were marched some 800 yards to the police station. Cundiff says the other men were put in a cell, but they left him out in the corridor and locked him up. As to being locked up anywhere no witness supports him, and appellant's witnesses deny it. The mayor came down in a short time and looked him over, and said, "I find no fault in this man." According to precedent, ancient, if not honorable, he desired to wash his hands of the affair by directing his release. To this Cundiff demurred and insisted that a charge be preferred and a day fixed for trial, and that he be admitted to bail. After some argument, a day was set and Cundiff prepared an appearance bond in his own hand, which a sympathizing by-stander signed. On the day fixed for trial Cundiff appeared; the case was heard; attorney for the railroad took a part, and Cundiff was acquitted.

Three of Cundiff's companions claim to know when Morrow arrested him, but none of them followed to see what became of him. With Cundiff they occupied seats near the end of the car, facing each other. These men testified that Cundiff went to sleep and never moved from his place until he was pulled out of it by Morrow. They insist that he was not drunk or offensive or creating any sort of disturbance. Waldon, his closest associate, was removed to the baggage car soon after Cundiff was taken off, and he is frank enough to say: "You see, the fact of the business is, when they taken Mr. Cundiff, you know, you see I had lost sleep all night, had been up, and was wore out and sleepy, and I just simply laid down and went to sleep. Some of the gentlemen just taken me over in the baggage car and I slept in [598] there, and then I went back to my car." He explains that all his brandy was gone when he returned.

Morrow testified that he first saw Cundiff and Waldon together that evening as they came through the station gate "walking and staggering along down the train." They got aboard the 12th car, that is the second from the rear. Morrow was acting as a police officer (whether rightfully so is another question). The whole length of the train was his beat. He next saw Cundiff out in the aisle near the middle of the car. A man was trying to get by him. Cundiff was making secret order signs, and not receiving a proper response remarked that any man that did not belong to his secret order "is a ——— fool." Morrow caught him by the shoulder and told him he was an officer and cautioned him of the presence of ladies and asked him to take his seat and get out of the way. Cundiff wanted to talk to him about his secret order, and upon receiving information that Morrow did not belong, expressed the opinion, "well, ———; you have lost the best years of your life." Morrow shoved him down in the seat and went on to the rear of the train. Coming back in three or four minutes he found him two cars ahead, where he was falling over, and making signs to, an old gentleman. He was advising the old man, with some profanity, to "join as soon as possible." Morrow warned him that if he did not sit down and keep quiet he would have to arrest him. Morrow went on to the front of the train, and then made another round trip without encountering Cundiff. On his next trip, he found Cundiff in the fifth car from the engine, seated, and cursing because he could not find a member of his secret order on the train. Morrow then arrested him and deputized Mitchell, a railroad employee, to take him to the baggage car. Morrow thus described his appearance:

"He didn't have any coat, and his shirt was open; his person was exposed; he did not look like he had combed his head for some time; his hair was stringing around his face; the smell of beer was strong on his breath, . . . and his shirt-tail was out."

Mitchell, the old man, and other passengers corroborate Morrow in many of these details, and it is established beyond controversy, that the arrest occurred in the fifth car from the engine.

[599] Reversal is asked on several grounds:

(1) Morrow acted as a police officer of the Commonwealth and Mitchell was his deputy, and the court erred in rejecting evidence tending to show Morrow's power so to act and deputize Mitchell. (2) The court erred in giving an instruction authorizing the recovery of punitive damages. (3) The verdict is excessive.

Appellants offered to prove that Morrow was a railroad policeman, appointed and commissioned by the Governor of Kentucky in June, 1906, and that on July 3, 1907, he qualified to act as such by taking the oath of office and executing bond to the Commonwealth under the provisions of Section 779a, Kentucky Statutes. The court ruled that the evidence offered was incompetent. The point was saved by avowal to the above effect. The statute referred to provides that railroad corporations may apply to the Governor and have certain designated persons appointed and commissioned to act as policemen, with powers of sheriffs or constables upon trains and about depots. Any person so appointed shall qualify in the county of his residence by executing bond with good security and taking and subscribing to the oath of office required by the Constitution. These facts must be endorsed upon his commission. Certified copy of the commission, together with the endorsements thereon, shall be recorded in the county court clerk's office of every county in which it is intended the policeman shall act. The policeman is subject to all the liabilities of sheriffs and constables, and for which the surety on the bond is responsible. The compensation of such policeman is paid by the railroad at whose instance he was appointed and is fixed by agreement between them. When the railroad deems that his services are no longer required, it may file notice to that effect in the several counties where his commission is recorded, and thereupon his right to act as policeman shall cease.

There is nothing in the case to show that the conductor or other employees of the railroad caused Morrow to arrest or reject Cundiff from the train. He acted upon his own initiative. Whether he was a servant of the railroad to the extent that the railroad would be answerable for his conduct, if, in fact, he had been lawfully commissioned and qualified to act as railroad policeman, is a question not presented by this record. We have reached the conclusion that he was not authorized to [600] make the arrest by virtue of the commission issued to him by the Governor. (1) He failed to qualify within the time required by law. (2) His term of office had expired when he made the arrest. His commission was issued on June 22, 1906. Pulaaski was the county of his residence, and he there took the oath of office and executed bond on July 3, 1907. Certified copies of the commission and qualification were subsequently recorded in Kenton county, where the arrest was made. Section 236 of the Constitution provides that the General Assembly shall by law "prescribe a time when the several officers authorized or directed by this Constitution to be elected, or appointed, shall enter upon the duties of their respective offices, except where the time is fixed by this Constitution." In compliance with this constitutional requirement, Section 3755 of the Kentucky Statutes was enacted, and is as follows:

"If the official bond is not given and the oath of office taken on or before the day on which the term of office to which a person has been elected begins, or in case of persons appointed to office 30 days after such person has received notice of his appointment, the office shall be considered vacant and he shall not be eligible thereto for two years."

The avowal does not show when Morrow received notice of his appointment. In view of the lapse of more than a year between the date of his commission and the time of his qualification, we think the date of notice should have been avowed in order to render the evidence competent. This lapse of time, unexplained, amounted to such an unreasonable delay as to raise the presumption that he did not execute the bond and take the oath of office within 30 days after he received notice of his appointment. Therefore, we must hold that the office was made vacant, and he rendered himself ineligible thereto for two years.

The arrest was made in August, 1913, more than seven years after his appointment, and more than six years after his attempted qualification. Under the Constitution, his term of office was four years. It follows, therefore, that it had expired when the arrest was made, assuming that he ever was legally qualified to make the arrest. Legislative authority to create this office comes from Sections 93 and 107 of the Constitution, which are as follows:

[601] "Sec. 93. Inferior and State officers, not specifically provided for in this Constitution, may be appointed or elected in such manner as may be prescribed by law, for a term not exceeding four years, and until their successors are appointed or elected and qualified."

"Sec. 107. The General Assembly may provide for the election or appointment, for a term not longer than four years, of such other county or district ministerial and executive officers, as may from time to time be necessary."

It will be noticed that Section 779a is silent as to the length of time that a railroad policeman shall hold his office, except the fact that it may be terminated at the pleasure of the railroad at whose instance the appointment was made. But the failure of the Legislature to fix a term not longer than four years does not of itself render the act unconstitutional.

"In construing statutes the court will never adopt a construction that makes them invalid or unconstitutional, if any other is susceptible from their words." Standard Oil Co. v. Com. 119 Ky. 75, 82 S. W. 1020, 26 Ky. L. Rep. 985; Render v. Louisville, 142 Ky. 409, 134 S. W. 458, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 530; Com. v. Hodges, 137 Ky. 233, 125 S. W. 689; Com. v. International Harvester Co. 131 Ky. 551, 115 S. W. 703.

Agreeable to this rule of construction, and as applied in the case of Sinking Fund Com'rs v. George, 104 Ky. 260, 47 S. W. 779, 84 Am. St. Rep. 454, we hold that the Legislature intended to create an office for the term permitted by the Constitution, that is, four years, and no more. In that case, the court had under consideration an act of the Legislature creating a board of penitentiary commissioners. The board consisted of three members holding office, one for a term of two years, one for four, and the other for six years. George was elected for the six year term. The constitutionality of the act was attacked on the ground that an office had been created for a term longer than four years. The court held the act constitutional, but limited George's term of office to four years. We quote from the opinion:

"As the General Assembly expressed a willingness that one of the commissioners should hold for two years longer than the Constitution permits, it is certainly reasonable to conclude that it was the will of that body that the commissioner should hold for four years, as this [602] term is necessarily included in the longer one which it fixed. To hold the act void in so far as it makes the term six years instead of four, still the balance of the act is complete and enforceable. . . . The General Assembly has not only shown a willingness that the terms shall be as much as four years, but that they shall be six. If the unconstitutional portions of an act can be stricken out, and that which remains is complete in itself, and capable of being executed in accordance with the apparent legislative intent, wholly independent of that which is rejected, it must be sustained. When that part of the act which adds two years to the constitutional term of four years is rejected, there will be three commissioners, one of whom shall hold for a term of two years, and two for a term of four years each, and, in the language of the act, holds 'until their successors are elected and qualified.'"

Arguing that Morrow was lawfully qualified in the first place, appellant contends that under Section 93 of the Constitution he was lawfully acting as policeman, although the four year term had expired, because, as it says, no successor had been appointed or qualified to take his place. We do not consider this reasoning sound for two reasons: First, the avowal is lacking in that regard. And, in the next place, the statute shows that no such thing as succession in this office was contemplated. When the term of office of a railroad policeman expires, whether by operation of law or at the will of the railroad, the office he held ceases with the officer. When another is appointed he does not take it as successor to anyone.

Neither can it be said that Morrow was a de facto officer. Nor did the railroad, responsible for his appointment, have the right to so regard him. It was incumbent upon the railroad to see or know that he had qualified to act as an officer de jure before he be given employment on its trains.

"When an officer is called upon to justify an illegal arrest and he relies upon his official capacity, it is usually considered necessary that he should prove not only that he was an acting officer, but that he was an officer in truth and right, duly commissioned and qualified to act as such." Vol. 2, R. C. L. 490.

[603] Morrow not being a public officer, his summons to Mitchell to aid in keeping Cundiff in custody does not relieve Mitchell of responsibility.

"Every citizen is bound to assist a known public officer in making an arrest, when called, upon to do so. . . . According to the better considered authorities private persons may respond to the call of a known officer without waiting for information as to the offense which the criminal has committed and without pausing to inquire into the regularity of the process; and whoever in good faith renders assistance and obeys the orders and directions of a known public officer in response to a call for assistance is protected in making the arrest, although the officer may be acting wrongfully and may be personally liable for the false arrest." 2 R. C. L. 491.

But where the party making the arrest is not a known officer, but only assumes to act in that particular case by special appointment, persons aiding the supposed officer are bound to know whether he has authority to make the arrest or not, and in case he is a trespasser for want of authority, those aiding him are also liable. Dietrichs v. Schaw, 43 Ind. 177. See, also, note, Tryon v. Pin-gree, 112 Mich. 338, 70 N. W. 905, 67 Am. St. Rep. 421, 37 L.R.A. 222.

Section 3755, Kentucky Statutes, supra, prescribing the time in which an officer shall qualify, in express terms vacates the office for failure to comply therewith. The railroad is not in the position of a third party who may claim that the acts of a de facto officer are valid as to it. The railroad is responsible for his claim of such right, and whatever steps he takes under such claim of right are taken at their peril.

The instructions authorized the jury to find for Cundiff such damages as would reasonably and fairly compensate him for the mortification and humiliation he experienced in being arrested and evicted from the train, if it was done wrongfully and without probable cause. In their discretion they were also authorized to award punitive damages, if they believed the defendants acted maliciously and with a reckless and wanton indifference to Cundiff's rights as a passenger on the train.

Appellant's counsel, at the trial, asked Morrow if, at the time he arrested Cundiff, he believed in good faith that he had a right to make the arrest. The court sustained [604] an objection to this question, and appellant excepted and avowed:

"That the witness, if permitted to answer, would state that he believed in good faith and honestly that he was entitled to do that for the protection of the women and children and other passengers on board the train against drunken and disorderly persons."

We think this evidence would have been competent had Cundiff made out a case warranting an instruction on punitive damages. Where at best the evidence justifies recovery of compensatory damages only, this evidence as to motive is not proper. However, we feel that it was error to give an instruction on punitive damages. The elements of unnecessary force and oppression are wanting. There was nothing in the conduct of Morrow and Mitchell that can be considered as a wanton or reckless disregard of Cundiff's rights as a passenger. Neither was their manner or language insulting. On another trial the court will omit the instruction on punitive damages. Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Scott, 141 Ky. 538, Ann. Cas. 1912C 547, 133 S. W. 800, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 206; Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Ballard, 88 Ky. 159, 10 S. W. 429, 2 L.R.A. 694; Memphis, etc. Packet Co. v. Nagel, 97 Ky. 9, 29 S. W. 743; Southern R. Co. v. Hawkins, 121 Ky. 415, 89 S. W. 258; 13 Cyc. 109. See cases cited Hobson on Instructions, Sec. 176.

We are also of opinion that the damages allowed are excessive, even if it be conceded that Cundiff was not drunk or disorderly, and that his arrest and eviction were wrongful. Proof of these facts would only entitle him to compensatory damages for the humiliation. Nothing is shown in the way of excessive force or brutal treatment. He was detained at the police station for only an hour. No physical injury was inflicted. We are of opinion that the damages awarded are in excess of what would justly compensate him for the suffering endured.

In the case of Schneider v. McGill, 64 S. W. 835, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 587, one McGill, the clerk at a primary election, was arrested by a police officer for breach of the peace that had not been committed. McGill was imprisoned for about three hours. In a civil action against the policeman for false arrest and imprisonment the jury awarded McGill four thousand dollars. In holding that such a verdict was clearly excessive this court said:

"We are also of opinion that the amount of the verdict is excessive, so much so as of itself to authorize a [605] reversal. The proof shows that appellee was charged with an ordinary misdemeanor when arrested, and was kept in custody only about three hours, and suffered no unusual indignity and no violence. We have found no case where a judgment for $4,000 for false imprisonment for only a few hours has been sustained; on the contrary, we find many cases where verdicts for less amounts have been held excessive."

The cases referred to below involve questions somewhat similar to this, and verdicts in smaller sums than in the case at bar were held to be excessive: In Cincinnati, etc. R. Co. v. Carson, 145 Ky. 81, 140 S. W. 71, four hundred dollars; in Southern R. Co. v. Hawkins, 121 Ky. 415, 89 S. W. 258, 28 Ky. L. Rep. 364, one thousand dollars; in Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Breckenridge, 99 Ky. 1, 34 S. W. 702, five hundred dollars; in Lexington, etc. R. Co. v. Lyons, 104 Ky. 23, 46 S. W. 209, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 516, two hundred and sixty dollars; in Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Fish, 127 S. W. 519, five hundred dollars; and in Camden Interstate R. Co. v. Frazier, 97 S. W. 776, 30 Ky. L. Rep. 186, five hundred dollars.

Judgment reversed. Whole court sitting.

NOTE.

In the reported case a verdict for four thousand dollars for the false imprisonment of a passenger is set aside as excessive, it appearing that the passenger was detained at the police station only one hour, and that no physical injury was inflicted. In other cases discussing what is an excessive verdict in an action for false imprisonment will be found in the note to Weigel v. McCloskey, reported ante, this volume, at page 503.

74 W. Va. 589; 82 S. E. 503.

Evidence — Loss of Official Document — Mode of Proof.

While the loss and contents of a warrant offered in evidence and connected with a legal proceeding should ordinarily be proved by the legal custodian of such paper, rather than by other witnesses, yet if the fact and contents of such paper otherwise sufficiently appear from other parts of the record to which the paper belongs, admitted in evidence, the admission of the evidence of such other witness will not constitute reversible error.

False Imprisonment — Issues — Truth of Charge.

On the trial of an action for false imprisonment and assault, the truth of the matter charged in a void warrant on which plaintiff was unlawfully arrested, is immaterial.

[See Ann. Cas. 1914A 1018.]

Notaries Public — Power to Issue Warrant.

Notaries public, by section 4, chapter 51, serial section 2798, Code 1913, constituted conservators of the peace, have no authority as such to issue warrants, returnable before themselves, or before justices of the peace, for violations of sections 16cII, chapter 144, serial section 5174, Code 1913; nor is any one unless the wife or an agent of the West Virginia Humane Society, authorized to make such complaints.

Powers of Notary.

The authority of notaries public, as well as of justices, as conservators of the peace, not being otherwise prescribed by statute, is limited to the powers possessed by conservators of the peace at common law, prior to the enactment of St. 1 Ed. iii, c. 16, authorizing the appointment of justices of the peace. Those duties were to prevent and arrest for breaches of the peace, in their presence, but not to arraign and try the offender.

False Imprisonment — Instructions Approved.

There was no reversible error in the giving and refusing of the instructions in this case.

Damages Not Excessive.

Nor can we judicially say the verdict and judgment for plaintiff for $200.00 was excessive.

(Syllabus by court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Mercer county.

Action for false imprisonment and assault and battery. Mark Howell, plaintiff, and J. M. Wysor et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant Wysor brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Woods & Martin for plaintiff in error.

[590] MILLER, P.—Of the three counts of the declaration, the first charges [591] malicious prosecution, the second false imprisonment, and the third assault and battery.

On the trial, when defendants proposed to prove by sundry witnesses the truth of the charge in the warrant upon which plaintiff was arrested, plaintiff objected and withdrew the first count, and announced that he relied solely on the second and third counts.

There was a verdict and judgment for plaintiff for $200.00, and which by the present writ of error defendants seek to reverse.

The first point of error is that the court permitted plaintiff to prove by himself and his counsel, in place of the clerk or custodian of the court papers, the probable loss and contents of the original warrant issued by defendant Wysor, as notary public, in place of offering the clerk into whose hands the evidence tended to show the warrant had been placed by plaintiff's counsel, along with all the other court papers, at the close of a previous trial. Plaintiff's counsel swore he had examined the court papers, and was unable to find the warrant. A certified transcript of the docket of the justice, before whom plaintiff was tried on the warrant, admitted in evidence, showed the issuance of the warrant, the appearance of the accused, trial, acquittal, and discharge. The certificate of the justice to the transcript certified also that he had delivered the original warrant to plaintiff's counsel before the previous trial. It may have been technical error to attempt to prove the loss and contents of the warrant by plaintiff and his counsel, instead of by the clerk, but as the transcript of the justice showed the fact of the issuance of the warrant, the character of the charge, failure of plaintiff to support his wife and children, his arrest, and the result of the trial, we do not think the error was material or prejudicial. The issuance of the warrant, and the arrest, were facts conceded on the trial, and there was an attempt to justify on the truth of the charge, showing want of malice. We do not think the error such as calls for reversal.

The second ground of error is the refusal of the court to permit defendants to show the truth of the charge made in the warrant. As plaintiff withdrew his first count, charging [592] malicious prosecution, we do not think the court erred. The truth of the matter charged was immaterial on the trial for false imprisonment. The court below permitted evidence to show the friendly feeling and good will of defendants towards plaintiff, at and before his arrest. This was as much as defendants were entitled to on the trial of the second and third counts. It is conceded that the warrant issued by Wysor, notary public, on complaint of defendant Hughes, and addressed to and executed by defendant McClentock, a deputy sheriff, charging plaintiff with nonsupport of his wife and children, made a misdemeanor by section 16c I, chapter 14, serial section 5173, Code 1913, was an illegal proceeding, and upon which defendants could not legally justify false imprisonment or assault.

That the warrant was void, we think clear, first, because Wysor, as notary public, had no jurisdiction in the premises. Section 16c II, of said chapter 14, serial section 5174, Code 1913, gives justices of the peace jurisdiction to issue such warrants, but not notaries public: Second, because Hughes, who made the complaint, is not of the classes of persons authorized by said section 16c I, to make such complaint. By that section "the wife or any agent of the West Virginia Humane Society" may make such complaint. Hughes was therefore an intermeddler, unauthorized. We do not overlook section 4, chapter 51, serial section 2798, Code 1913, respecting notaries, prescribing among other things, that "He shall also be a conservator of the peace within his county, and as such conservator shall exercise all the powers conferred by law upon justices of the peace." This statute confers on him none of the judicial powers of a justice; but only the power of a justice as a conservator of the peace.

Anciently and prior to Statute 1 Ed. iii, chapter 16, authorizing the appointment of justices of the peace, "Conservators of the Peace," were common law officers, elected by the people. Their duties as such were to prevent and arrest for breaches of the peace in their presence, but not to arraign and try the offender. 6 Chitty's English Statutes (6th Ed.) 775, and note; Smith v. Abbott, 17 N. J. L. 358, 366; In re Barker, 56 Vt. 14, 20. Section 28, article 8, of [593] our Constitution, prescribing the jurisdiction of justices of the peace, says, among other things, "they shall be conservators of the peace." This plainly meant to confer on them the powers anciently exercised by the common law officers. Wherefore, we construe said section 4, chapter 51, of the Code, making notaries conservators of the peace, and as such giving ^{to} them the same jurisdiction as justices, as limiting them strictly to the powers of justices as such conservators, and as not conferring judicial powers. 29 Cyc. 1068-1070. At page 1070, it is said, of the office of notary, among other things: "In general the office is ministerial and not judicial; but in some jurisdictions it has been held with respect to particular acts that notaries act judicially." The only case of that kind in this state, so far as we recall, is Henderson v. Smith, 26 W. Va. 829, 53 Am. Rep. 139, holding that the official act of a notary in taking and certifying the acknowledgement and privy examination of a married woman to a deed was in the nature of a judicial act, and that though imperfectly performed, the evidence not showing malice, or corrupt or impure motive, he was not liable in damages for such act. The opinion gives the reason for this holding. In that case, however, the damages accrued from the imperfect exercise of authority conferred. In the case at bar there was no authority whatever for the act attempted. The writ in this case being void, issued by an officer without authority, on the complaint of one not authorized, though directed to an officer with authority to execute lawful writs of justices constituted no protection to any of the defendants for false imprisonment or assault.

The third ground of error assigned is the rejection of defendants' instruction to the jury to find for them. As this instruction was based on defendants' theory that plaintiff's case failed for want of proof of the original warrant, enough has been said to show want of merit in this point.

The fourth point is that the court erroneously rejected defendants' instruction to the jury No. 2, saying that though they must find for plaintiff, the amount was entirely with them, and which might be any where between the amount sued for and one cent. Such instruction, we think, would [594] have been misleading. True no elements of damage were proven, except loss of time, and the humiliation from the arrest. One cent would have been little compensation for such injury. The jury might have misconstrued such an instruction. The court gave for defendants instruction No. 3, telling the jury, according to the rule in Ogg v. Murdock, 25 W. Va. 139, that they could only allow plaintiff compensatory damages, that is, damages to indemnify him, and not vindictive or punitive damages. This instruction sufficiently covered the question of damages, we think.

Lastly, it is suggested the verdict is excessive. We doubt whether in morals plaintiff was entitled to any verdict. Wysor and wife were his neighbors and friends, and out of their own substance had supplied plaintiff's wife and little children with the necessary food when he was neglecting them and they were crying for food. Wysor and the other defendants were evidently inspired by proper motives, but as often happens, evil has been returned for good. The jury, however, and not ourselves, are the judges, and seeing no error in the record for which we would be authorized in reversing the judgment, it must be affirmed. Judgment affirmed.

Affirmed.

NOTE.

The reported case, in holding that a verdict for two hundred dollars is not excessive in an action for the false imprisonment of a man on a charge of nonsupport, follows the general rule that the amount of damages to be awarded in an action for false imprisonment is a question for the jury. For an extended discussion of what is an excessive or inadequate verdict in an action for false imprisonment, see the note to Weigel v. McCloskey, reported ante, this volume, at page 503.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY

v.

BLAKE.

Arkansas Supreme Court—June 29, 1914.

113 Ark. 545; 169 S. W. 240.

Telegraphs and Telephones — Delay of Death Message — Proximate Consequence.

A telegram notifying the addressee that one denominated father had died and would be buried the following evening carries with it a suggestion that, if the addressee cannot arrive at the hour named, the funeral will be postponed; and, where the telegraph company delayed the message, recovery cannot be defeated because the addressee could not have reached the place of the funeral in time had the message been promptly delivered.

Evidence — Hearsay — Statement of Unexecuted Intention.

In an action for damages for delay in the transmission of a death message, testimony by the son and son-in-law of the deceased who assisted his wife in making the funeral arrangements that, had the addressee notified them of his intention to come, the funeral would have been postponed is not hearsay.

Telegraphs and Telephones — Delay — Negligence for Jury.

In an action for damages for delay in the transmission of a death message, evidence whether it could have been delivered within time by the exercise of reasonable care held sufficient to go to the jury.

Mental Anguish — Damages Excessive.

Where a telegraph company negligently delayed the transmission of a message informing plaintiff that his father-in-law, whom he had not seen for over seven years, with whom he had had intimate relations, had died, and the delay prevented plaintiff from reaching the place of death in time for the funeral, an award of $250 damages is excessive by $200, where the body, which was not embalmed, would have been decomposed had the funeral been delayed to await plaintiff's coming, and the only service plaintiff could have rendered would have been to follow the remains of his father-in-law to the grave.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Bradley county: WELLS, Judge.

Action for damages. Ben Blake, plaintiff, and Western Union Telegraph Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. MODIFIED.

STATEMENT BY THE COURT.

[546] Ben Blake instituted this action against the Western Union Telegraph Company to recover damages for mental anguish alleged to have been suffered by him on account of the negligent delay in delivering a telegram to him.

On the 16th day of September, 1913, Ruben Upshaw, the father of the wife of the plaintiff, died at his residence about thirteen miles in the country from Doniphan, Mo., and his family sent to the plaintiff the following message:

"Doniphan, Mo., September 16, 1913.

"Ben Blake, Warren, Ark.:

"Father Upshaw died this morning. Will bury to-morrow evening.

(Signed)

"W. T. Elkins."

Elkins was also a son-in-law of Ruben Upshaw, and he sent the telegram at 3 P. M. on the day that Mr. Upshaw died. It was sent at the instance of the family to notify the plaintiff and his family of the death of Mr. Upshaw, so that they might attend his funeral. The plaintiff had been living in Warren for about seven years, and was acquainted with a great many people there. He had not visited his father-in-law since he came there to live, but had sent his family to visit him. For seventeen years prior to the time that plaintiff moved to Warren he lived on his father-in-law's farm, and his relation to his father-in-law was nearly like that of a son. The families corresponded after the plaintiff moved to Warren, although he did not himself write to his father-in-law.

The telegram in question was not delivered to the plaintiff until the morning of the 18th of September. The remains of Mr. Upshaw were buried at 4 o'clock on the evening of the 17th of September. His body was not embalmed, and the undertaker testified that the body of the deceased could not have been kept, without decomposition setting in, at that time of the year, longer than twenty-four hours. The son of the deceased testified [547] that he assisted his mother in making the funeral arrangements for the burial of his father, and that if they had received a message from the plaintiff asking them to delay the funeral until the arrival of himself and his family they would have done so; that the object of sending the message to the plaintiff was to notify him of the death of Mr. Upshaw so that he and his family might attend the funeral.

On the part of the defendant it was shown that the message was delivered at its office in Doniphan for transmission at about 3 o'clock on the 16th day of September, 1913; that on account of the instruments not being able to be worked the message could not be sent until 6 o'clock. It was received by the operator at Warren at 6:20 P. M. on the same day. The operator at Warren testified that he was unacquainted with the plaintiff and made every reasonable effort to find him but was unable to do so; that he inquired at the postoffice and the telephone office and was unable to locate him; that he was finally informed that he worked for the Bradley Lumber Company, and he inquired of that company but was unable to locate him; that the Arkansas Lumber Company had an office within the corporate limits and a commissary outside of the corporate limits; that he inquired at the office of that lumber company, where he thought the time of the men was kept, and that the party that answered the telephone told him that the plaintiff worked for the lumber company, but that he could not tell where he lived or what position he held; that the delivery limits of the defendant did not extend beyond the corporate limits.

In rebuttal it was shown by the plaintiff that the timekeeper of the Arkansas Lumber Company did know plaintiff, and that it was the custom of that company, when a message was sent to any of its employees at its office in the corporate limits of the city of Warren for the message to be delivered to the person to whom it was sent.

[548] The timekeeper of the lumber company testified that the telegraph company did not inquire whether or not plaintiff worked for the lumber company.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $250, and the defendant has appealed.

Other facts will be referred to in the opinion.

George H. Fearons, N. B. Scott and Rose, Hemingway, Cantrell & Loughborough, for appellant.

B. L. Herring for appellee.

[549] HART, J. (after stating the facts).—It is first contended by counsel for defendant that the latter had no notice that it was contemplated that the funeral would be postponed. The testimony shows that if the message had been delivered on the afternoon on which it was sent the plaintiff and his family could not have left Warren until 2 o'clock A. M. the next morning, and could not have arrived at Doniphan until between 9 and 10 o'clock on the morning of the 18th inst.; that the funeral was had at 4 o'clock on the evening of the 17th inst. Therefore, they contended that the plaintiff and his family could not have attended the funeral, had plaintiff received the message on the afternoon on which it was sent, and that the language of the telegram did not convey any notice that the funeral would be postponed.

In the case of Harrison v. Western Union Tel. Co. 143 N. C. 147, 10 Ann. Cas. 476, 55 S. E. 435, in regard to a similar contention, the court said:

"We think the learned counsel for the defendant takes a view much too restricted when he contends that the only purpose of the telegram was to notify the mother of the hour of the interment, and that nothing else was reasonably within the contemplation of the parties. The evident purpose was to notify the stricken mother at once that her son was dead, to the end that she might come without delay and have the melancholy pleasure, and perform the sacred duty, of being with his remains as long as possible before they were committed forever to the grave.

"The fact that the hour fixed for the funeral is stated in the telegram is a mere incident to the general purpose for which the telegram was evidently sent."

So it may be said here the language of the telegram notified the defendant of the near relationship between the plaintiff, the sender of the telegram, and the person [550] named in it. The message itself suggested that its object was to notify the plaintiff of the death of a near relative, and also carried with it the suggestion that if there was not sufficient time for the plaintiff to arrive at the hour named in the message the funeral would be postponed until he could arrive.

It is next insisted by counsel for defendant that there was no competent testimony tending to show that the funeral would have been postponed had the message been received from the plaintiff to the effect that he desired to attend it. We do not agree with them in this contention. The son and son-in-law of the deceased testified that they assisted Mrs. Upshaw in making the funeral arrangements, for her deceased husband, and that it was understood and agreed between themselves that the funeral would be postponed if word was received from the plaintiff and his family that they desired to attend; that the object in sending the message to the plaintiff was to notify him and his family of the death of Mr. Upshaw in order that they might attend the funeral. The son and son-in-law having testified that they assisted in making the funeral arrangements, their testimony in regard to the postponement of the funeral was not hearsay, and was therefore competent to show that the funeral would have been postponed had the plaintiff notified them to do so.

It is next insisted by counsel for defendant that it is not liable, because the plaintiff did not live within the free-delivery limits of the telegraph company at Warren, and that no fee was paid to send a special messenger to deliver it. The testimony shows that the plaintiff was a night watchman for the Arkansas Lumber Company and lived just outside the delivery limits of the telegraph company at Warren; that the lumber company had an office within the free delivery limits at Warren, and that it was the custom of the timekeepers to deliver telegrams to employees which were sent to its office within the free delivery limits; that the plaintiff was well known to the officers of the lumber company there, and that the [551] lumber company would have delivered the message to him, had it been delivered to its office within the corporate limits of Warren. The question of whether the defendant company, by the exercise of ordinary diligence, could have delivered the message to the plaintiff within its delivery limits, under the facts and circumstances adduced above, was one of fact for the jury, and was properly submitted to it for its determination. Arkansas, etc. R. Co. v. Stroude, 82 Ark. 117, 100 S. W. 760. See also Western Union Tel. Co. v. Webb, 94 Ark. 350, 126 S. W. 1072. It will be remembered that, although the telegraph operator at Warren testified that he inquired at the office of the Arkansas Lumber Company for the plaintiff and was told that he worked for the company but that his address and whereabouts were not at the time known, the timekeeper for the lumber company testified that he did know the plaintiff, and that no inquiry was made of him by the telegraph company. It was also shown that if the message had been delivered to the lumber company its employees would have delivered the message to the plaintiff.

It is next contended that the verdict was excessive; and in this contention we agree with counsel for defendant. It is true that in the case of the Western Union Tel. Co. v. Rhine, 90 Ark. 57, 117 S. W. 1069, we allowed a recovery of $400 under somewhat similar circumstances. There it was shown that the body became badly decomposed and offensive odors came from it, and we said it could have afforded the mother but little consolation or satisfaction to have viewed her son's remains in such condition, if indeed it was practical for her to view them at all. There is a great difference, however, between the affection existing between a mother and her son and a son-in-law and his father-in-law. The body of the deceased in the present case was not embalmed, and the undertaker testified that the body could not have been kept longer than twenty-four hours without becoming decomposed. Mr. Upshaw died on the morning of the 16th inst. and was buried at 4 o'clock in the afternoon on the next day. The testimony shows that, had the [552] telegram been delivered to the plaintiff without delay, he could not arrive at Doniphan until between 9 and 10 o'clock on the morning of the 18th. He would then have had to travel thirteen miles to the residence where the deceased's body lay, and by the time he arrived there the body would have been necessarily discolored and badly decomposed. Therefore, instead of seeing the features of Mr. Upshaw as they appeared in life, he would only have been permitted to follow it to the grave. The plaintiff had not seen his father-in-law for seven years, and did not during that time visit him, although a correspondence was kept up between his family and that of his father-in-law. The plaintiff himself, however, had not written to his father-in-law during these seven years. The son and another son-in-law lived near Reuben Upshaw and made all arrangements for the funeral. There was no duty devolving upon plaintiff in that regard, and all he could have done would be to follow the body to the grave. We think under the circumstances related above that the verdict of $250 was too much. We think that $50 would have been a sufficient amount to compensate plaintiff for all mental pain suffered by him. The judgment, therefore, will be reversed, and judgment will be entered here for plaintiff in the sum of fifty dollars.

Introductory.

In the note to Western Union Tel. Co. v. Bickerstaff, Ann. Cas. 1913B 242, the earlier cases discussing the question what is an excessive verdict for mental anguish in a telegraph case are collated. The present note treats the recent cases in the manner followed in the earlier note.

Generally.

The amount of damages to be awarded for mental anguish caused by the negligent transmission of a telegram is a question for the jury and the general rule is that a court will not interfere with a verdict on the ground of excessiveness unless the amount awarded is so palpably large as to indicate that the jury have been actuated by passion or prejudice, or moved by undue sympathy. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Rowell, 166 Ala. 651, 51 So. 880; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Dunlap, 183 Ala. 454, 62 So. 763; Markley v. Western Union Tel. Co. 159 Ia. 557, 141 N. W. 443; Albrook v. Western Union Tel. Co. 169 Ia. 412, 150 N. W. 75; Young v. Western Union Tel. Co. 107 N. C. 370, 11 S. E. 1044, 22 Am. St. Rep. 883, 9 L.R.A. 669; Robertson v. Western Union Tel. Co. 95 S. C. 356, 78 S. E. 977; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Vance (Tex.) 151 S. W. 904; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Tucker (Tex.) 152 S. W. 199; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Wilson (Tex.) 152 S. W. 1169; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Richards (Tex.) 158 S. W. 1187; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Gest (Tex.) 172 S. W. 183; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Riviere (Tex.) 174 S. W. 650; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Holcomb (Tex.) 175 S. W. 750. In Albrook v. Western Union Tel. Co. supra, the court said: "It is said the amount of damages awarded is excessive. In Mentzer v. Western Union Tel. Co. 93 Ia. 752, 62 N. W. 1, 57 Am. St. Rep. 294, 28 L.R.A. 72, and Cowan v. Western Union Tel.

Co. 122 Ia. 379, 98 N. W. 281, 101 Am. St. Rep. 268, 64 L.R.A. 545, the jury in each case returned a verdict for a smaller amount than the verdict in this case and it is said by appellant that the facts were as aggravated as here. But the fact that the jury did so is not a precedent for what the court ought to do. It is a question for the jury. The fact that the jury in this case allowed a larger amount than we would does not necessarily require us to fix the amount. Such a rule would put the court in the place of the jury. We may interfere if the award is clearly excessive, but the fact that the jury allowed more than we would does not necessarily indicate that the jury acted through passion or prejudice. There is, of course, no fixed standard. One jury might award a larger sum than another where the facts were no more aggravated. The damages are not based at so much per hour as suggested by appellant. Plaintiff was not prevented from being present at his mother's funeral, but he was delayed about nine hours waiting along the way and at railway stations with his mother lying dead and he delayed in meeting his relatives, and not permitted to participate in the funeral arrangements. Some men are so constituted that they are able to control their feelings better than others and it is for the jury to say how much in this case plaintiff should recover. The circumstances were such as to produce mental suffering." So in Western Union Tel. Co. v. Dunlap, 183 Ala. 454, 62 So. 763, in sustaining an award of seven hundred dollars for delay in forwarding a telegram sent to inform a daughter that her father was near death, the court said: "While the amount of plaintiff's damages was, under the evidence, a question for the jury, we are decidedly of the opinion that the verdict was so excessive as to require the trial court to set it aside and award the defendant a new trial. There was not any count, nor even a claim, that there was any wantonness as to the delay in delivery of the message; and we see no basis in, or tendency of, the evidence to support a verdict for the amount awarded here. While, as before stated, the amount of the damages in this case is for the jury to say, yet we will say, in the language of another, that it is for another jury, and not this one, unless the plaintiff . . . shall within thirty days from the date of this decree, remit $550 of the verdict and judgment recovered, and agree to accept a judgment for $150, and the defendant . . . shall agree to accept such reduction of the judgment appealed from, in which event the judgment appealed from will be so corrected as to amount and, as corrected, affirmed." In Western Union Tel. Co. v. Tucker (Tex.) 152 S. W. 199, it was said: "In this case it is further insisted that the verdict is excessive, and that for this reason the trial court should have granted a new trial. There is no fixed rule for the allowance of damages in cases of the kind under consideration. The rules on the subject are well settled. In all such cases a large discretion is confided to the jury and the trial court, and where, as here, the amount of damages has been approved by the trial court, the verdict will not ordinarily be disturbed, unless its excess be so great when considered in reference to the evidence as to make it probable at least that the verdict was the result of passion."

SUTTON ET AL.

Minnesota Supreme Court—July 17, 1914.

127 Minn. 37; 148 N. W. 1066.

Appeal — Decision on Former Appeal — Law of the Case.

A proposition decided upon a former appeal becomes the law of the case and should not be re-examined in a subsequent appeal in the same action.

[See 2 R. C. L. tit. Appeal and Error, p. 223.]

Tender — Evidence Sufficient.

The pleading and evidence required a finding on the issue of tender of payment by the judgment debtor under which plaintiffs affected redemption. If the findings in this case are to be construed to the effect that, by direct authority of the judgment debtor, a tender in lawful money of the full amount of plaintiffs' judgment was not made to them personally prior to the time when they could use the same for redemption purposes, they are not justified by the evidence.

Tender of Payment of Judgment.

No one in the line of redemptioners, nor an intermeddler, may by tender of payment of a judgment impair or destroy a judgment creditor's right to use the judgment to effect redemption.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

To destroy a judgment creditor's right to use the judgment as a means for obtaining certain land through redemption, it is not indispensable that the judgment creditor, in addition to tender of payment, bring suit to compel satisfaction of the judgment and deposit the money tendered in court.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A tender by the judgment debtor of the full amount due on a judgment, under which the judgment creditor has filed an intention to redeem land, before the arrival of the time when the judgment could be used for such purpose, and under circumstances clearly disclosing that both parties appreciated the purpose of such tender, destroys the right of the judgment creditor to thereafter use the judgment as a basis for redeeming such land.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

But if a redemption is made by a judgment creditor whose right to make it, though good on the face of the record, has, in fact, been destroyed by the tender of the payment of the judgment, the title of the purchaser at the sale nevertheless passes to him, if the holder thereof accepts the redemption money with full knowledge of the tender.

[See note at end of this case.]

Mortgages — Redemption from Foreclosure.

Assuming a valid tender proven, it is held:

(a) That the defendant Torinus, the holder of the title acquired through the mortgage foreclosure sale, by accepting the redemption money paid by plaintiffs, judgment creditors, with full knowledge of the facts showing that they had no right to redeem, thereby suffered plaintiffs to succeed to his title and cannot now question the validity of their redemption.

(b) That the evidence does not show any rights or equities which required the court to relieve the defendant William Sutton, junior to plaintiffs in the line of redemptioners, who attempted to redeem under a mortgage, recorded without the prepayment of the registry tax. Nor has Sutton alone, or in conjunction with any other defendant, any equities through which to attack plaintiffs' title.

(c) That the defendant Sauntry, the owner, after the expiration of the year of redemption, had no interest in the land so as to question plaintiffs' redemption, and his right to have the land applied to the payment of such of his debts as were liens thereon, depended entirely upon the lienholders making redemption in strict conformity with the statute.

(Syllabus by Court.)

Appeal from District Court, St. Louis county: FESLER, Judge.

Action to quiet title. Charles N. Orr et al., plaintiffs, and William Sutton et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

J. N. Searles, Manuering & Sullivan and Butler & Mitchell for appellants.

William G. White and Theodore Hollister for respondents.

[39] HOLT, J.—Action to quiet title. William Sauntry owned an undivided half of valuable mining lands in St. Louis county, this state, which he mortgaged to secure the sum of $30,000. He defaulted and the mortgage was duly foreclosed by advertisement. The year for redemption expired on September 20, 1911. The rights acquired by the purchaser at the sale were on the last named date held by Louis E. Torinus, the sheriff's certificate having been duly assigned to him. The mortgagor was insolvent, and unsatisfied judgments existed against him. Transcripts of the following judgments were docketed in St. Louis county prior to September 21,

1911: (1) A transcript of a judgment in favor of Nathan E. Franklin for $8,243.34, docketed July 22, 1910. This judgment was assigned to Louis E. Torinus and proper record made on September 23, 1911; (2) a transcript of judgment in favor of Fred Rossiter for $1,589.35, docketed October 24, 1910; (3) a transcript of a judgment in favor of John J. Kilty for $329, docketed at 5:15 p. m. September 20, 1911, together with proper records showing an assignment of the judgment to William Sutton, September 18, 1911; and (4) a transcript of a judgment in favor of Robert W. Hunt & Co. for $741.38, docketed at 5:19 p. m. September 20, 1911, with proper records showing an assignment of this judgment to plaintiffs January 11, 1911. In the evening of September 20, 1911, William Sauntry executed a second mortgage on the land to William Sutton to secure a demand note for $50. It appears that this indebtedness represented a portion of attorney's fees owing to one Grannis from Sauntry which Grannis assigned to William Sutton. This mortgage was filed in the office of the register of deeds at 10 p. m. on the same day. But no mortgage registry tax was paid thereon until long afterwards. No registry number was placed on the mortgage, nor was it indexed until the next morning after it then had been taken to the county treasurer and he had certified thereon that it was exempt from taxation. Proper notices of [40] intention to redeem were filed so that the respective judgment creditors were placed in line of redemptioners in the order above given and the mortgagees William Sutton last, provided each had a good right to redeem. Sauntry, the mortgagor and owner, did not redeem. Louis E. Torinus redeemed on September 25, 1911, as assignee of Franklin judgment. Fred Rossiter the next in line did not offer to redeem. Nor did William Sutton make any attempt to redeem as assignee of the Kilty judgment. On October 5, 1911, plaintiffs, as assignees of the Robert W. Hunt & Co. judgment, redeemed; and on October 9, 1911, William Sutton in turn redeemed as mortgagee in the $50 mortgage mentioned. The sheriff upon each of these redemptions issued his certificate to the redemptioner. October 10, 1911, William Sutton, claiming to be the owner of the land under his redemption, mortgaged the same to Louis E. Torinus to secure the payment of $10,000. The complaint sets out the various matters very fully, alleges conspiracy between the defendants to circumvent plaintiffs and deprive them of their right to redeem, and asks that the claims of each defendant to the land be barred and the cloud cast upon plaintiffs' title by the Sutton redemption, the Torinus mortgage, and the records thereof be removed. In addition to Torinus, Sutton and Sauntry, the latter's wife and one Lyman Sutton are made defendants, also the lessees of the mine, but the latter are in no way affected. The court found plaintiffs to be the owners, that the defendants had no right, title or lien in or to the land, and directed judgment quieting title in plaintiffs and removing the cloud cast on their title by the record of the Sutton redemption and mortgage, and the mortgage to Torinus. Defendants appeal from the order denying their motion for a new trial.

The defendants contend for a new trial upon three grounds: (1) No mortgage registry tax was required upon the $50 mortgage under which Sutton redeemed, hence his redemption vested title in him; (2) plaintiffs lost their right to redeem by the tender of payment of their judgment prior to the time when such right could be exercised; (3) even if the tax be held applicable to this mortgage, equities will relieve defendants since its nonpayment was the result of an honest [41] mistake induced by the conduct of the administrative officers of the state and county, and the tax was paid before the trial.

In a former opinion in this case (Orr v. Sutton, 119 Minn. 193, 137 N. W. 973, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 146) we held that this mortgage, upon which the registry tax imposed by chapter 328, p. 448, Laws 1907, was not paid before it was recorded, furnished no sufficient legal basis for redemption from the foreclosure sale here involved. This was following and applying the rule announced in State v. Fitzgerald, 117 Minn. 192, 134 N. W. 728, that all mortgages including those of $50 and less are subject to the registry tax. We are earnestly importuned to re-examine the question, on the ground that that decision is wrong and that the court was led astray, because counsel on both sides designedly took the position that the law violated the Constitution, unless it was held applicable to all mortgages however small. Even if the court, as now constituted, entertained doubts concerning the soundness of the Fitzgerald decision, a well-settled rule of law stands in the way of any re-examination of the question upon this appeal, for on this proposition our former decision herein is the law of the case and binding on us. There is nothing in the situation which calls for a deviation from this well-established doctrine. No application was made for reargument when the former appeal was determined. In Terryll v. Fari-bault, 84 Minn. 341, 87 N. W. 917, it is said: "The case was here on a former appeal and the notice of claim for damages was held sufficient. 81 Minn. 519, 84 N. W. 458. That decision, whether right or wrong, must be treated as the law of the case and the question cannot be re-examined at this time." The same rule was stated thus in Bradley v. Norris, 67 Minn. 48, 69 N. W. 624: "This court has the right to overrule the decision made on the former appeal in some other case, but in this case it must be followed." See also Schleuder v. Corey, 30 Minn. 501, 16 N. W. 401; Smith v. Glover, 50 Minn. 58, 52 N. W. 210, 912; Tillen v. Wolverton, 54 Minn. 75, 55 N. W. 822; Maxwell v. Schwartz, 55 Minn. 414, 57 N. W. 141; St. Paul Trust Co. v. Kittson, 67 Minn. 59, 69 N. W. 625; Phelps v. Sargent, 73 Minn. 260, 76 N. W. 25; Piper v. Sawyer, 78 Minn. 221, 80 N. W. 970; Hibbs v. Marpe, 84 Minn. 178, 87 N. W. 363. To the same effect many authorities may [42] be cited from other jurisdictions: Adams Co. v. Burlington, etc. R. Co. 55 Ia. 94, 2 N. W. 1054, 7 N. W. 471; Heffner v. Brownell, 75 Ia. 341, 39 N. W. 640; Bem v. Shoemaker, 10 S. D. 463, 74 N. W. 239; Bolton v. Hey, 188 Pa. St. 418, 31 Atl. 1097; and Case v. Hoffman, 100 Wis. 314, 72 N. W. 390, 74 N. W. 220, 75 N. W. 945, 44 L.R.A. 728.

One of the main defenses pleaded is, plaintiffs were tendered payment of their judgment before the time arrived at which it might be used to effect redemption, therefore the one made by them was wrongful and of no validity to pass title. It is undisputed that on September 27, 1911, Lyman Sutton, accompanied by defendants' attorney, brought $785 in gold coin to plaintiffs' office and tendered the same to them personally in payment of the judgment held by them. The amount was sufficient and was verified by one of plaintiffs. Beyond quibble written authority from Sauntry to Lyman Sutton to make the payment was exhibited to plaintiffs. The money was not Sauntry's. It was furnished by Lyman Sutton. When plaintiffs refused to accept, Sutton placed the money in his safe, where it remained ready for plaintiffs until some time in the following December. Defendants insist a valid tender was proven and should have been definitely found by the court, and, in case the findings should be construed as negating a tender, they contend the evidence does not justify the same. It is commendable to find only the ultimate facts. But in this case tender was set up as a specific defense or ground for contesting the validity of plaintiffs' redemption. Whether William Sauntry actually offered plaintiffs lawful money in sufficient amount to pay their judgment prior to their redemption, was a matter of pure fact. Whether such fact constituted a legal defense, is a question of law. The court below may have been satisfied of the existence of the fact, but may have concluded that the legal effect was of no consequence to defendants. This court may take a different view. It is thus apparent that an absence of a specific finding upon the issue of tender is not fair to defendants, nor, indeed, to plaintiffs were they appellants. It is true the request to make findings on this issue was not in the proper form (Hall v. Sauntry, 72 Minn. 420, 75 N. W. 420, 71 Am. St. Rep. 497), nevertheless tender was so important [43] a matter to a right decision that the findings should not leave the fact of its being made in doubt. This is a case where a definite finding should have been made on this issue. Turner v. Fryberger, 99 Minn. 236, 108 N. W. 1118, 109 N. W. 229. Moreover, even if the findings, coupled with the court's refusal to amend the same to show tender, should be construed equivalent to a finding that tender was not proven, we are of opinion that the evidence as it now stands does not so warrant. The money was there. Plaintiffs were lawyers. They knew as well as defendants what it was intended for, and what was at stake. Their refusal to accept payment was no doubt a deliberate act with full knowledge of the situation. They took the chance of defendants not being able to establish that the tender was made by authority and direction of Sauntry, or else that the law did not give the debtor the right to stop plaintiffs at that time from resorting to the land for the satisfaction of their judgment. We shall therefore assume that plaintiffs were tendered payment of their judgment before the arrival of the time when they could use it for the purpose of redemption.

True, no one in the line of redemptioners, either ahead of or behind plaintiffs, nor any intermeddler, could extinguish or impair their right to redeem by offering to pay their judgment. The only one who possessed this right on September 27, 1911, was the judgment debtor. His right was absolute. It is immaterial who furnished him the money, or what his motives were, he was then entitled to pay the judgment or cause it to be paid, for the time had not arrived when plaintiffs could use it for redemption purposes.

It is asserted the tender was unavailing because when refused the only way to keep it good was to pay the money into court and begin an action to compel a satisfaction of the judgment. Section 7908, G. S. 1913, is cited. This provision does not in terms apply to this case. But we may admit that the procedure suggested by respondent is not improper. However, it is not absolutely necessary in order to give effect to the tender. The testimony shows that the gold was kept intact for plaintiffs for some time after this action was brought and the answer served. In the answer Sauntry still asserts a readiness to pay. At any time after Sutton's redemption [44] plaintiffs could have received from the sheriff full payment of their judgment and all moneys paid by them in their attempt to redeem, including the wrongful payment of the Kilty judgment. We think the tender was kept good and the money is available now. Dunn v. Dewey, 75 Minn. 153, 77 N. W. 793; Murray v. Nickerson, 90 Minn. 197, 95 N. W. 898.

The claim is also presented that the tender unaccepted was of no effect. Harking back to the early case of Jackson v. Law, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 248, Law v. Jackson, 9 Cow. (N. Y.) 641, text books and decisions state that a judgment lien cannot be discharged by tender. There must be actual payment. The argument is that so long as the judgment remains a lien it furnishes a basis under the statute for the right to redeem. But there is quite a unanimity among the authorities, in states where the mortgagee's estate is considered a lien or pledge merely, that a tender of the debt discharges the lien. Kortright v. Cady, 21 N. Y. 343, 78 Am. Dec. 145; Moore v. Norman, 43 Minn. 428, 45 N. W. 857, 9 L.R.A. 55, 19 Am. St. Rep. 247. That there are inherent differences in the quality of a judgment lien and a mortgage lien which justify the rule that a tender of payment of one does not discharge a tract of land from its lien, while it does as to the other, may be doubted. The owner of the debt in either case may voluntarily release any real estate from the one as well as from the other without discharging any part of the debt. Be that as it may, this court has recognized the distinction in Rother v. Monahan, 60 Minn. 186, 82 N. W. 263. But that case also clearly establishes the principle applicable here, namely, that a tender of payment of a judgment by the judgment debtor destroys and extinguishes the right to make the judgment the basis for a redemption. It may well be that, before any notice of intention to use the judgment as against any particular land is filed, a tender of payment does not impair or destroy the judgment creditor's right to make use of or enforce the judgment generally. But when, after he has so done, the judgment debtor tenders payment, the creditor must accept the money and let that land alone. Any further attempt to proceed against the land in question after such tender must be considered wrongful. Mr. Justice Mitchell thus states the [45] view of the court in the case cited: "The act of the defendant in attempting, under the circumstances, to use this judgment for redemption purposes was wholly in his own wrong. If, under similar circumstances, he had attempted to enforce the judgment by execution, a court would have unquestionably enjoined him from doing so, or, if a sale had been made on the execution, set it aside as wrongful, and an abuse of the process of the court, and compelled defendant to accept the tender and satisfy his judgment. Mason v. Sudam, 2 Johns Ch. (N. Y.) 172. The same principle applies where, as in this case, the defendant has wrongfully attempted, notwithstanding the tender, to use the statutory process of redemption for the purpose of collecting his judgment out of this land. It is wholly immaterial what the object of the debtor and mortgagor was in making the tender,—even if it was to prevent a redemption by defendant. He must be presumed to have some interest in preventing such a redemption. It may be that he had made some advantageous arrangement with the plaintiff, the holder of the certificate of sale. But what his intent or motive was it is not for the courts to inquire. He had a legal right to pay the judgment, and thereby prevent a redemption by defendant. Defendant's duty and only right, under the circumstances, was to accept the tender and satisfy the judgment. His refusal to do so and his attempt to use his judgment for redemption purposes were wrongful and a clear abuse of the statutory right of redemption. The court will, under such circumstances, set aside the attempted redemption, and compel defendant to do what he ought to have done in the first instance,—accept his money and satisfy his judgment." And we think it has been definitely determined in Roberts v. Meighen, 74 Minn. 273, 77 N. W. 139, that it is not necessary, in order to make the judgment creditor's attempt to redeem wrongful, that the judgment debtor prior to redemption bring the money into court and commence suit to compel satisfaction of the judgment. In that case payment was merely tendered, no money was brought into court and no action brought until after redemption. The point was distinctly made in appellant's brief that such tender was not sufficient to destroy the right to use the judgment as a basis for redemption. Chief Justice Start, who tried the case [46] of Rother v. Monahan, supra, in the court below and therein adverted to the rule that tender of payment of a judgment does not release its lien on real estate, writes the opinion sustaining the court below in the ruling that the tender as made destroyed the right to use the judgment for redemption purposes.

Is any defendant in position to object to plaintiffs' redemption? When the owner fails to redeem from a mortgage foreclosure sale, the purchaser acquires the title the owner had when the mortgage was given. If lienholders redeem under the statutory provisions, the title acquired by the purchaser at the foreclosure sale is thereby vested in such redemptioners. Even when the redemptioner has no right to make it, or does not conform to the law in so doing, the title nevertheless passes to him, if the one from whom redemption is made accepts the redemption money, unless there exists some lienholder whose redemption is interfered with or prejudiced. Willard v. Finnegan, 42 Minn. 476, 44 N. W.

985, 8 L.R.A. 50; Todd v. Johnson, 50 Minn. 310, 52 N. W. 864; same case in 56 Minn. 60, 57 N. W. 320; Clark v. Butta, 73 Minn. 361, 76 N. W. 199. No doubt Torinus could have objected to plaintiffs' redemption, but he did not. By accepting the redemption money paid by plaintiffs he relinquished to them the title he had. He turned over his money to be used by Sutton in making the redemption from plaintiffs. There is nothing in the record to suggest that Torinus did not have full knowledge of the tender when he accepted and receipted for the money. And we think it follows from the authorities herebefore cited that the only person who may attack a redemption fair on the face of the record, but wrongful in fact, where the redemption money has been accepted by the one holding the title of the purchaser at the foreclosure sale, is one who has still some beneficial interest in the land, or one who, being a subsequent lienholder, has availed himself of the right to redeem strictly in accordance with the provisions of the statute.

Whether Torinus be regarded as acting for Sutton or for himself alone, the fact remains that plaintiffs' right to redeem was conceded by both in that their redemption money was accepted and in that both plant themselves on the redemption by which Sutton [47] claims to have succeeded to the title plaintiffs secured by their redemption.

The defendant Sutton insists that in equity he should be relieved from the mistake he made in not paying the mortgage registry tax, notwithstanding the former decision that he had no legal statutory right to redeem. For the purpose of considering the equities urged, let us for the moment assume that the provisions of the redemption statute may be suspended or abrogated by the courts. The one who asks equitable relief, even against a wrongdoer, must show equities of some merit and clean hands. If we take plaintiffs on the one hand and Torinus and the Suttons on the other, we look in vain for any appealing equities. The Suttons sought the land. So did plaintiffs. Each party bought up judgments against Sauntry for the sole purpose, apparently, of thereby securing title to this land. William Sutton made no attempt to redeem under the Kilty judgment, but the money plaintiffs paid on that was also accepted and receipted for by Torinus, presumably under Sutton's direction, so that, on October 5, 1911, when Sutton attempted to redeem, the only equity or right he had was this $50 mortgage. It is perfectly obvious that the only reason for purchasing this small, stale claim against Sauntry was to circumvent plaintiffs who had outwitted him in the race to be the last in the line of redemptioners. Both Sauntry and the Suttons are very careful in the pleadings, as well as in the testimony, to deny any intent to obtain for Sauntry either the land or any beneficial interest whatever therein. Sauntry and his wife would be the only persons in all this company entitled to consideration in the search for equities, and they disclaim. Torinus got in to make $2,500, the Suttons to get the land, and when the means provided for that purpose slipped from under, this mortgage was obtained as a last resort. Neither the claim supporting the mortgage, nor the circumstances under which it was procured, furnish equities of merit.

It is also apparent that William Sutton was not misled by the interpretations placed on the mortgage registry law by either state or county officials, even if this should be held excusable. His attorneys counseled together on this proposition, evidently without [48] placing reliance on the advice given, or the practice adopted, by any official. In fact, no attempt was made, on the night the mortgage was filed for record, to have the indorsement made on the mortgage by the proper official, that it was exempt from taxation in accordance with the custom adopted in St. Louis county.

Neither does it appear to us that William Sauntry may invoke equities to vest title in Sutton under his attempted redemption. Sauntry's failure to redeem terminated his estate in the land. His title had vested in Torinus as assignee of the purchaser at the foreclosure. It did not harm Sauntry if Torinus allowed plaintiffs to redeem without right. On the contrary Sauntry's debt to plaintiffs of over $700 was thereby effaced. If there had been any claim on the part of Sauntry that he had some beneficial interest in or to the land which the Suttons were assisting him to secure, the case might have been brought under the principle controlling in Roberts v. Meighen, supra. But it is clear from the pleadings and from the evidence that both Sauntry and the Suttons take the position that Sauntry has no interest whatever in the land, that the redemption under the $50 mortgage was for the benefit of the Suttons alone, outside of the $2,500 bonus to Torinus, and that the sole ground upon which Sauntry contests plaintiffs' redemption is that he is entitled to have the land appropriated to pay his debts to the greatest possible extent. However, he could not compel Sutton to redeem. The right of Sauntry to have the land appropriated to the payment of the liens of his creditors was all the time subject to the condition that such creditors availed themselves of the redemption statute in strict conformity to its provisions. That was wholly within their choice. Hoover v. Johnson, 47 Minn. 434, 50 N. W. 475; State v. Kerr, 51 Minn. 417, 53 N. W. 719; Bartleson v. Munson, 105 Minn. 348, 117 N. W.

512. If Sutton because of noncompliance with the redemption laws failed to appropriate the land to the satisfaction of Sauntry's debts, and cannot be relieved, it would seem to follow that the only right which Sauntry now claims, namely, to have his $50 debt to Sutton wiped out, is also gone.

But we do not believe provisions of the redemption statute can be abrogated, or in particular cases relieved against by the courts [49] in the absence of some agreement or act of waiver of the party whose rights are to be affected. No one will claim that, if through a mistake a mechanic's lien was filed too late, equity could relieve. Nor can an owner be heard to be relieved against his mistake in permitting the year of redemption to expire, or a creditor against the mistake or omission to file his lien as the statute requires, except in cases where the mistake or omission has been induced by the agreement or acts in the nature of waiver on the part of the person who is to be affected by the relief. No act of plaintiffs can be pointed to as inducing William Sutton or Torinus to accept the redemption money, or to refrain from paying the mortgage tax, or to take any other step to acquire the land. It is true, the mortgage without the tax paid was not a nullity, except as a basis for redemption. Cases like Forest Lake State Bank v. Ekstrand, 112 Minn. 412, 128 N. W. 455; Mason v. Fiehner, 120 Minn. 185, 139 N. W. 485; Boyd First State Bank v. Hayden, 121 Minn. 45, 140 N. W. 132; Staples v. East St. Paul State Bank, 122 Minn. 419, 142 N. W. 721, are cited to the effect that equity will relieve against mistake in not paying the mortgage registry tax. But these cases relate to a reformation of instruments which defectively expressed the intention of the parties because of mutual mistake. In none did the court attempt to affect the rights of third parties who had neither taken part nor induced the transaction. In State v. Kerr, supra, it is said the court does not possess the power to enlarge the redemption statute: "The right of redemption is a strict legal right, to be exercised, if at all, in accordance with the terms of statute by which the right is conferred, unless waived or extended by the party whose interests are to be affected. . . . As a general rule, it may be said that when a valid legislative act has determined conditions on which rights shall vest or be forfeited, and no fraud has been practiced, no court can interpose conditions or qualifications in violation of the statute. The courts have no power to relieve against statutory forfeitures." When William Sutton attempted to use his $50 mortgage as a basis of redemption, the right had been forfeited because the mortgage was not legally on record. As tending in the same direction, see Bagley v. McCarthy Bros. Co. 95 Minn. 286, 104 N. W. 7; Brady v. [50] Gilman, 96 Minn. 234, 104 N. W. 897, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 835, 113 Am. St. Rep. 822.

So that, assuming the tender of payment of plaintiffs' judgment made their attempt to redeem wrongful, they nevertheless are now owners, because their redemption, fair on the face of the record, was acquiesced in by Torinus, from whom they redeemed by his accepting their money, thereby transferring the purchaser's title at the foreclosure sale to them; and as to William Sauntry he has foreclosed himself from attacking plaintiffs' title, because he disclaims all beneficial interest in or to the land through the Sutton redemption; and as to William Sutton, if Torinus acted for him, he is bound by the acceptance of plaintiffs' redemption money, and if he relies on his redemption, he had no legal or equitable right to make it.

Taking the view of the evidence most favorable to defendants on all controverted matters, we nevertheless reach the conclusion that the decision of the trial court must be affirmed.

PHILIP E. BROWN, J. (dissenting).—When the opinion in this case came to the writer the following dissent was prepared and submitted. Subsequently, pursuant to what seems to be the usual practice, the latter part of the main opinion was rewritten and enlarged. That the controversy may be brought to an end, the dissent is filed without alteration.

I dissent from the propositions that Sutton should not be relieved from the consequences of failing to pay the mortgage registry tax and that plaintiff is entitled to equitable relief.

An excusable mistake whereby one loses a valuable legal right gives rise to an equity, not only as against the person responsible for it or privy thereto, but also against anyone who will not be injured by its correction. Lane v. Holmes, 55 Minn. 379, 57 N. W. 132, 43 Am. St. Rep. 508. Orr would not, in legal contemplation be injured by judicial recognition of Sutton's redemption; for the sole purpose of the statute allowing a creditor to redeem is that his claim may be saved and paid, which would be accomplished in this case if plaintiffs' right to question Sutton's redemption were denied. The [51] statute does not contemplate speculation in the mortgaged property with the view of obtaining title thereto, except as such is necessarily involved in efforts of creditors to save their claims and as incident to the end that the property shall go as far as possible towards payment of the mortgagor's debts. Sprague v. Martin, 29 Minn. 226, 13 N. W. 34. Hence neither Orr's nor Sutton's acts should be regarded as those of an owner seeking to protect his specific rights in property as such, and their respective redemptions should be considered solely with reference to their status as creditors attempting to save their claims, which, if valid, are entitled to due protection, regardless of amount. Aside from fraud, the desire of either to secure the land itself is immaterial, either for or against him, and the equities of each, if any, should rest in and be weighed by their standing as creditors. Thus tested, the circumstances disclosed on the trial presented no equity in Orr needing protection, for his rights as a creditor were conserved by Sutton's redemption; whereas Sutton had on equity arising from the fact that he would lose at least the security for his debt unless the mistake, whereby his attempt to redeem fell short of legal requirements, was corrected. That this mistake, though one of law, was excusable, seems unquestionable; for if Sutton was not equitably justified in accepting the prior practical construction placed upon the statute by the officers of the state, including the attorney general, it is difficult to conceive of such justification for any act attributable to an erroneous conception of the law. In a proper case, however, one may be relieved of the effect of a mistake of law. See Benson v. Markoe, 37 Minn. 30, 34, 33 N. W. 38, 5 Am. St. Rep. 816; Gerdine v. Menage, 41 Minn. 417, 421, 43 N. W. 91; Lane v. Holmes, supra; Truesdale v. Sidle, 65 Minn. 315, 67 N. W. 1004; Dodge v. Kennedy, 93 Mich. 547, 53 N. W. 795; Pomeroy, Eq. Jur. (3d ed.) 839, 849. The rule established by these authorities is, as reiterated in Forest Lake State Bank v. Ekstrand, 112 Minn. 412, 416, 128 N. W. 455, that equity will relieve from a mistake of law where one party by availing himself thereof will secure without consideration an unjust advantage of the other party, who is blameless in the premises. Certainly it seems that Sutton's failure to pay the 50-cent registration tax comes within the rule, wherefore [52] his redemption should be recognized and adjudicated effective, thereby preventing grave consequences as the result of trivial, and in no sense wilful, fault.

But assuming this position untenable, what is plaintiff's standing to seek equitable relief? What is he other than an intermeddler seeking speculative gain through his own wrong, thus attempting to pervert the redemption law? Legally he had a lien when he redeemed, for, under our decisions, the tender did not destroy that; but it was a naked, technical lien, existing merely because his wrong had not yet been remedied by wiping his judgment from the records. After the tender, or at least so long as it continued to be operative, no remedial right thereon remained against Sauntry except as to the money tendered. Rother v. Monahan, 60 Minn. 186, 188, 62 N. W. 263. Only as a creditor with a vested right to have the property applied to the satisfaction of his debt did he have any right to redeem. Sprague v. Martin, 29 Minn. 226, 232, 13 N. W. 34. After the tender, therefore, he had no better standing to redeem than one without a lien, who, as declared in Nelson v. Rogers, 65 Minn. 246, 248, 68 N. W. 18, has no such specific interest in the property as to constitute him a proper redemptioner under the statute. Such also is the rule declared applicable in the present case, so that "any further attempt to proceed against the land in question after such tender must be considered wrongful;" but nevertheless Orr's redemption is upheld because Torinus, the purchaser, accepted the money. In short, it is held, in effect, that one having no right to redeem may do so and thus acquire title to the land, if no one entitled to object does so. Upon the same reasoning it would seem that the necessity of a lien or some specific interest in the property as the basis of the right to redeem could be waived, which certainly is not the law as heretofore understood by this court. See Todd v. Johnson, 50 Minn. 310, 313, 52 N. W. 864. It is difficult to comprehend how this holding consists with the nature of the creditor's rights under the statute, after the year for redemption by the mortgagor has expired, such being the equitable substitute for his prior right to subject the property to execution (Powers v. Sherry, 115 Minn. 290, 294, 132 N. W. 210), or with the character of the relief sought, the same being essentially [53] equitable (Mathews v. Lightner, 85 Minn. 333, 336, 88 N. W. 992, 89 Am. St. Rep. 558). To grant plaintiff any relief in the premises is not only to place a premium upon wrongful speculation by creditors, but also to forget that equity should not be oblivious to the stain on plaintiff's hands, nor need a complaining defendant to close its doors to one who comes limping upon a crutch of wrong. Had plaintiff alleged the facts regarding the tender his complaint would unquestionably have been demurrable, and he should not be held to be in any better position with the proofs in to the same effect.

But can it properly be said that none of the defendants are in position to object to plaintiff's redemption? Assuming that Sutton, as a subsequent lienholder, was not, and accepting as sufficient predicate for an estoppel or waiver, the statement of the court that "there is nothing in the record to suggest that Torinus did not have full knowledge of the tender when he accepted and receipted for the money" paid on plaintiff's redemption, the question of Sauntry's right still remains. Under the reasoning of Rother v. Monahan, supra, he could have maintained an action, after tender to restrain plaintiff from attempting to enforce the judgment for any purpose, and must have prevailed; from which it would seem to follow that he could resist its enforcement by objection to redemption. The only escape from this conclusion lies in the determination of the court, following Willard v. Finnegan, 42 Minn. 476, 44 N. W. 985, 8 L.R.A. 50, that after Sauntry's year of redemption expired he had no interest in the property to protect and was without right to question Orr's redemption or to take steps necessary to insure redemption by Sutton. Here it is the court seems to lose sight of Sauntry's rights, both legal and equitable. The mortgagor's rights were summarily disposed of in Willard v. Finnegan, supra, without discussion and seemingly with little consideration, whereas under the rule of Rother v. Monahan, supra, he "must be presumed to have had some interest in preventing such a redemption." This presumption should be conclusive for the reason, if no other, that the mortgagor is necessarily concerned in carrying out the policy of the law, declared in Martin v. Sprague, 29 Minn. 53, 56, 11 N. W. 143, 145, "to save the property of debtors from being sacrificed, and to enable debtors [54] to retain their property; or, if they shall fail to do so, then to secure its application, so far as may be, to the payment of the demands of creditors." To effect the latter purpose his interest extends beyond the expiration of his redemption period; for to make the two coterminous would be to deny him the right to seek the accomplishment of that end. As was said in the Rother case, it well may be that, though he has lost the right to redeem, he may have some advantageous arrangement with a particular creditor looking to the saving of the property or valuable rights therein, or else, it may be added, he may require protection from the effect of prior covenants. See Allis v. Foley, 126 Minn. 14, 147 N. W. 670. It may be that he can neither redeem nor make any advantageous arrangement during the year, but can thereafter secure valuable concessions from one creditor, though not from another. Should he then be deprived of the right, by tender, to eliminate the latter from the succession of redemptioners, thus removing an obstacle to the effectuation of his plans? Having an absolute right to make the tender, he should be accorded the unconditional right to avail himself of the benefit thereof, without the expense, delay, annoyance and uncertainty incident to litigation of an issue as to whether he will in fact be benefited, especially as against the creditor who has wrongfully refused such tender. Though he cannot, after expiration of his redemption period, be regarded as having any title whatever to the property, as former owner thereof he should be dealt with as leniently as possible and afforded every opportunity consistent with the rights of others to save what he can out of it, both for his own and his family's benefit. These considerations should certainly outweigh the claims of one asserting merely technical rights based upon a claim for money of which he will not be deprived by their denial.

The injustice, departure from the settled policy of the redemption law, and danger involved in the rule established by the majority opinion would be clearer if Sutton's mortgage had secured $50,000 instead of $50. Yet the court's reasoning would require the same holding in such case, including denial of the right of redemption to one who, under very recent decisions, unquestionably had an equitable lien upon the property and was thus strictly within the statutory [55] designation of those entitled to redeem, and who, in matter of procedure, was generally, if not technically, within the law.

Finally, neither Sutton nor Sauntry should be deprived of any right here claimed because of Torinus' acceptance of the money paid on Orr's redemption.

I think the order should be reversed.

HALLAM, J. (dissenting).—I dissent.

It is conceded that the redemption by plaintiffs was void; that when, after tender to them of the amount of their judgment, they persisted in using this judgment for the purpose of redeeming the land of their debtor from a sale on a prior lien, such use of the judgment was wholly in their own wrong, and that, upon demand of a party having a proper interest to conserve, the court would set aside the attempted redemption and compel the plaintiffs to accept the tender and satisfy their judgment. Mitchell, J., in Rother v. Monahan, 60 Minn. 186, 62 N. W. 263.

The position of the majority of the court is that none of the defendants are in a position to take advantage of the admitted invalidity of plaintiffs' redemption and that accordingly plaintiffs must get the land; that these defendants who are manifesting such intense interest in this litigation either have no interest in the subject matter at all, or else they have by their conduct precluded themselves from asserting their rights.

To this I do not agree. I am of the opinion that William and Lyman Sutton, by virtue of their interest in the certificate from which plaintiffs' redemption was made, are in a position to object to the use of this judgment by plaintiffs for the purpose of redemption.

The relation of these defendants to the property is undisputed. Torinus held the sheriff's certificate from which plaintiffs attempted to redeem. It is conceded that Torinus was not the sole beneficial owner of this certificate. The fact is that William Sutton and Lyman Sutton had undertaken the task of redeeming the property of their uncle William Sauntry from the foreclosure sale and from other subsequent liens. They set about to raise the money to purchase the [56] sheriff's certificate of sale then held by the Weyerhaeusers, and also what is known as the Franklin judgment. This required over $45,000, more money than they had. William Sutton furnished $15,800, Lyman Sutton $12,980. Torinus loaned them $7,500. He was to be repaid this amount in any event, and $10,000 if they got the property. They borrowed the balance in small amounts from various parties. These facts were undisputed, and the court was asked to so find, but declined to do so. The Suttons were the real beneficial owners of the sheriff's certificate from which plaintiffs undertook to redeem. This is virtually conceded.

It follows that the Suttons may challenge this redemption by plaintiffs, unless they have in some manner estopped or precluded themselves from exercising that right. There is no claim of estoppel in the proper sense of that term. They have done no act upon which plaintiffs have in any sense relied. The claim is that, under the doctrine of Willard v. Finnegan, 42 Minn. 476, 44 N. W. 476, 8 L.R.A. 50, Torinus, and all claiming under him, have waived their right to object to the plaintiffs' redemption. Referring to plaintiffs' brief on reargument, they say: "He (Torinus) cannot raise the question because he has accepted and retained the plaintiffs' money and has thereby waived all irregularity and invalidity in the redemption proceedings;" and again: "If Sutton was a joint owner with Torinus then the act of his joint owner (in whose name the certificate for convenience had been placed) in accepting and retaining the money of the plaintiffs certainly estopped him (Sutton) and the same result must necessarily and logically follow if Lewis E. Torinus was holder of the certificate as a sort of trustee." The alleged waiver or estoppel is predicated on these facts:

It is admitted that the money paid by plaintiffs to the sheriff was received by Torinus and turned over by him to William Sutton, and that William Sutton immediately used it for the purpose of an attempted subsequent redemption from plaintiffs under the $50 mortgage. The two Suttons were acting in unison, and the act of one doubtless bound both. This act, plaintiffs claim, cut the ground from under their feet and left them no standing to assail the invalidity of plaintiffs' redemption. Curiously enough, neither this alleged [57] waiver nor the facts out of which it is claimed it arose were pleaded by plaintiffs, either in the complaint or reply. Had the case been tried on the pleadings, plaintiffs' case must surely have failed. Evidence of the facts mentioned was, however, received without objection and the failure to plead is accordingly not of vital importance.

The fact is, William Sutton also claimed a lien under his $50 mortgage subsequent to plaintiffs', if plaintiffs had any lien at all, and under this alleged subsequent lien he claimed a right to effect a subsequent redemption. It turned out that neither plaintiffs nor William Sutton under this latter alleged lien had any legal right to redeem. William Sutton and the others interested in the Torinus certificate could have resisted the claim of plaintiffs to redeem. But William Sutton did not want to stand on this ground alone. No one claims he was obliged to. He wanted also to assert his own right to redeem under his own alleged later lien. What he did do in effect was to take $45,000 or more left with the sheriff by plaintiffs and immediately handed it back to plaintiffs with the amount of their judgment added. It was therefore used to restore to plaintiffs what they had paid out in making redemption under their lien, and for no other purpose.

The intervention of the sheriff in these redemptions was not important. He was a mere conduit. The effect was the same as though Sutton had received the money from plaintiffs in person and in person handed it back to plaintiffs. The majority opinion holds this conclusive evidence of a waiver of the indisputable right that Sutton then had to assert that plaintiffs' redemption was void. The consequence of holding this conclusive of a waiver is of great importance in this case. It means that the Suttons were under the necessity of either standing solely upon their claim of the insufficiency of plaintiffs' redemption, or else raising another $45,000 to place in the sheriff's hands to await the outcome of a determination of that question of right. Such a requirement was onerous. We may infer from the methods the Suttons were obliged to use, and the number of persons upon whom they were obliged to draw to raise the first $45,000, that they could never have raised another similar amount at all. Persons who redeem without any right, as plaintiffs did, [58] should not have it in their power to put a party, who of right owns property, to any such alternative. The Suttons might properly have said to plaintiffs: "Here is your money. If your redemption is wrongful you are entitled to your money back; if your redemption is valid, we still claim a right to redeem from you, and then you are entitled to the same amount plus the amount of your judgment lien. Here it is. It will serve no useful purpose to require us to go elsewhere and raise another $45,000 so as to leave with the sheriff for you two rolls of money, one for you to take if your redemption is valid, the other if it is void. It may be admitted there is some technical justification for such a proceeding. As a practical proposition, however, the placing of two such sums in the hands of the sheriff would simply impose on us a tremendous burden which would not benefit you. You could not have it all in any event. To require such a course would be to sacrifice substance to form."

Here is involved not the mere question of waiver of some technical formality in procedure, but the acquisition through an alleged waiver of the title to property of great value.

Waiver has been defined as "a technical doctrine introduced and applied by the courts for the purpose of defeating forfeitures." 40 Cyc. 254; Kiernan v. Dutchess County Mut. Ins. Co. 150 N. Y. 190, 196, 44 N. E. 698. Waivers, where they operate to dispense with merely formal requirements in judicial procedure and to defeat forfeitures, are, and should be, favored, but where the sole effect of a waiver is, not to defeat forfeiture, or dispense with formality, but to deprive a party of some substantial property rights without any substantial consideration, i. e., in fact to work a forfeiture, a waiver should not be favored and should not be extended by the application of merely technical rules. In such cases it should be necessary, to make a waiver effective, that the party claiming it should have been led to act upon the facts going to make up the waiver to his detriment. Bigelow, Estoppel (6th ed.) §§ 730, 731. Had the Suttons not taken this redemption money, their title to this property would be secure. I am not willing to hold that the defendant William Sutton, by the act of merely receiving this redemption money and immediately tendering it back to plaintiffs, passed the title and interest [59] of these parties to this valuable property to plaintiffs. No decided case has ever so held. In every case where the certificate holder has been held estopped, the record shows that he accepted and appropriated the money in such a way as to deprive the redemptioner of it.

Plaintiffs use the term "waiver" and I have done the same. This question is perhaps more properly a question of election than waiver. It is conceded that a man cannot ordinarily occupy inconsistent positions. By acceptance of benefits of a transaction he may bar himself from repudiating the transaction. Pederson v. Christofferson, 97 Minn. 491, 496, 106 N. W. 958. But the taking of one of two inconsistent positions will not always preclude the party taking it from later availing himself of the other, if no prejudice is done to anyone thereby. As to this, Mr. Bigelow, in his work on Estoppel, in treating the subject of "election and inconsistent positions generally" says: "However, the estoppel arising from accepting the benefits of a contract applies only when the party may accept or reject without serious inconvenience." This is an unquestioned rule as applied to contracts. Bigelow, Estoppel (7th ed.) p. 747; City of Cincinnati v. Cameron, 33 Ohio St. 336, 374; Zottman v. San Francisco, 20 Cal. 98, 81 Am. Dec. 96 (Field, C. J.); Potter v. Brown, 50 Mich. 436, 15 N. W. 540 (Cooley, J.); Black v. Dressell, 20 Kan. 153 (Brewer, J.). As said by Field, C. J., in 20 Cal. 107, 81 Am. Dec. 96, "the party must also be in a situation where he is entirely free to elect. . . . The mere retention and use of the benefit resulting from the work where no such power or freedom of election exists, or where the election cannot influence the conduct of the other party with reference to the work performed, does not constitute evidence of acceptance." The same principle is applicable here. Defendants Sutton in this case had no real freedom of choice. The statutes did not permit them to wait until the regularity of plaintiffs' redemption could be tested before making redemption under their claimed subsequent lien. They were obliged to act within five days. They could not, without serious inconvenience, which as a practical proposition probably amounted to impossibility, leave this large fund in the hands of the sheriff, and at the same time avail themselves of their right to make or attempt to make their subsequent [60] redemption. In my opinion they did not lose their right to question plaintiffs' void redemption by receiving from plaintiffs this money and forthwith offering to return it to them in the manner disclosed by the record in this case.

NOTE.

Effect of Tender of Amount Due on Judgment.

An unaccepted tender of the amount due on a judgment does not extinguish the judgment lien. People v. Beebe, 1 Barb. (N. Y.) 379; Jackson v. Law, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 248, affirmed in 9 Cow. 641; Ex p. Peru Iron Co. 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 540; Lincoln Sav. Bank v. Ewing, 12 Lea (Tenn.) 598. See also Rother v. Monahan, 60 Minn. 186, 62 N. W. 263. Thus, in Lincoln Sav. Bank v. Ewing, supra, the court said: "The case before us presents the question whether the lien of a judgment can be discharged by a tender which leaves the judgment itself in full force. . . . A judgment is the highest form of security for a debt, and the lien is made to inhere in it. Payment would seem to be, and so it has been held, the only act by which the defendant can discharge the lien. The doctrine of tender, strictly speaking, is not applicable; for a tender cannot be made after action commenced: Keith v. Smith, 1 Swan (Tenn.) 92. And the remedy of the debtor, if a tender be refused, is to apply to the court to restrain the sale, and enter satisfaction of the judgment by the money brought in: Jackson v. Law, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 248, affirmed 9 Cow. 641; Tinney v. Wolston, 41 Ill. 219; Freeman on Judgments, sec. 384. The reason is, says an eminent judge and professor, that a judgment, being a debt of record, is not discharged by a tender, as it is, in no case, the effect of a tender to discharge the debt. The judgment could only be extinguished by actual satisfaction. As long as it remains in force it must, by its very nature, as prescribed by statute, be a lien on the land. If its existence continue, it cannot be deprived of its ordinary and usual characteristics."

The holding of the reported case, that a tender of payment by the judgment debtor destroys the right of the judgment creditor to make the judgment the basis for a redemption, is supported by the following decisions. Rother v. Monahan, 60 Minn. 186, 62 N. W. 263; Roberts v. Meighen, 74 Minn. 273, 77 N. W. 139.

After a tender of the amount due on a judgment and a payment of the money into court, a sale made to enforce the judgment by execution is wrongful: Mason v. Sudam, 2 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 172, wherein the court said: "The master, as agent for the plaintiffs, had offered to the agent of the executors the amount of the execution and the fees before the sale, and that offer had been rejected. The subsequent sale was, therefore, entirely in their own wrong."

It has been held that a tender of the amount due on a judgment while an appeal from the judgment is pending, prevents the accrual of further interest. Ferrea v. Tubbs, 125 Cal. 687, 58 Pac. 308. And in other cases it has been recognized that a tender, properly made and kept good, stops interest. Rogers v. McDearmid, 7 N. H. 606; Jackson v. Law, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 248, affirmed 9 Cow. 641. In Shumaker v. Nichols, 6 Grat. (Va.) 592, wherein it did not appear that the money was not used after tender by the judgment debtor for his own purposes, the tender was held not to stop interest.

In Nesbit v. Martin, 4 Pa. Co. Ct. 95, affirmed 118 Pa. St. 138, 12 Atl. 442, 4 Am. St. Rep. 573, it was held that an unaccepted tender by a third person did not work an equitable assignment of the judgment. The court said: "Was Mr. Miller bound, either in law or equity, to receive the debt, interest and costs due on said judgment from the petitioners, and assign the judgment to them?

Was their tender and his refusal to receive the same and to make the assignment equivalent to a payment? Did this work an equitable assignment of the judgment in their favor? If we but consider that an execution on this judgment was in the hands of the sheriff, and that a sale of the defendant's real estate was advertised to take place that day, that these parties were strangers to the judgment, and that their tender was not made at the request or with the consent of the defendant, the proper answer to these questions will be suggested. Costs had accumulated on the execution in the hands and in the favor of the sheriff, and he had property levied upon out of which to make these costs, as well as the plaintiff's debt and interest. The plaintiff, by authority of law, had made the sheriff his agent to collect his debt and interest, and the costs that he, the sheriff, might be entitled to under the law, for the services thus rendered; and the plaintiff was not bound to receive the debt, interest and costs from a stranger and take upon himself the burden of becoming paymaster to the sheriff; neither was he bound to make the assignment in order to get his money. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the refusal of the plaintiff to receive the amount of the tender and make the assignment did not work an equitable assignment of the judgment in favor of the petitioners."

Where a tender is made and refused, the court may direct the money to be paid into court, and, when that is done, order the judgment to be satisfied. Campion v. Friedberg, 55 Ill. App. 450. See also Rother v. Monahan, 60 Minn. 186, 62 N. W. 263; Jackson v. Law, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 248, affirmed 9 Cow. 641. And it has been said that a tender is nugatory at law unless it is followed by a payment of the money into court and a motion to enter satisfaction on the record. Shumaker v. Nichols, 6 Grat. (Va.) 592.

v.

MEWHINNEY.

Utah Supreme Court—May 9, 1913.

43 Utah 135; 134 Pac. 632.

Criminal Law — Sufficiency of Record — Waiver of Rights.

The transcript of the proceedings before an examining magistrate, affirmatively showing that the defendant "waived the service of an attorney," shows that defendant was apprised of his right to such services.

Preliminary Examination — Presumption Supporting Acts of Magistrate.

In the absence of any showing to the contrary, it must be presumed that the examining magistrate performed the duty, imposed on him by statute, to warn one accused of crime of his right to the assistance of an attorney.

Waiver of Examination — Effect.

Const. art. 1, § 13, provides that offenses heretofore required to be prosecuted by indictment shall be prosecuted by information after examination and commitment by a magistrate, unless the examination be waived by accused, with the consent of the state. Comp. Laws 1907, § 4670, which was in force before the adoption of the constitution, provides that the testimony of each witness in cases of homicide must be reduced to writing as a deposition by the magistrate, or under his direction. Held that, where accused with the consent of the state waived the preliminary examination, he must be held to have waived the necessity of the magistrate's hearing any testimony as to the charge against him, so that there was no testimony to be heard or reduced to writing.

Jury — Finding on Challenge — Review.

Where it appears on error assigned to the refusal to sustain certain challenges for bias that the court might have found that the jurors challenged were fair, impartial, and conscientious men, the action of trial court in overruling the challenges will not be disturbed.

Procedure in Challenging.

Where 12 jurors are called and sworn on their voir dire and examined, and part of them excused for cause, and both the state and the defendant are required to exercise or waive their right to peremptorily challenge the jurors remaining in the jury box, leaving those not challenged to be sworn to try the case before any additional jurors should be called to take the place of those challenged and excused, the procedure is proper.

Remarks of Counsel — Prejudice.

Where counsel on a murder trial was given every opportunity to bring all the facts before the jury, and the court in sustaining an objection to a statement by the prosecuting attorney that, of the articles coming into the possession of the chief of police, a cap was the most important, remarked that the assumption implied something that was not of record and not evidence in the case, error, if any, in such remark is not prejudicial.

Evidence — Articles Taken from Accomplice.

In a prosecution for murder in the first degree, committed within and as a part of an attempted robbery, articles of wearing apparel and other articles found on or taken from defendant's accomplice after the attempted robbery are admissible.

Insanity as Defense—Presumption.

There is a legal presumption of sanity.

Test of Responsibility.

Where the evidence to establish defendant's insanity can be considered only to show general insanity, the test of responsibility is the capacity of the defendant to distinguish between right and wrong at the time of and with respect to the criminal act.

[See generally Ann. Cas. 1912A 36; 76 Am. St. Rep. 85.]

Same.

Where defendant committed murder to avoid apprehension and conviction for an attempted robbery, and relies upon insanity as a defense, the test of mental responsibility is not whether he was a confirmed thief and had not the will power to resist theft, but whether he had the mental capacity to distinguish between right and wrong with respect to the murder.

Instructions as to Insanity.

On a trial for murder, defended on the ground of insanity, where the evidence can be considered only to show general insanity, and the court properly defines the test thereof, its failure to enlarge upon different phases of insanity and mental weakness is not prejudicial to defendant.

Homicide — Conviction of Lower Degree — Degree Fixed by Statute.

A jury in any homicide case has the power, though not the legal or moral right, to disregard the evidence, and find one, who is clearly guilty of first degree murder, guilty of manslaughter, or acquit him.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

On a trial for murder, under an information framed upon the theory of a deliberate and premeditated murder, and under the statute providing that murder committed in an attempt to commit robbery is murder in the first degree without deliberation or premeditation, where the evidence requires a finding that the murder was committed in an attempt to rob, and the court submits the case upon each theory of the information, there is no error in refusing to charge as to second degree murder; since the statute defines the crime shown by the evidence to be first degree murder, and the court is not required to charge on second degree murder so as to empower the jury to disregard the evidence and return a verdict contrary to law.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

In such case, the court might have submitted the question of second degree murder without committing error against accused.

[See note at end of this case.]

Instructions — Request Not Based on Evidence — Intent of Accused.

On a trial for murder in the first degree, on the theory of its commission during an attempt to rob, where there is no evidence that defendant had voluntarily abandoned the attempted robbery before firing the fatal shot, an instruction that, if defendant had abandoned the intention to rob before he shot deceased, the killing would not have been in an attempt to rob, and unless wilful and premeditated, the killing would not have been murder in the first degree, is properly refused.

Character of Accused — Instruction Approved.

In an instruction, that when a person is charged with the commission of a crime the law presumes that he is a man of "average" character and that the failure to call witnesses to prove his general good character raises no presumption against it, the use of the word "average" in place of the usual adjective "good" is not prejudicial.

Recommendation of Mercy — Instructions Relating to Power of Jury.

In a trial for murder in the first degree, where the court, after calling attention to the statute enabling the jury to recommend life imprisonment in case they found defendant guilty of that degree of homicide, charged that in considering the question they were not restricted by any rule of law or public policy, but were entitled to decide the question from such considerations as might appeal to them, as reasonably entitled to be weighed in determining such recommendation, is not objectionable as in any way directing or controlling, or attempting to control or direct, the judgment of the jury on the question of recommendation.

Appeal from District Court, Salt Lake county: LOOFBOUROW, Judge.

Criminal action. Harley Mewhinney convicted of murder in first degree and appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

S. P. Armstrong and H. J. Brothers for appellant.

A. R. Barnes, E. V. Higgins and George C. Buckle for appellee.

[138] FRICK, J.—Appellant was charged with, and, upon a trial by a jury in the district court of Salt Lake county, convicted of, murder in the first degree. The court, in due time, entered judgment sentencing appellant to suffer death. He appeals from that judgment.

[139] Numerous errors are assigned. Before proceeding to a consideration of the assignments relating to the alleged errors occurring at the trial, we shall dispose of those which relate to the quashing of the information and the impaneling of the jury.

Counsel for appellant at the proper time interposed a motion to quash the information filed in the district court against him upon the grounds:

(1) That the magistrate before whom the original complaint was filed, and before whom appellant was taken after his arrest, did not inform or advise him "of his rights to the aid of counsel:" and (2) because "the testimony of the, or any of the, witnesses against him was not reduced to writing by the magistrate." The first ground is clearly untenable. The transcript of the proceedings before the magistrate affirmatively shows that the appellant "waived the service of an attorney." If this means anything, it means that appellant was apprised of his right to have such services.

In the absence of any showing to the contrary, we must presume that the magistrate performed the duties imposed upon him by our statute. Such is the holding of the courts. (People v. Figueroa, 134 Cal. 159, 66 Pac. 202.) In the case at bar, as we have pointed out, it, however, affirmatively appears that appellant waived any aid or assistance from counsel.

Referring, now, to the second ground of the motion, it is true that Comp. Laws 1907, section 4670, in terms provides that "the testimony of each witness in cases of homicide must be reduced to writing as a deposition, by the magistrate, or under his direction." This section in substantially the same form was in force long before Utah became a state. 2 Comp. Laws 1888, section 4883. It was carried into the Revised Statutes of 1898 as section 4670 of that revision and is now known by the same number in Comp. Laws 1907, supra. Since said section was originally passed the Constitution of this state was adopted where, in article 1, section 13, it, among other things, is provided:

[140] "Offenses heretofore required to be prosecuted by indictment, shall be prosecuted by information after examination and commitment by a magistrate, unless the examination be waived by the accused with the consent of the state, or by indictment with, or without such examination and commitment."

Although the language of section 4670, supra, is positive and without exception that in homicide cases the testimony of the witnesses must be reduced to writing, yet, in view of the constitutional provision that the accused with the consent of the state may waive the examination the statute cannot be given application according to the strict letter thereof. If the accused or the officer representing the state desires an examination to be held, then of course witnesses must be heard, and if they are heard their testimony must be reduced to writing as required by the statute. If, however, no examination is desired and is expressly or by implication waived, as held by us in State v. Gustaldi, 41 Utah 63, 123 Pac. 897, then there is no need of hearing any testimony, and hence there is none to be reduced to writing. In the case at bar the transcript of the proceedings had before the committing magistrate affirmatively shows that appellant, with the consent of the state, expressly waived the preliminary examination mentioned in the Constitution. This he could do, and, having done so, he likewise must be held to have waived the necessity of the magistrate to hear any testimony with respect to the charge filed against him. There was therefore no testimony to be reduced to writing. Nor can there be any doubt as to appellant's competency to waive the examination, nor as to having done so, since he does not assail the truth of the statements to that effect contained in the magistrate's transcript, as he could have done under the ruling of this court in State v. Gustaldi, supra. See also upon this point, State v. Ritty, 23 Ohio St. 562. The motion to quash, for the reasons aforesaid, was therefore properly overruled.

It is also insisted that the court erred in refusing to sustain certain challenges for cause that were interposed by appellant's [141] counsel against at least four prospective jurors upon the ground of both expressed and implied bias. It is accordingly urged that appellant was required to remove those jurors from the panel by the exercise of four peremptory challenges, which reduced by that number the quota of such challenges vouchsafed to him by our statute. We have carefully examined all of the testimony of those jurors given upon their voir dire, and we are satisfied that this case falls squarely within the rule laid down by this court upon this question in the recent case of State v. Thorne, 41 Utah 414, Ann. Cas. 1915D 90, 126 Pac. 286. The only difference between this and the Thorne Case is that, while there might have been some doubt in our minds with respect to the qualifications of some of the challenged jurors in the Thorne Case, there is no such doubt in this case. If there were, however, the rulings of the trial court fall squarely within what is said in the Thorne case, supra. Further, by carefully going over the jurors' examination, we are impressed with the fact that they were fair, impartial, and conscientious men, and the trial court was clearly justified in overruling the challenges. This contention, therefore, cannot be sustained.

It is further contended that the court erred in requiring appellant to exercise his peremptory challenges at times when the jury box was not filled with jurors. The jury was impaneled and the challenges were required to be exercised in the manner stated by Mr. Justice McCarty in State v. Riley, 41 Utah 225, 126 Pac. 294. We there held that the course of procedure followed in that case was proper. This case is therefore controlled by that one, and this assignment must also fail.

Passing to a consideration of the assignments relating to the alleged errors occurring at the trial, it becomes necessary to state as briefly as possible the controlling facts. From the evidence it is made to appear that the homicide in question occurred while appellant and an accomplice were engaged in the perpetration of or attempt to perpetrate a robbery. The undisputed facts relating to the homicide are substantially [142] as follows: On the afternoon of the 6th day of October, 1911, between three and four o'clock, a Mrs. Fuller, after meeting one Sol. S. Brown, a friend of hers, on the street in Salt Lake City, went with him to her room on the second floor of the Romona rooming house, which is located on the corner of Second East and Second South streets in said city. Mr. Brown wore a large and conspicuous diamond ring on one of his fingers of the approximate value of $350. In going upstairs to the room Mrs. Fuller noticed the appellant and his accomplice in the hallway. Within a few minutes after Mrs. Fuller and Mr. Brown had entered the room aforesaid, there was a knock at the door, and Mrs. Fuller went to open it. Upon opening the door she saw two men in the hallway (one of them the appellant) with handkerchiefs tied over the lower portions of their faces. As soon as she had opened the door, they forced their way into the room. One of the men had a revolver in his hand and immediately upon entering the room pointed it at Mr. Brown, and the other remained standing at the door, which he had closed after him. Mr. Brown at once went forward and grappled with the one having the revolver, catching his hand or forearm in such a manner as prevented him from shooting Mr. Brown, and a hard struggle ensued between them. Mr. Brown seemed to hold his own, and the man with the revolver, seemingly, could make no headway in obtaining the coveted prize, the ring. He called to his accomplice, who still stood guarding the door, for help, and said, "Pull the ring off his finger." The accomplice immediately left the door and went to the assistance of the other and in doing so struck Mr. Brown several times on the head with what is termed a "black-jack," inflicting scalp wounds which subsequently bled somewhat freely. The struggle now went on between the three, but as soon as the one had left the door Mrs. Fuller ran out of the room, down the hallway, and into the street crying for help as she went. Considerable uproar was thus caused, and it was not long before the man who had stood by the door also slipped out of the room, Mr. Brown and the other still continuing the [143] struggle for supremacy, while Mr. Brown was also crying for help. Immediately after the one with the black-jack had left the room Mr. Brown heard the steps of a man in the hallway approaching the door which was now standing ajar. The one with the revolver, who was still continuing the struggle and still trying to obtain the diamond ring, apparently also heard the steps of the approaching stranger, whose name it was afterwards learned was Erickson, and he then also broke away from Mr. Brown, who was becoming quite weak from the blows he had received on his head and the continued struggle, and ran out of the door into the hallway which led downstairs into the street. Immediately after getting outside of the door of the room in which the struggle took place, the one with the revolver was met by Mr. Erickson, who was coming to Brown's assistance, and as soon as he saw Mr. Erickson, and within a very few feet from the door, he raised his revolver and shot Mr. Erickson, the bullet penetrating his chest and passing through a portion of the heart. Mr. Erickson staggered back into a room near by and fell on the floor and in a few minutes thereafter expired from the effects of the bullet wound. Both of Brown's assailants had in the meantime run down the steps and had reached the street, where they separated. It was only a few minutes afterwards, however, when the one who had the revolver and who shot Erickson was apprehended on the street in front of the rooming house while in the act of inducing an expressman, whose express wagon he had climbed onto, to drive him hurriedly away from the place. He was immediately taken to the police station after he was apprehended as aforesaid. A short time after the arrest he was identified as the one with the revolver by both Mrs. Fuller and Mr. Brown, and was further identified as the one who did the shooting and as being the appellant in this case. The other one was apprehended later on the same day and was also identified by Mrs. Fuller and Mr. Brown as the one who was with appellant and the one who struck Mr. Brown with the blackjack. During the struggle in the room the handkerchiefs were torn [144] from the faces of the two men, and a full view of their features was thus obtained by both Mrs. Fuller and Mr. Brown. There is much other evidence respecting the identity of appellant and his accomplice which we need not refer to here. It must suffice to say that under the evidence no other conclusion is permissible than the one arrived at by the jury, namely, that the appellant is the one who had the revolver and who killed Mr. Erickson, and that the killing was done within and as a part of the res gestæ of the attempted robbery.

It is contended that the court erred in one of its rulings which it is said trenchied upon the province of the jury with respect to an important fact in the case. The matter arose during the progress of the trial and while counsel for appellant was cross-examining the chief of police, who was one of the state's witnesses. The witness had testified that at the time the appellant and his accomplice were brought to the police station some articles, including a cap, came into his possession, which it was shown were either taken from appellant's person when he was brought to the station or identified at the time as having been in his or his accomplice's possession at the time of the attempted robbery, or immediately thereafter. Appellant's counsel, Mr. Armstrong, on cross-examination, questioned the witness with regard to the articles aforesaid, and Mr. Farnsworth, the prosecuting attorney, interposed an objection to the method pursued by counsel. The record of the proceeding in this respect reads as follows:

"Q. So that you were not very careful in designating these different articles, about how they came into your possession? A. I was reasonably careful, as you see by the tags. Q. The important one, however, does not seem to be very well designated? A. Which is the important one? Q. The cap. Mr. Farnsworth: We object to counsel making any such assumption as that. The Court: The objection is sustained. It implies something that is not of record, not evidence in the case. Mr. Armstrong: Exception."

[145] The contention that in sustaining the foregoing objection, and in making the remark, the court invaded the province of the jury, seems to us untenable. In view that the record discloses that counsel were given every opportunity to lay all the facts before the jury, the matter seems somewhat trivial. While the objection was extremely technical, yet the supposed question to which the objection was sustained was, in its nature, an assumption of a fact by counsel rather than a question to the witness which he was expected to answer. It is very clear that no prejudicial error resulted or could result from the court's ruling, and this assignment must therefore be overruled.

The contention that the court erred in admitting in evidence the articles of wearing apparel and other articles found on or taken from appellant's accomplice after the attempted robbery is clearly without merit. Wharton, Crim. Ev. (10th Ed.) section 312, p. 610.

Counsel for appellant strenuously insist that the court erred in charging the jury upon the question of insanity. It may be said that appellant produced some evidence in support of his plea of insanity. It was contended at the trial, and is now insisted, that appellant had acquired the habit of using drugs, such as opium and morphine, and that their use affected his mental capacity. To establish that fact he produced in evidence the depositions of two witnesses of Terre Haute, Ind., one of whom testified that he was acquainted with appellant from 1900 to 1907 and that during that period of time appellant habitually used "both opium and morphine." When asked what effect the use of those drugs had upon appellant's mental condition as observed by the witness, he said:

"The use of drugs seemed to make him very thin and at times dull and stupid."

When pressed for further particulars with regard to the effect that the use of drugs had upon appellant's mind, the witness said:

"I am not aware of any specific facts and circumstances."

[146] The testimony of the other witness is substantially the same; the only difference being that the other one said that appellant used the drug for a period of about five years between 1900 and 1907. After the year 1907 the witnesses did not come in contact with appellant. Upon substantially the foregoing testimony the two witnesses were permitted to give their opinion with respect to the sanity of appellant, and they both testified that in their opinion appellant was insane, and that the insanity was caused through the use of drugs as aforesaid. It also was shown that when appellant was arrested he had some morphine on his person, and that he afterwards called for some, and that the city physician ordered the officers to permit him to have about two grains daily for some time after his arrest. In addition to the foregoing testimony respecting appellant's insanity and the use of drugs, a young doctor who had about three years' experience in the general practice as a physician, and without any further experience, was called as an expert upon the question of insanity. His conclusions regarding appellant's mental condition were mainly based upon the effect that the habitual use of opium or morphine usually has upon the mind. The doctor, however, did not testify from actual experience, as his answers to the following questions clearly indicate:

"Q. And of these alkaloids you say that morphine is the most active and the most detrimental to the faculties of the mind? A. I have read authorities stating that fact. Q. You don't state that of your own knowledge as a chemist or anything? A. No, sir; I could not do that. Q. Not from your own practical experience, but from your reading of it? A. Yes, sir."

Upon substantially the foregoing testimony the doctor was permitted to answer a hypothetical question which was propounded to him by appellant's counsel, in which the facts as testified to by the witnesses aforesaid, together with the effect that the use of drugs had on the mind and appellant's habits with regard to their use as disclosed by the evidence, and further that the robbery was attempted in broad daylight [147] in a well-tenanted apartment or rooming house, and a few other unimportant facts, were recited. The doctor in answering the question said that in his opinion appellant was insane when he attempted to commit the robbery and when he shot and killed the deceased, Erickson. Upon the part of the state there was abundant testimony to the effect that appellant's conduct and demeanor immediately after the shooting and since then were always normal and rational. A physician who had frequently observed him after the shooting also testified that he did not use morphine in excessive quantities, and did not have the appearance of one who did so, and that in his judgment appellant at the time of the commission of the offense was and ever since has been sane. Upon the question of insanity the court instructed the jury that, before they could find appellant guilty as charged in the information, they "must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt from all the evidence in the case that the defendant at the time of the perpetration of, or attempt to perpetrate, such robbery or burglary, had formed the intent to commit such robbery or burglary, and that he had the mental capacity to distinguish between right and wrong with reference to said robbery or burglary; and, if you should find from the evidence in this case that the defendant at the time in question had not the mental capacity to form an intent to perpetrate a robbery or burglary, then you cannot convict him of murder in the first degree." The court further instructed the jury upon this question, that: "The test of responsibility for a criminal act, when insanity is relied upon as a defense, is the capacity of the defendant to distinguish between right and wrong at the time of and with respect to the act which is the subject of inquiry; and, if after a fair and conscientious consideration of all the facts and circumstances in evidence you are not satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant had the capacity to distinguish between right and wrong at the time of and with reference to the act in question, then you cannot convict him." The same thought in other forms was repeated in several of the instructions.

[148] It is insisted that the capacity to distinguish between right and wrong with respect to the criminal act in issue is not the true test of mental responsibility. It is contended that, in addition to that test, the jury should also be told that they must find that the accused had the will power to overcome or resist the impulse to commit the act with which he stands charged. Let us assume at the outset that, under certain circumstances where a plea of insanity is interposed as a defense, it may become necessary to charge the jury as contended for by counsel, and that in all cases where such a plea is interposed it would be unobjectionable although not necessary to do so. And let us assume further that in this case it would not have been at all improper for the court in its charge to have gone further into the question of insanity along the lines suggested by counsel. The foregoing assumptions are, however, not decisive of the question we are called upon to determine. In reviewing a charge upon any particular subject, as well as in reviewing the requests refused, we must constantly keep in mind the facts and circumstances of the particular case as they are made to appear from the evidence. What meager evidence of insanity there is in this case is limited entirely to generalities. The whole superstructure of the so-called insanity claim is built upon the statements of two laymen, who, for some years prior to 1907 (three years before the murder in question was committed), were acquainted with the appellant, and who testified that during that time—that is, during the time they knew him—he was addicted to the use of morphine and that the use thereof “at times made him dull and stupid.” Basing their opinions upon these meager facts, the two laymen tell us that the appellant was insane. In addition to their opinions, we also have a young doctor, who, after having the foregoing evidence detailed to him, also is willing to venture the opinion that the appellant was insane. There is absolutely no evidence of any actual mental lesions or any mental disease of any kind or of any hallucinations or other mental derangement.

[140] All that we have here, therefore, to establish insanity and to overcome the legal presumption of sanity, are a few general guesses based upon a few isolated facts which in and of themselves do not necessarily point to either insanity or to any serious mental derangement.

If the evidence in this case, therefore, is considered for the purpose of raising a doubt of the sanity of appellant, it can be considered for no other purpose except to show what may be called simple or general insanity. The existence of mental lesion, disease, or other aberration cannot be assumed or inferred, because there is absolutely no evidence to support such an inference. Under such circumstances, the test of responsibility that is applied by the overwhelming weight of authority is substantially the one given by the district court in this case in its charge to the jury. That test is thoroughly discussed by the authors of the following works: 1 Wharton, Crim. Law (10th ed.) sections 50-55; Wharton on Homicide (3d ed.) sections 537, 539; 1 Wharton & S. Med. Jur. section 175, and cases there cited. See also People v. Calton, 5 Utah 458-460, 16 Pac. 902; 3 Thompson on Trials (2d ed.) sections 536-541, where the test is approved.

We need not pause here to go over the reasons why the test is deemed a proper and a practical one except in those cases where the evidence discloses some special mental weakness, disease, delusion, or aberration. That the test in a case like the one presented by this record is the proper one impresses us as clearly sound, and this impression is not weakened after considering counsel's argument advanced in behalf of their contention. They, in effect, argue that if appellant was controlled by an irresistible impulse to commit the robbery—that is, if he did not have the will power to resist the temptation or impulse to rob or steal—then he should be acquitted, although he possessed the mental capacity to distinguish between right and wrong with respect to the homicide. This, in our judgment, is neither good law nor good sense. Suppose A. is charged with the murder of B., which is committed because [150] he is detected by B. while he was in the act of committing a robbery or larceny. Upon being tried for the murder, A., however, establishes by indubitable proof that for a long time prior to the commission of the larceny he was a confirmed kleptomaniac; that is, that he was afflicted with that species of insanity which manifests itself in an irresistible impulse or desire to steal, and that he lacked the will power to control or overcome the impulse. Would this proof be sufficient to excuse the homicide? We think not. In the assumed case A. committed murder for precisely the same reason that appellant killed Erickson, namely, to avoid apprehension and possible conviction for the attempted robbery. Under such circumstances, the test of mental responsibility, therefore, is not whether the accused is a confirmed thief and has not the will power to resist theft, but it is whether he had the mental capacity to distinguish between right and wrong with respect to the act with which he is charged, in this case murder. According to counsel's theory, although the accused may have had ample mental capacity to realize that it was wrong to kill, yet, if he was afflicted with an irresistible impulse to steal, he ought to have been acquitted of both crimes. This, in effect, would be an inducement to every thief to slay every one who discovered a theft committed by him.

There is nothing in the evidence in this case which would have justified the jury in finding that appellant was afflicted with any mental lesion, disease, or weakness, and hence it was not necessary to go into those matters in the charge in charging upon the general subject of insanity. To hold, therefore, that the court should have charged as contended by counsel, and that the refusal of the court to do so constitutes prejudicial error, is to disregard the evidence and the reasons which require such a charge, and further requires us to assume facts and conditions not directly testified to by any one nor legitimately deducible from any facts and circumstances that were testified to. The court, in our judgment, in submitting the question of general insanity [151] to the jury, clearly safeguarded all of appellant's rights in that regard.

We repeat that the question here is not the abstract one whether the court could not have properly enlarged upon the different phases of insanity or mental weakness, but the question we have to meet is whether the evidence required the court to so enlarge upon those subjects, and whether in having failed to do so the appellant was prejudiced. We are clearly of the opinion that the appellant was not prejudiced, and that the judgment, therefore, should not be reversed upon this ground.

When the cases cited by counsel upon this question are analyzed, it will be found that in all of them there were some facts and circumstances which made the doctrine contended for by them applicable to some extent at least. It must be conceded, however, that there are a few cases which seem to hold that the doctrine is applicable upon a mere general claim of insanity as was the case in the case at bar. We cannot yield assent to such a doctrine.

It is further insisted that the court erred in refusing to charge the jury with respect to second degree murder. This question, like the one of insanity, must of necessity, to a large extent at least, be controlled by our statute when considered in connection with the evidence adduced at the trial. In this connection it is contended that inasmuch as the information was framed upon the theory of a deliberate and premeditated murder and in view that the court submitted the case to the jury upon that theory as well as upon the statute which provides that murder "committed in the perpetration of or attempt to perpetrate robbery" also constitutes murder in the first degree without deliberation or premeditation, therefore the court should also have submitted the question of second degree murder to the jury. It is true that the court submitted the elements of deliberation and premeditation to the jury. From that it does not follow, however, as contended, that the court should also have submitted the question of an unpremeditated or second degree murder to the jury. Where [152] there was some evidence in this case from which the jury could have found a deliberate and premeditated murder, yet the jury would not have been justified in finding that the murder in question was not committed in an attempt to perpetrate a robbery, and upon the latter question there is not even room for doubt or conflict. Under our statute a murder so committed constitutes murder in the first degree and legally can constitute nothing else. True, a jury in any homicide case has the power to disregard the evidence and may find one who is clearly guilty of first degree murder guilty of manslaughter or acquit him.

From this it is assumed that, because a jury may do this, therefore a court must submit all the degrees of murder, and thus give the jury the right to pass upon the several degrees of murder. This contention loses sight of the legal principle involved in the statute just referred to which does not segregate murder committed in the perpetration of or attempt to perpetrate a robbery into degrees. While it is true that under our jurisprudence a jury has the power, with or without reason, either to reduce the degree of the crime, if it be divided into degrees, or acquit the accused, it does not follow that a court is bound in effect to charge that they may disregard the law, the evidence, and their oath in arriving at a verdict. Neither is it correct to say that, by not submitting the question of second degree murder in a case where the killing was perpetrated in an attempt to rob, the court thereby in effect coerces the jury to find the accused guilty of murder in the higher degree. Whether such might be the effect under our statute depends upon the evidence. If the evidence justifies a finding that the murder was committed in the perpetration of or attempt to perpetrate a robbery, it is the duty of the court to charge that, if they find beyond a reasonable doubt that the murder was "committed in the perpetration of or attempt to perpetrate a robbery," they should find the accused guilty of first degree murder, and if the evidence, as in the case at bar, does not justify the jury under their oaths to find otherwise, the court need not submit the question [153] of second degree murder at all, although it might do so without committing error against the accused. In such a case, in merely charging on first degree murder the court does not, as is contended, withhold anything from the jury, but simply charges the law. It is the law that fixes the degree of the offense, and when the facts are not in dispute and clearly show that the murder in question was committed as aforesaid, the jury have neither the legal nor a moral right to refuse to follow the law and in refusing to do so in effect amend or repeal the statute.

Of course, if the jury refuses to be bound by either law or fact, a court is powerless, but the court is not required to partake of the wrong and in effect suggest to the jury that they may do what the law does not sanction. Here again the question is not whether it would have been improper for the court to have charged with regard to murder in the second degree, but the question is whether under all the facts and circumstances of this case (not some other case) the trial court committed prejudicial error in refusing to so charge. Upon this question we are of the opinion that there was absolutely no evidence either direct or inferential which would have justified a finding by the jury other than that the murder in question was committed in an attempt to perpetrate a robbery. If this be correct, why submit a question to the jury upon which an affirmative finding can in no event be justified? Is not the question of whether there is any evidence in support of any essential fact as much a question of law in a homicide case as any other? Must the court in advance abdicate its prerogatives to the jury simply because that jury has the power, and perhaps the inclination, to disregard both law and fact? In this case the jury, however, followed the law, and in passing upon the facts observed their oath, and hence fully discharged their duty. Further, the case was fairly and impartially tried. What plausible reason, therefore, can an appellate court give for interfering with the verdict and judgment? Again, this case in principle is not distinguishable from State v. Thorne, supra, in which we held that [154] under a similar state of facts the court committed no error in refusing to charge on second degree murder.

In passing this point we desire to say that a trial court should, in every case where there is any direct or inferential evidence with respect to the different degrees of murder, charge the jury with regard to all the degrees, and this rule should be followed where there may be any doubt with regard to whether the higher degree is established or not. This is contemplated by our statute which divides crimes into degrees and which requires the jury to find in the lesser degree in case of doubt. That statute should, however, not be given controlling effect in a case of murder committed in the perpetration of or attempt to perpetrate robbery, because a murder so committed is not divisible into degrees. In such a charge of murder the killing was either committed in the perpetration of or attempt to perpetrate robbery or it was not. If the evidence, as in the case at bar, is clear and undisputed that it was, then the murder is first degree murder and nothing else, and the mere fact that the jury has the power to ignore the evidence and find otherwise does not change the law. In this case the jury was by force of the evidence compelled under their oaths to find that the murder was committed in an attempt to perpetrate robbery. By authority of what law or system of logic could they also legally have found that it was not so committed? If they could not have so found without ignoring both law and fact, no prejudicial error could have been committed in not telling them that they might do so.

The following cases are based upon a statute like ours with respect to murder, and it is accordingly held that, if the jury find that the murder was committed in the perpetration of or attempt to perpetrate a robbery, they have no alternative save to find the perpetrator guilty of murder in the first degree: State v. Gray, 19 Nev. 212-218, 8 Pac. 456; State v. Williams, 28 Nev. 407, 82 Pac. 353, and cases there cited. See also People v. Wardrip, 141 Cal. 229, 74 Pac. 744. Some of the very cases that counsel cite to sustain their contention that the court should have charged the jury with respect [155] to second degree murder hold directly to the contrary. For example, in Davis v. U. S., 165 U. S. at pages 378 and 379, 17 S. Ct. at page 362, 41 U. S. (L. ed.) 750, Mr. Justice Brewer, in referring to the question now under consideration, said:

"There was no testimony to reduce the offense, if any there was, below the grade of murder. If the defendant was sane and responsible for his actions, there was nothing upon which any suggestion of any inferior degree of homicide could be made, and therefore the court was under no obligation (indeed, it would simply have been confusing the minds of the jury) to give any instruction upon a matter which was not really open for their consideration."

So here: If the jury believed that the appellant fired the fatal shot and that he was mentally responsible, then they had no choice, and it was their sworn duty to find him guilty of murder in the first degree.

It is also contended that the court erred in refusing to charge the jury that, if appellant had abandoned the intention to rob before he shot Erickson, then the killing would not have been committed in an attempt to rob, and therefore, unless it was a "willful, deliberate, malicious, and premeditated killing," the killing would not have been murder in the first degree. The court properly refused to so charge, if for no other reason than that there was no evidence whatever that appellant had voluntarily abandoned the attempted robbery before he fired the fatal shot. Indeed, the only evidence upon the question is inferential, and that is directly contrary to such a claim. Upon this question the cases last above cited are decisive against counsel's contention.

Counsel for appellant requested the court to charge the jury that one who is charged with a criminal offense is presumed to have a "good character and reputation." The court refused the request in the language proposed, but charged the jury upon that subject as follows:

"When a person is charged with the commission of a crime, the law presumes that he is a man of average character, [156] and the failure to call witnesses to prove his general good character raises no presumption against it."

It is now insisted that the court erred in giving the charge aforesaid and in refusing the proffered one. It is contended that the error consists in using the qualifying adjective "average" instead of "good" in defining the presumption with respect to character. It is true that the adjective usually used is "good." Many authorities are, however, to the effect that the law presumes one accused of crime to be possessed of a fair, or ordinarily fair, character. In the case of Mullen v. U. S. 106 Fed. 894, 46 C. C. A. 24, cited by appellant's counsel on this point, in referring to the presumption now under consideration, it is said:

"It is in consonance with the general principle of law that a man is presumed to stand ordinarily well, and to have at least the average qualities of morality and good conduct."

In People v. Fair, 43 Cal. at page 149, Mr. Justice Wallace says that the law presumes every one possessed with a "character of ordinary fairness." To the same effect is 1. Bish. Crim. Proc. (3d ed.) section 1112; and Underhill, Crim. Ev. section 76. While perhaps it would have been better if the court had used the phrase "good character," yet, in view of all that the court said in the instruction, the jury could not have been misled by the use of the word "average." It seems clear to us that the appellant could not have been prejudiced from anything said or omitted, and therefore this contention cannot prevail.

Finally it is contended that the court erred in its charge to the jury with respect to their right to recommend life imprisonment in case they found appellant guilty of murder in the first degree. The court, in calling attention to the statute upon that subject which confers the right upon the jury to recommend life imprisonment in case they find appellant guilty of first degree murder, charged as follows:

"In considering this question you are not restricted by any rule of law or public policy, but are entitled to decide the question from such considerations as may appeal to you as [157] reasonably and conscientiously entitled to be weighed in determining the giving or withholding of such recommendation."

It is contended that this charge is open to the same objection as the one which we condemned in the case of State v. Thorne. 39 Utah 208, 117 Pac. 58. This contention is not tenable. The court in this case in no way did, nor attempted to, direct or control the judgment of the jury in arriving at a conclusion upon the question of recommendation. That is what was attempted in the Thorne Case, and it was that attempt which we condemned. While the trial courts discharge their full duty under the statute when they direct the attention of the jury thereto, and that thereunder it is their province to make or withhold a recommendation of imprisonment for life in case they find the accused guilty of murder in the first degree, yet the mere fact that a court may say what is said in the instruction in this case cannot have the effect of avoiding the verdict and the judgment based thereon. To so hold would amount to a mere travesty.

In conclusion we desire to say that after a careful examination of the entire record we cannot avoid the conclusion that the appellant has had a full, fair, and impartial trial. Moreover, all of his rights have been carefully safeguarded at all stages of the trial by vigilant and able counsel, who, although acting without any reward or compensation, have manifested a most commendable interest in the prisoner's behalf.

The judgment should be, and it accordingly is, affirmed.

MCCARTY, C. J.—I fully concur in the reasoning of and the conclusions reached by Mr. Justice Frick in the foregoing opinion. In view of the importance of the case I am impelled to make the following additional observations:

The information charges, without referring to the burglary or robbery, that the defendant "willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, deliberately, premeditatedly of his malice aforethought, and with a specific intent to take the life of the [158] said C. L. Erickson," shot and killed him. Second degree murder is included in the charge as alleged. But the evidence without conflict shows, that at the time defendant fired the fatal shot he was perpetrating a burglary. (Comp. Laws 1907, section 4336) and attempting to perpetrate a robbery. The evidence also shows that the burglary, attempted robbery, and homicide were so connected and interwoven, each one with the other two, that they constituted one transaction. Comp. Laws 1907, section 4161, provides, among other things, that murder when "committed in the perpetration of, or attempted to perpetrate, any . . . burglary, or robbery, . . . is murder in the first degree." The killing of Erickson was, therefore, under the circumstances as shown by the undisputed evidence, murder in the first degree, unless the defendant was, at the time he fired the fatal shot, insane. Upon this point, as the record now stands, there is no room for doubt. The question upon which there seems to be a difference of opinion is as to whether second degree murder is included in a homicide committed in the perpetration of or attempt to perpetrate a burglary or robbery. In all classes and kinds of intentional murder in which the crime is divided into degrees, the element that distinguishes first degree murder from murder in the second degree is the "premeditation and deliberation with which first degree murder is committed." (2 Bish. Crim. L. (7th ed.) section 728; 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 157; 21 Cyc. 728.) Under section 4161, supra, murder committed in the perpetration of any of the felonies therein enumerated is murder in the first degree, regardless of whether the killing is premeditated and deliberate, or even intentional. The killing may be accidental, but it nevertheless is murder in the first degree. (State v. Thorne, 39 Utah 208, 117 Pac. 58.)

I am unable to conceive of a state of facts or circumstances, and certainly none has been suggested, under which a murder committed in the perpetration of or attempt to perpetrate any of the felonies mentioned in section 4161, supra, would or could be less than murder in the first degree. As I have stated, the elements of first degree murder, [159] namely, premeditation and deliberation, that distinguishes first degree murder from second degree murder, are not essential, when the crime is committed in the perpetration of or attempt to perpetrate any one or more of the felonies referred to, to make the crime murder in the first degree. (21 Cyc. 719-723; 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 167; State v. Thorne, 39 Utah 208, 117 Pac. 58.) The reason for the rule is well stated by the Supreme Court of California in the case of People v. Milton, 145 Cal. 169, 78 Pac. 549, as follows:

"In this (referring to the class of murder committed in the perpetration of or attempt to perpetrate arson, rape, robbery, or burglary) the law has said to the malefactor: 'If in your perpetration of or attempt to perpetrate arson, rape, robbery, burglary, or mayhem you shall take the life of a fellow being, intentionally or unintentionally, your crime is murder in the first degree. The killing may be willful, deliberate, and premeditated, or it may be absolutely accidental. In either case, you are equally guilty. The elements of willfulness, deliberation, and premeditation are not indispensable to your crime. The murder, under section 187 of the Penal Code, is established; in that the killing is unlawful, it having been perpetrated in the performance or attempt to perform one of these felonies, and the malice of the abandoned and malignant heart is shown from the very nature of the crime you are attempting to commit. Therefore, if in perpetrating arson, although in the belief that the building is unoccupied, some person within the building, unknown to you, shall lose his life, you are guilty of murder in the first degree. Or if in burglariously entering premises which you believe to be unoccupied you shall accidentally take the life of one whose presence is unsuspected by you, still your crime is murder in the first degree.' That such is the true meaning and construction of our statute there can be no doubt."

(State v. Thorne, 41 Utah 414, Ann. Cas. 1915D 90, 126 Pac. 286; Morgan v. State, 51 Neb. 672, 71 N. W. 788; State v. Young, 67 N. J. L. 224, 51 Atl. 939.)

Counsel for appellant, proceeding upon the theory that second degree murder is necessarily included in a homicide committed in the perpetration of or attempt to perpetrate any of the felonies enumerated in section 4161, supra, argues that in a prosecution for such murder it is the province of the jury, under section 4892, if the defendant is found guilty, to determine whether he is guilty of first degree [160] or second degree murder. The section referred to reads as follows:

"Whenever a crime is distinguished into degrees, the jury, if they convict the defendant, must find the degree of the crime of which he is guilty."

The difficulty with counsel's position is that under the plain provisions of section 4161 murder committed in the perpetration of or attempt to perpetrate any felony mentioned therein is first degree murder only, and that section 4892 has no application. As I have suggested, there is no conceivable state of facts or circumstances under which this class of murder can be anything less than murder in the first degree. For illustration, take a case in which an incendiary, believing that a certain building is uninhabited and unoccupied, willfully and maliciously applies the torch to it, and after the structure is enveloped in flames he discovers that it is occupied by a human being who is unable to make his escape therefrom, and the incendiary makes every effort in his power to rescue such party but is unable to do so. Under such circumstances the killing would be murder in the first degree. I think it is plain that in a homicide belonging to this class there is no line of demarcation that distinguishes it into degree. If it may be separated into different degrees, where is the line to be drawn, between the first and second degree? Is it second degree murder when it appears from the evidence that the defendant in the commission of or attempt to commit one or more of the felonies mentioned had no specific intent to take human life and that the killing was wholly accidental? The question is answered by the statute which declares that the killing of a human being even under such circumstances is murder in the first degree.

The Texas Court of Appeals, in construing a statute containing provisions which are substantially the same as sections 4161 and 4892, supra, said:

"The statute, and the decisions construing that statute, have not yet laid down the proposition that the accused firing at the intended victim in cases of robbery and killing another party would reduce that killing to murder in the second degree. The shooting would still be murder in the first degree, because the statute expressly [161] says that all murder in robbery or in the perpetration of robbery would be murder in the first degree. This statute eliminates murder in the second degree in homicides of this character." (Italics mine.) (Milo v. State, 59 Tex. Crim. 196, 127 S. W. 1025.)

True the jury have the power in this class of homicides to find the accused guilty of any of the lower degrees necessarily included in the charge set forth in the information, or to acquit him. They may do this even though it is conclusively shown by the evidence that he is guilty of murder in the first degree and there is no evidence tending to reduce the crime to a lower degree. But it does not follow that because a jury have the power to ignore the evidence, and, in violation of their oaths, to bring about a miscarriage of justice by refusing to do their duty, the court should in its instructions authorize and in a sense invite them to do so.

I am clearly of the opinion that in this case the court did not err in refusing to instruct the jury on the question of murder in the second degree. As I read the record and understand the law applicable thereto, second degree murder is not in this case. The defendant, under the undisputed evidence, is guilty of murder in the first degree or he is not guilty at all of the crime of which he stands convicted. (State v. Thorne, supra.)

Under section 4336 all that was necessary for the state to prove in order to establish first degree murder was that defendant, while he was perpetrating or attempting to perpetrate burglary or robbery, shot and killed Erickson, and the question of whether the killing was deliberate, premeditated, and with malice aforethought, or whether it was unintentional on the part of defendant, was immaterial. The court, by charging the jury that before the defendant could be convicted of murder in the first degree the state must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the killing was deliberate, premeditated, with malice aforethought, and with the "specific intent to take the life of said C. L. Erickson," imposed upon the state a greater burden to prove first degree [162] murder than the law applicable to the facts required. In other words, the instruction, notwithstanding the evidence conclusively shows that the homicide was committed in the perpetration of burglary and attempted robbery, required the jury, before they could legally convict the defendant of murder in the first degree, to find from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the killing was willful, deliberate, premeditated, and with malice aforethought. The charge, in this regard, was therefore much more favorable to the defendant than the law and the facts warranted. The contention seems to be that because the court erroneously instructed the jury that in order to convict the defendant of murder in the first degree they must find from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the fatal shot was fired willfully, deliberately, premeditatedly, with malice aforethought, and with the specific intent to take the life of Erickson, the court should have committed further error favorable to the defendant and to the prejudice of the state by submitting to the jury the question of second degree murder.

Moreover, as I read and construe section 4161, an instruction on the question of second degree murder would, in effect, have withdrawn from the consideration of the jury the question of whether the homicide was committed in the perpetration of burglary and attempted robbery. The court could not have submitted the question of second degree murder without in effect annulling the statute. It sometimes happens that the rapist, burglar, robber, and incendiary, in perpetrating or attempting to perpetrate one or more of the felonies mentioned in section 4161, kills, without any specific intent so to do, a human being. The killing, as a matter of fact, may be wholly accidental. In such case the killing is not deliberate nor premeditated, but is, nevertheless, murder in the first degree. Take for example a case such as I have suggested in which the court, in defining murder in the first degree, charges the jury in the language of the statute, namely, that "every murder . . . committed in the perpetration of or attempt to perpetrate [163] any rape, arson, burglary, or robbery, . . . is murder in the first degree." It must be conceded that, if the statute is to be given any effect whatever, such instruction correctly defines murder of the first degree when the homicide is committed in the perpetration of or attempt to perpetrate any of the felonies mentioned therein. Now it is apparent that should the court, after giving the instruction suggested, proceed to define second degree murder, it must repeat the language of the statute down to and including the words "in the" and then substitute the words "second degree" for the words "first degree" which would, in effect, annul the statute, and, as I have stated, take from the jury the question of first degree murder.

It is suggested that there is evidence tending to show that defendant was addicted to the use of morphine or opium, and that the use of such drugs had weakened and impaired his mental faculties to such an extent as to render him incapable of deliberation and premeditation, or of forming a design to kill, thereby reducing the crime from first degree to second degree murder. The court carefully and elaborately charged the jury on the question of insanity, and the defendant's rights in that regard were carefully guarded. Upon that issue the court instructed the jury in part as follows: "An insane person is not criminally responsible under the law for his acts. The words 'insane person' include . . . distracted persons and persons of unsound mind. . . . When evidence is introduced tending to prove insanity sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt of defendant's sanity at the time of the commission of the act, then the presumption of sanity ceases, and the prosecution is bound to prove the sanity of the accused beyond a reasonable doubt. So in this case, if the jury, after considering all the evidence, entertain a reasonable doubt of the sanity of the defendant at the time of the alleged offense, then he must be acquitted. . . . When the evidence is completed, and the case finally submitted to you, the defendant cannot be convicted of any crime unless from all the evidence in the case, taken together, you are satisfied, beyond a reasonable doubt, [164] that the defendant was sane at the time the act in question was committed." (Italics mine.) "You are instructed that if you are not satisfied from a careful and conscientious consideration of all the evidence in the case, beyond a reasonable doubt, that at the time of the commission of the act charged the defendant knew right from wrong with respect to said act, then you cannot find him guilty of any crime; and so far as this case is concerned it is not material what caused such insanity."

Assuming, for the sake of the argument, that the defendant, without either deliberation or premeditation, and without forming a design or intent to take human life, fired the fatal shot that killed Erickson—and we may go a step farther and assume that the weapon was accidentally discharged—the killing, nevertheless, was, under the statute, murder in the first degree, unless the defendant, at the time he fired the shot, was insane. Of course, if he were insane he could not legally be convicted of any crime. The jury, however, found against the defendant on the question of insanity.

I have examined the record in this case with more than ordinary care and am forced to the conclusion that the defendant had a fair and impartial trial and that he was properly convicted.

STRAUP, J. (dissenting).—Our statute (Comp. Laws 1907, section 4169) defines murder to be "the unlawful killing of a human being with malice aforethought." Section 4161 defines the degrees of murder. It is:

"Every murder perpetrated by poison, lying in wait, or any other kind of willful, deliberate, malicious, and premeditated killing; or committed in the perpetration of, or attempt to perpetrate, any arson, rape, burglary, or robbery; or perpetrated from a premeditated design unlawfully and maliciously to effect the death of any human being other than him who is killed; or perpetrated by any act greatly dangerous to the lives of others and evidencing a depraved [165] mind, regardless of human life, is murder in the first degree. Any other homicide committed under such circumstances as would have constituted murder at common law is murder in the second degree."

The information charged first degree murder thus: That the defendant "willfully, unlawfully, feloniously, deliberately, premeditatedly, of his malice aforethought, and with the specific intent to take the life of the" deceased, shot and killed him. The facts are referred to by Mr. Justice Frick. The state, as it had the right to do, went to the jury on two theories: One that the defendant in the commission of, or attempt to commit, a robbery, shot and killed the deceased; the other, that the defendant willfully, maliciously, deliberately, and premeditatedly, and as specific intent to take the life of the deceased, and as specifically alleged in the information, shot and killed him. There is ample evidence to support both. The court submitted the case on both and in such respect charged that, if the jury found that the defendant in the commission of or attempt to commit a robbery or burglary shot and killed the deceased, that constituted first degree murder. It further charged that "every murder perpetrated by poison, lying in wait, or any other kind of willful, deliberate, malicious and premeditated killing," was also first degree murder. The court in such particular and at some length charged what was meant by the terms "willful," "deliberate," and "premeditated." It then charged that, before the defendant could be convicted of murder in the first degree, the state must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that "the killing was unlawful;" that it was "deliberate;" that it was "premeditated;" that it was "with malice aforethought;" and that it "was with the specific intent to take the life of" the deceased.

The defendant's theory was that by the habitual and excessive use of morphine and other drugs his mental faculties were impaired to such an extent as to render him (1) wholly irresponsible for his acts; or (2) incapable of deliberation and premeditation, or of forming or entertaining a design or an intent to kill or rob. Conforming to the first, [166] he requested the court to charge that if the jury found that the defendant, because of an habitual use of such drugs, had become wholly irresponsible for his acts, they should acquit him; conformably to the second, that if the jury found "that the defendant was intoxicated by the use of morphine or other drugs at the time of the killing, you may take that fact into consideration in determining his condition of mind, though such intoxication may have been voluntary," that "in this case, if you believe from a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant was addicted to the use of morphine or opium or both, and by reason of the continued and habitual use of either or both of such drugs was brought or left in such weakened mental condition that he was incapable of deliberation and premeditation, as defined in these instructions, he is not guilty of murder in the first degree." The defendant also requested the court to define murder in the second degree and to submit such questions to the jury. The court refused to give these requests.

Notwithstanding the charge, that before the jury could convict the defendant of first degree murder the state was required to prove that the killing was unlawful, willful, deliberate, premeditated, with malice aforethought, and with the specific intent to take the life of the deceased, the court, nevertheless, refused to submit to the jury the question of second degree murder; and, by the charge, bound the jury to convict the defendant of first degree murder, or to find him not guilty. The court submitted to the jury the question of the defendant's insanity or irresponsibility, but with the direction that, "before the defendant can be convicted of murder in the first degree upon the theory" that the deceased "was killed by the defendant while the defendant was engaged in the perpetration of or attempt to perpetrate a robbery or burglary, you must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, from all the evidence in the case, that the defendant, at the time of the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate said robbery or burglary, had formed the intent to commit said robbery or burglary, and that he had the mental capacity to distinguish between right and wrong with reference [167] to said robbery or burglary; and, if you should find from the evidence that the defendant at the time in question had not the mental capacity to form an intent to perpetrate a robbery or burglary, then you cannot convict him of murder in the first degree." The court then, after charging on burden of proof as to the issue of insanity, charged that "the test of responsibility for a criminal act when insanity is relied upon as a defense is the capacity of the defendant to distinguish between right and wrong at the time of and with respect to the act which is the subject of inquiry;" and if the jury were "not satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant had the capacity to distinguish between right and wrong at the time of and with reference to the act in question, then you cannot convict him."

The refusal of the requests, and the charge in the particulars referred to, present the principal questions for review. The most serious is the refusal to submit to the jury the question of second degree murder, and binding them, as did the court, to either find the defendant guilty of first degree murder or to acquit him. This presents two questions: (1) May the court, in any case upon a charge of first degree murder, and upon a plea of not guilty and a trial, itself, instead of the jury, determine the degree of murder? And (2) if so, is this a proper case in which the court may do so? Because of our recent decision in the case of State v. Thorne, 41 Utah 414, Ann. Cas. 1915D 90, 126 Pac. 236, where it was held that the court in that case was justified in refusing to submit to the jury the question of second degree murder, I approach the first with some hesitation. While I think the doctrine in the Thorne Case is stated too broadly, still, were it not for the second question, and the extent to which it is here carried, I should be inclined to yield assent without further observations.

I have already referred to the statute defining murder and first and second degree murder. Section 4893 of the statute provides that "the jury may find the defendant guilty of any offense, the commission of which is necessarily included in that with which he is charged." Section 4892, that "Whenever a crime is distinguished into degrees, the [168] jury, if they convict the defendant, must find the degree of the crime of which he is guilty." Section 4906, that "upon a plea of guilty of a crime distinguished or divided into degrees, the court must, before passing sentence, determine the degree." Here, then, are express statutes which, on a plea of not guilty and a trial require the jury, and on a plea of guilty the court, to determine the degree, whenever a crime is distinguished into degrees. Murder, under the statute, is distinguished "into degrees." The charge here is murder. It is charged in the first degree. Second degree is "necessarily included in" the charge of first degree murder. The one is just as much charged in the information as is the other. I think the statutes referred to are peculiarly applicable to a charge of first degree murder. I see no license to disregard them or to hold them inapplicable to a charge of murder as here charged, a willful, deliberate, malicious, and premeditated murder. Under such statutory provisions I think the great weight of authority is that upon an information or indictment for first degree murder, and upon a plea of not guilty and a trial, it is the exclusive province of the jury to determine the degree of murder, not only when the charge or claim is that the murder was willful, deliberate, and premeditated and with malice aforethought, but also when perpetrated by poison, or done in the commission of or attempt to commit felonies enumerated in the statute defining murder in the first degree. The cases so holding are collected and cited in notes to the case of State v. Phinney, 12 Ann. Cas. 1081, and 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 935. The reasons for the rule are stated in those cases. Other cases in support of the rule are also cited and referred to by the appellant in his brief. The California and Nevada cases cited in the prevailing opinion do not, in my judgment, support a contrary doctrine. In 10 Nev. cited, the question of second degree murder was not withheld from but was expressly submitted to the jury. In 28 Nev. and in 141 and 148 Cal. cited, questions of withholding or submitting second degree murder were not involved. Neither is the case of Davis v. U. S. 165 U. S. 373, 17 S. [169] Ct. 360, 41 U. S. (L. ed.) 750, in point, for there the prosecution was under a statute different from ours; one where homicide was not divided into degrees of murder as is the case under our statute, and where there was no statute, as we have, "that whenever a crime is distinguished into degrees, the jury, if they convict the defendant, must find the degree of the crime of which he is guilty." There, however, are cases supporting a contrary or "minority" rule, the rule stated in the Thorne case. They are also collected and cited in notes to 12 Ann. Cas. and 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) heretofore referred to. Some of them may be distinguished because of dissimilar statutes. That is especially true of the cases from Nebraska and New Jersey. There seem to be no statutes in those states corresponding with sections 4892 and 4906 of our statute. Others may be distinguished because no request to charge on second degree murder was asked. However, there are cases there cited, notably from Michigan and Iowa, which apparently support the rule laid down in the Thorne case.

The ruling is here defended and upheld upon the theory that the evidence without dispute shows the murder was committed in the commission of or attempt to commit a robbery; and, since the statute declares a murder so committed to be murder in the first degree, the court was justified in refusing to submit to the jury the question of second degree murder and in giving the binding instruction to convict the defendant of first degree murder or to find him not guilty. In this no distinction is drawn between a proper statement of the law and a binding instruction to the jury which takes from them the ascertainment and determination of the degree. Of course, a murder committed in the commission of or attempt to commit a robbery, or perpetrated by poison, is, by the statute, declared to be first degree murder; and the jury should be so instructed, and that if they so find the facts beyond a reasonable doubt to convict the defendant of first degree murder. So, too, does the statute declare that "any other kind of willful, deliberate, malicious and premeditated killing," or "perpetrated [170] from a premeditated design unlawfully and maliciously to effect the death" of a human being, is also first degree murder. Declaring to the jury the law as to what constitutes first degree murder is one thing; withholding from them the right to find second degree murder, when by the information second degree as well as first degree is charged, is quite another and different thing. Asserting, as is done, that since the statute declares a "murder committed in the perpetration of or attempt to perpetrate a robbery," etc., is first degree murder, and if the evidence shows the "murder (defined by the statute to be 'the unlawful killing of a human being with malice aforethought') was committed" that way, the court is not required to submit to the jury second degree murder, adds nothing; for the statute as well declares a "murder committed" under other enumerated circumstances is also first degree murder. Yet it is said if the evidence shows a "murder committed" in the perpetration of a robbery, etc., second degree murder need not to be submitted to the jury, because the statute defines that to be first degree murder; but if the evidence shows a "willful, deliberate, malicious and premeditated" murder, second degree murder should be submitted, though the statute as well declares that also to be first degree murder. The question is asked, how can a murder committed in the perpetration of a robbery, etc., be second degree murder? As well ask how can a willful, deliberate, malicious, and premeditated murder be second degree murder? Let the thought be carried a little further by asking: How can a guilty man be innocent; and how can a verdict of not guilty be rendered in either supposed case?

The declaration in an early day of Chief Justice Shaw in a criminal case (Com. v. Porter, 10 Metc. (Mass.) 263) may not be here amiss:

"It is the proper province and duty of judges to consider and decide all questions of law which arise, and that the responsibility of a correct decision is placed finally on them; that it is the proper province and duty of the jury to weigh and consider evidence, and decide all questions of fact; and that the responsibility of a correct [171] decision is placed upon them. And the safety, efficacy, and purity of jury trial depend upon the steady maintenance and practical application of this principle."

The further observation is there made by him that while it is the duty of the court to declare the law and the jury to accept it as so declared, they, nevertheless, in a criminal case by a general verdict "declare the law as well as the fact." And that is our statute. Comp. Laws. 1907, section 4876. Every first degree murder involves elements of a willful, deliberate, malicious, and premeditated killing. On the first appeal in the Thorne case, 39 Utah 208, 117 Pac. 58, we held that allegations in an information of an unlawful, malicious, deliberate, and premeditated killing are supported by proof of a killing committed in the perpetration of or attempt to perpetrate a robbery, on the theory that a willful and premeditated intent to commit the felony is transferred from that offense to the homicide actually committed and is the legal equivalent of and tantamount to the allegations of a willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing. And on no other theory can such a ruling be upheld.

When, therefore, all the provisions of the statute referred to are considered, I see no reason for holding that when the murder is shown to have been committed without dispute by poisoning, or in the commission of, or attempt to commit, a felony enumerated in the statute defining first degree murder, the degree of murder is for the court; but when the evidence without dispute, and by the most positive and direct testimony shows the murder to have been committed, not in such manner, but by a willful, deliberate, malicious, and premeditated killing with malice aforethought, a murder also defined by the statute to be first degree murder, the degree is for the jury. Under the statute I do not see wherein the court has any greater license in the one case than in the other to itself, instead of the jury, determine the degree of murder. The statute requiring the jury to "find the degree," where the crime is "distinguished into degrees," makes no such distinction. In considering the power of the court and the province of the jury with respect to the subject [172] in hand, we must bear in mind the well-recognized distinction between our civil and criminal jurisprudence. In a civil case, if all the material allegations of the complaint are established by evidence without dispute, the court is given the power, and it is its duty, if requested, to direct a verdict for the plaintiff; and though the case under such circumstances should be submitted to the jury, and a verdict nevertheless rendered in favor of the defendant, the court, on its own motion, or upon plain-tiff's may set the verdict aside, as being against and contrary to the evidence. The court may not do that in a criminal case. Though all the allegations of the information or indictment be established by most direct and positive evidence wholly without dispute, and though the defendant offered no evidence whatever, the court, nevertheless, may not direct a verdict against him, and if upon a submission of the case, under such circumstance, a verdict is rendered in favor of the defendant, which manifestly is contrary to and against all the evidence and wholly unsupported by it, still the court may not, upon its own motion or that of the state, and against the objection of the defendant, set the verdict aside.

Take the case in hand, where it is claimed the evidence without dispute shows first degree murder; and let it further be assumed that the defendant had offered no evidence of any kind, but had rested when the state rested, and the jury had rendered a verdict of not guilty—a verdict let it be assumed in the very teeth of all the evidence—yet the court could neither on its own motion nor that of the state have interfered with it. This proposition is conceded. What significance is to be attached to it? That the jury in a criminal case, so far as concerns the state, are not only the judges of the credibility of the witnesses and the weight to be given the testimony, but are also the exclusive judges of the facts. They, as concerns the state may or may not decide questions of fact and find a verdict conformably with the evidence. They, in such respect, are given unlimited power, wholly uncontrolled by the court, to decide all questions of fact and render a verdict contrary to the evidence. It may be said [173] the jury in such case would not properly perform their duty. That is not the point. The pertinent question is: May the court in such case influence, coerce, or control the jury, or interfere with their verdict when so rendered, in the very teeth of all the evidence? When a jury in a civil case renders a verdict not conformable with and not supported by the evidence, the court may interfere on its own motion, or that of the party aggrieved. So may it in a criminal case on behalf of the defendant, when a verdict is rendered to his prejudice not conformable with and not supported by the evidence, or one against law. But, as concerns the state, the court may not interfere, though the verdict is wholly unsupported by, and is contrary to, all the evidence; and though the jury in the rendition of it disregarded both law and evidence.

It is said in some of the cases that, if the evidence without dispute shows first degree murder, the court should not submit the question of second degree to the jury and thereby permit or give them to understand that they may render such a verdict when there is no evidence to support it. But in such case such a verdict would not be supported by evidence. It would not only amply support such a verdict, but would also support a verdict of a higher degree, of first degree murder. Evidence which would support first degree, of necessity must also support second degree murder. That is the effect of the holding in People v. Dillon, 8 Utah 92, 30 Pac. 150. If, however, the argument is sound and is carried to a conclusion, then why should the court submit a case at all to the jury when the evidence wholly without dispute and by the most positive and direct testimony manifestly shows murder in the first degree committed by the defendant, and no evidence whatever offered by him to controvert it? To say, as is said in some of the cases, the court is required to submit the case to the jury to determine whether the defendant committed the acts constituting the charged offense, is to beg the question; for such a contention assumes some conflict or uncertainty in the evidence, either with respect to the commission of the offense, or as to [174] the person who committed it, or that such questions rest upon inferences and deductions and not upon positive, direct, and uncontroverted evidence. Let us adhere to the admitted proposition, the conceded premises, the defendant's guilt of first degree murder clearly shown by the most positive and direct evidence wholly without conflict. According to all the cases no matter how conclusive may be the evidence in favor of the state and against the defendant, the court, nevertheless, upon a plea of not guilty and a trial, is bound to let the case to the jury. If they in such case have the unlimited power, wholly uncontrolled by the court, to render a verdict of not guilty, then why have they not the same power to render any other verdict, which on the information or indictment may be rendered?

It seems somewhat of an anomaly to say that the jury have the unlimited power, wholly uncontrolled by the court, to render a verdict of not guilty in disregard of all the evidence, but may not render a verdict of second degree murder because the evidence without dispute shows first degree murder. What appears to be a conclusive answer to the contention is this: Had the jury in this case, notwithstanding the court by its charge bound them to render a verdict of first degree murder or to find the defendant not guilty, rendered a verdict of murder in the second degree, what power under our Constitution or the statute had the court, either on its own motion, or that of the state, and against the objection of the defendant, to set the verdict aside? None whatever. This but shows that the jury, so far as concerns the state, had the right and power to render any kind of a verdict which under the information could be rendered; and any verdict so rendered could not, against the defendant's objection, be questioned or assailed on the ground that it is against law or the evidence. And if such a verdict had been rendered, and the court were powerless to interfere, then what right had the court in the first instance, on the submission of the case to the jury, against the defendant's requests and objections, to so restrict, direct, and control the jury as was here done? The court may, and it [175] is its duty when requested, to inform the jury of the different verdicts which on the information or indictment may be rendered. But the court may not, against the defendant's requests and objections, restrict, direct, or influence the jury as to which of such verdicts should be rendered by them. And as second degree murder is necessarily included in the charge of first degree murder, and as the statute expressly requires the jury, not the court, to determine the degree, where the crime is distinguished into degrees, I think the question of second degree murder ought to have been submitted to the jury.

I have thus considered the question from the standpoint that the evidence without dispute shows murder in the first degree. I shall now consider it from the standpoint that there is evidence to justify a verdict of second degree murder. There is evidence to show that the defendant was addicted to the use of morphine or opium. The controversy in that respect was: To what extent had he used such drugs, and what effect had they upon him? The contention of the defendant was twofold: One, a destruction or impairment of his mental faculties to such an extent as to render him wholly irresponsible for his acts; the other, that his mental faculties were weakened and impaired to such an extent as to render him incapable of deliberation, premeditation, or of forming a design or intent to kill, thereby reducing the crime from first degree to second degree murder. The state contended that the defendant, though addicted to the use of the drugs, had not used them to such an extent as to render him either irresponsible for his acts, or incapable of deliberation or premeditation or of forming a design or intent to kill. The court submitted the case to the jury on the theory only of whether the defendant was irresponsible for his acts; whether he had the capacity to distinguish right from wrong as to the robbery; whether he was insane. The defendant's evidence as to his insanity or entire irresponsibility was not strong. It, however, is conceded to be sufficient to require a submission of such issue to the jury. No one has questioned that. If it was so sufficient, [176] I do not see why the defendant was not also entitled to go to the jury on the theory of an impairment of his mental faculties by the use of the drugs to such an extent as to render him incapable of deliberation and premeditation, or of forming a design or an intent to kill.

The jury on the evidence, finding that the defendant was not wholly irresponsible, might have reached the conclusion, had they not been directed against it, and had the question of second degree murder been submitted to them, that the defendant's mental faculties, because of an habitual and excessive use of the drugs, nevertheless, were impaired to such an extent as to render his capacity to deliberate and premeditate, or to form a design or an intent to kill, reasonably doubtful, and thus induced to find him guilty of second degree murder. And had such a verdict been rendered, on such a theory, I do not see how it could be said to be against, or unsupported by, evidence, in view of the concession that there was sufficient evidence to carry the case to the jury on the issue of insanity and irresponsibility caused by an excessive and habitual use of the drugs. But the jury were not allowed to consider the effect of such drugs upon the defendant's mind for the purpose of determining whether he had the capacity to deliberate, premeditate, or of forming an intent to kill. And this, notwithstanding the court submitted to the jury the question of first degree murder on two theories: One, that the murder was committed in the commission of or attempt to commit a robbery; the other, that the killing was willful, deliberate, with premeditation and malice aforethought, and with the specific intent to take the life of the deceased, and as specifically in the information charged. So, though it be claimed that the jury, on the theory that the murder was committed in the commission of or attempt to commit a robbery, could not consider the excessive use of the drugs and the effect they had upon the defendant's mind except to determine whether he was wholly irresponsible, they, nevertheless, had the right to consider such use and effect on the theory that the killing was willful, deliberate, and premeditated. If [177] not, then as well say a jury in a charge of first degree murder could only consider the defendant's intoxication or the effects of alcoholism upon him, only for the purpose of determining whether he was insane, or wholly irresponsible for his acts, and not whether he had the capacity to deliberate and premeditate, and in determining whether he was guilty of first or second degree murder. The Thorne Case involved no question as to the defendant's mental capacity or condition. In such respect this case is dissimilar to that. So upon the evidence I think the court ought to have submitted to the jury the question of second degree murder.

Now, the defendant requested the court to charge that if the jury found the defendant was addicted to the use of the drugs they should consider the effect thereof, whatever they might find in such particular, in determining his condition of mind and his capacity to deliberate and premeditate. As has been seen, the court refused this and submitted to the jury the consideration of the effect of such drugs only in determining whether the defendant was capable of distinguishing between right and wrong "with reference to the robbery and burglary" and "the mental capacity to form the intent to perpetrate a robbery or burglary." And it is said this is all that was necessary because the evidence shows the murder was committed in that manner. But that is not the only theory on which the state tried the case and went to the jury and on which the court, on behalf of the state, submitted it to them. The court also submitted it on the theory of a willful, deliberate, malicious, and premeditated killing. There, too, is ample evidence to support that. It about as strongly supports the one as the other. And the court, notwithstanding a submission on the theory that the murder was committed in the commission of or attempt to commit a robbery, nevertheless, in most direct and positive terms, unqualifiedly charged the jury that before they could convict the defendant of first degree murder the state was required to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the killing was unlawful, that it was deliberate, [178] that it was premeditated, that it was with malice aforethought, and that it was with the specific intent to take the life of the deceased. Right or wrong, it was the duty of the jury to accept that. Comp. Laws 1907, section 4876. It must be presumed that they did so. And therefore, by their verdict, must it also be presumed that they found the murder was committed in such manner. They could not have done otherwise without disobeying the charge in such particular. It is said this charge, though no complaint is made of it by either party and though it is not before us for review, is wrong; and then it is asserted that the claim is made further error should have been committed by submitting second degree murder. The proposition to be demonstrated is: Was or was not the court required to submit to the jury second degree murder? If the conclusion, that to submit such question would have been error, is to be taken as the major premise of the syllogism, or the negative assumed of the proposition sought to be proved, then, of course, there is nothing to demonstrate. For, when it is once assumed, or the conclusion is reached, that to submit such question would have been error, all argument must cease. No matter what we may think of the charge submitting to the jury the question of a deliberate, malicious, and premeditated murder and requiring the jury to find that kind of murder to convict the defendant of first degree murder, it nevertheless, uncomplained of by either party, was given as the law of the case which the jury were required to accept and to render a verdict accordingly; and the presumption that they did so must equally be indulged whether the charge is right or wrong, favorable or unfavorable to the defendant or the state. The information in express terms charged a deliberate, malicious, and premeditated murder. Under that information the state could prove the commission of such a murder or one committed in the perpetration of a felony. It was to its advantage to go to the jury, as it did, on both theories. And since the court submitted to the jury the question of a deliberate, malicious, and premeditated murder, and required the jury to find [179] that the murder was committed in such manner before they could convict the defendant of first degree murder, then, it seems to me, must it necessarily follow that the court ought also to have submitted the question of second degree murder and the effect, if any, the use of the drugs had on the defendant's mental capacity and condition to deliberate and premeditate. To escape this conclusion must it be presumed that the jury did not obey the positive and commanding language of the court as to the finding of a deliberate, malicious, and premeditated murder before they could convict the defendant of first degree murder—that they did not consider such question so submitted to them and did not find that the murder was so committed—or else must there be a different finding made on the record that the murder was not committed in such manner but in the commission of or attempt to commit a robbery? I think we may not do either. We may not in a civil, much less a criminal case, try it de novo on the record, and treat as found that which may be, or even ought to have been, found.

There is another question of less moment—the charge with respect to the test of insanity or irresponsibility. The court charged:

"The test of irresponsibility for a criminal act, when insanity is relied upon as a defense, is the capacity of the defendant to distinguish between right and wrong at the time of and with respect to the act which is the subject of inquiry."

This thought is repeated several times in other portions of the charge. The defendant, by his request, asks the court to also embody the additional element of "sufficient will power to govern his action" and to "resist impulses to commit crime." The refusal to so charge is also complained of.

Insanity or mental unsoundness embraces many different species. In some cases the subject, because of a diseased or disordered mind, lacks intelligence and the power to reason—to think rationally. Such a person is therefore incapable of comprehending the nature and quality [180] of an act done and of distinguishing between right and wrong with respect to it. When such is the particular form of malady the test is, as was charged: Did the defendant have the capacity to understand the nature and quality of the act, and to distinguish between right and wrong with respect to it? Many cases so hold. But it also is well recognized in medical jurisprudence that one may be capable of understanding the nature and quality of an act and know that it is morally wrong or unlawful, yet, understanding this, may, because of a diseased, impaired, or deranged mind, lack will power and ability to choose and to control conduct, or actions, in the light of his understanding and intelligence. In such case the true test is not capacity merely to distinguish between the rightfulness and wrongfulness of an act committed, but also sufficient will power to choose whether he shall do or refrain from doing it. Many cases so hold. Lack of will power may be caused not only by mania, hallucinations, or irresistible impulses to commit crime, or other maladies impelling violence or impulses to commit crime, but also by maladies of a negative character showing inability to control, to govern generally, to choose, to will. It is common knowledge that that portion of the brain which is concerned with the will may be so diseased or impaired as to destroy will power and yet the person may not be possessed of mania, hallucinations, or irresistible impulses. I see no evidence that the defendant was possessed of "irresistible impulses to commit crime," or that his malady was of such a character or took such a form. The court therefore was not required to embody such an element in the charge in stating the test of insanity. But I think there is evidence of a malady, if any at all, involving a diseased or an impaired will power. Again, it is common knowledge that the general effect of an excessive and habitual use of morphine and opium is to impair, and in some instances to wholly destroy, will power. It is this faculty which usually is first affected by the use of such drugs. Evidence of this was also given at the trial. We are therefore concerned with a malady which involves [181] not only the faculty to think rationally, and to reason, and the capacity to understand right from wrong, but also the faculties of the will, the capacity, the power, to choose, to govern and to control conduct and actions. In view of this I think the court in its charge too much restricted the test and ought to have charged substantially as was charged and approved in the case of Davis v. U. S. 165 U. S. 373, 17 S. Ct. 380, 41 U. S. (L. ed.) 750, and in accordance with the doctrine stated in State v. Reidell, 9 Houst. (Del.) 470, 14 Atl. 550, and supported by many other cases, when the particular malady involves or affects will power.

Rehearing denied July 3, 1913.

NOTE.

Right of Jury to Convict for Lesser Degree under Indictment or Information Charging Act Declared by Statute to Be Murder in First Degree.

Majority Rule.

A number of recent cases support the majority rule laid down in State v. Phinney, 13 Idaho 307, 12 Ann. Cas. 1079, that the jury have the right to convict for a lesser degree under an indictment or information for murder in the first degree committed by poisoning, or done in the commission of or attempt to commit a felony, though the statute provides that homicide so committed shall be murder in the first degree, since it is the exclusive province of the jury to determine the degree of murder. State v. Curtis, 93 Kan. 743, 145 Pac. 858; Com. v. Fellows, 212 Pa. St. 297, 61 Atl. 922; Com. v. Frucci, 216 Pa. St. 84, 64 Atl. 879; Com. v. Romezzo, 235 Pa. St. 407, 84 Atl. 400; Jones v. State, 128 Tenn. 493, 161 S. W. 1016; Shipp v. State, 128 Tenn. 499, 161 S. W. 1017; Burton v. Com. 108 Va. 892, 62 S. E. 376. Compare Com. v. Kovovic, 209 Pa. St. 465, 58 Atl. 857. In Burton v. Com. supra, wherein it appeared that the indictment was in the usual form for murder, the court said: "By section 4041 of the Code it is provided that 'If a person indicted for murder be found guilty by the jury, they shall in their verdict fix whether he is guilty of murder in the first or second degree. . . . It is true that our statute (section 3862, Va. Code, 1904) which defines murder, says, among other things, that 'murder by lying in wait' shall be murder in the first degree. But this is to be read along with the power conferred upon the jury by the sections just quoted. Our jurisprudence, in this and in other respects, may be amenable to criticism of schoolmen and logicians, but subjected to the test of actual experience it has appeared in practice to be well that the law, after framing definitions and formulating rules of conduct, should allow to courts and juries, in their application and enforcement, a certain latitude and discretion. And so it comes to pass that a man may be indicted for murder of the first degree by the various means embraced in the statute, the evidence adduced may tend to the proof of the offense named in the indictment and none other, and yet the jury, acting under this discretion with which they have been clothed by the law, may find the offender guilty of a less offense. And it is well in practice that it should be so, else, owing to the tenderness of juries and their reluctance to impose the highest penalty, many crimes would go wholly unpunished, and thus the rigor of the law would tend rather to the promotion than to the prevention of crime."

A distinction has been drawn between a proper statement of the law and a binding instruction to the jury which takes from them the ascertainment of the degree, and an instruction of the latter kind is erroneous. Com. v. Fellows, 212 Pa. St. 297, 61 Atl. 922; Com. v. Frucci, 216 Pa. St. 84, 64 Atl. 879. And see Com. v. Kovovic, 209 Pa. St. 465, 58 Atl. 857; Com. v. Romezzo, 235 Pa. St. 407, 84 Atl. 400; Com. v. Harris, 237 Pa. St. 597, 85 Atl. 875. In the case first cited the instructions complained of were in part as follows: "We do not know that we should take the chance of confusing you by defining the various degrees of homicide, for the reason that it does seem to us that in this case your verdict should be murder in the first degree or not guilty. We have before suggested that we do not deem it necessary in this case to define murder in the second degree or to explain it, nor do we deem it necessary to define manslaughter and to explain it, for the reason that there are no elements of manslaughter in the case, and there seems to be nothing in the testimony that would fix the degree of the defendant's guilt at murder in the second degree, if he be guilty at all. It seems to us, under the evidence, that he is either guilty of murder in the first degree or he is not guilty of anything, and that is why we have considered it best not to confuse you, in your disposition of the case, by burdening you with definitions of offenses which we conceive have no application here. If you find, from all the evidence in the case, that this defendant has committed a wilful and deliberate murder, you convict him of murder in the first degree, for, as we have suggested, that is the only question in the case, if the evidence is to be believed, unless you find that, at the time of the commission of the offense, the defendant was not responsible. If you find that, it does not reduce the crime, but operates in the acquittal of the defendant entirely, and your verdict would be not guilty." The court said: "The Act of March 31, 1860, P. L. 382, under which defendant was indicted, provides, inter alia: 'And the jury before whom any person indicted for murder shall be tried, shall, if they find such person guilty thereof, ascertain in their verdict whether it be murder of the first or second degree.' This is an imperative duty, which under the express provisions of the statute the jury alone must perform. The court cannot be the keeper of the consciences of, nor the arbitrator of the facts for, the jury, because in the law it is otherwise written. Binding instructions to find the defendant guilty of murder of the first degree or to acquit, and which gave the jury no alternative in finding the degree, violate the statutory rule and are erroneous. . . . In not a single case, however, has this court departed from the settled rule that instructions to either convict of murder of the first degree or to acquit were erroneous, except in those instances where the error in this respect was held not to be reversible because the general charge fairly left the whole question to the jury. While murder is a common-law offense, our statute fixes what constitutes the degree thereof, and imposes on the jury the duty of ascertaining the same. In the case at bar the learned court below instructed the jury that he did not deem it necessary to define murder of the second degree or explain it, for the reason that under the testimony the verdict should be murder of the first degree or not guilty. These instructions are substantially reiterated several times in the charge. They are in substance binding instructions to either return a verdict of murder of the first degree or to acquit, and the general charge did not save the error. No alternative as to the degree was suggested in the charge. We concede that courts will not be astute in sustaining unsubstantial technicalities in favor of criminals whose guilt is clear and where a just verdict has been returned. The instructions in this case, however, not only violated an express provision of the statute, but the settled rules of law applicable thereto as well. The learned trial judge, actuated by a sense of duty, no doubt, thought the defendant should be convicted of murder of the first degree, and inadvertently went further than the act of assembly permits or the decisions of our court justify in his effort to reach this result."

Minority Rule.

In some jurisdictions, it has been held recently that where a person is charged with the commission of murder by an act declared by statute to constitute murder in the first degree, the jury, if they find the accused guilty, must find him guilty of murder in the first degree. People v. Rogers, 163 Cal. 470, 126 Pac. 143; King v. People, 54 Colo. 122, 129 Pac. 235; State v. Zeller, 77 N. J. L. 619, 73 Atl. 498; People v. Schleiman, 197 N. Y. 383, 18 Ann. Cas. 588, 90 N. E. 950, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1075; State v. Spivey, 151 N. C. 676, 66 S. E. 995; State v. Walker (N. C.) 86 S. E. 1055; Essery v. State, 72 Tex. Crim. 414, 163 S. W. 17; State v. Thorne, 39 Utah 208, 117 Pac. 58, 41 Utah 414, Ann. Cas. 1915D 90, 126 Pac. 286. And see the reported case. Compare State v. Matthews, 142 N. C. 621, 55 S. E. 342. In State v. Spivey, supra, the evidence showed that the homicide was committed by lying in wait or in an attempt to commit arson. The court in approving an instruction that the jury must find the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree or not guilty, said: "In the present case the murder was committed by lying in wait, or in the attempt to perpetrate the crime of arson. There was no evidence from which the jury could have found murder in the second degree or manslaughter. So sharply was this the contention between the state and the prisoner, that the record does not disclose any prayer from the learned counsel of the prisoner presenting the view of murder in the second degree. The only inference that could have been drawn from the evidence was that a murder in the first degree, by lying in wait or attempting to perpetrate arson, had been committed; and if the prisoner was the criminal, then his crime was murder in the first degree. . . . After a careful review of the decisions of this court, and a critical examination of the statute' (Revisal, sections 3631 and 3271), we deduce the following doctrine: Where the evidence tends to prove that a murder was 'done,' and that it was done by means of poison, lying in wait, imprisonment, starving, torture, or which has been committed in perpetration or attempt to perpetrate any arson, rape, robbery, burglary or other felony, and where there is no evidence and where no inference can fairly be deduced from the evidence of or tending to prove a murder in the second degree or manslaughter, the trial judge should instruct the jury that it is their duty to render a verdict of 'guilty of murder in the first degree,' if 'they are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, or of 'not guilty.' If, however, there is any evidence or if any inference can be fairly deduced therefrom, tending to show one of the lower grades of murder, it is then the duty of the trial judge, under appropriate instructions, to submit that view to the jury. It becomes the duty of the trial judge to determine, in the first instance, if there is any evidence or if any inference can be fairly deduced therefrom, tending to prove one of the lower grades of murder. This does not mean any fanciful inference tending to prove one of the lower grades of murder; but, considering the evidence 'in the best light' for the prisoner, can the inference of murder in the second degree or manslaughter be fairly deduced therefrom. When the evidence discloses a murder in one of the specific methods which, by the statute, is made per se murder in the first degree, 'the state is not required to prove premeditation, because the manner of doing the act necessarily involves premeditation, unless the prisoner is mentally incapable of deliberation or doing an intentional act. The jury must, of course, be instructed that they must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the evidence brings the murder within one of the specific methods mentioned in the statute, and that the prisoner perpetrated the murder, and that the prisoner was mentally capable of committing the crime.'"

In State v. Zeller, 77 N. J. L. 619, 73 Atl. 498, the court said: "The third and fourth points are based upon the ground that the court took from the jury the function imposed upon it by the statute of determining the degree of guilt of the prisoner, by instructing them that under the law and the evidence they could not find Zeller guilty of murder in the second degree, and that the law and the evidence, if a verdict of guilt were found, would warrant no other verdict than murder in the first degree. While the statute (Pamph. L. 1898, p. 824, sec. 107) prescribes that the jury, if they find one guilty of murder, shall declare by their verdict whether it be murder in the first degree or murder in the second degree, this does not, in our opinion, confer upon the accused any right to have the jury left free to find him guilty of murder in the second degree if there be no reasonable ground for such a verdict in the evidence. Our statute (Pamph. L. 1898, p. 824, sec. 106) declares that murder committed in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate a robbery is murder in the first degree. All the evidence that tended to implicate Zeller in the murder of William Read (including Zeller's own confession) tended to show that the murder was committed in the perpetration of a robbery. All the circumstances of the homicide bore a similar import as to the character of the crime. If, under the evidence, Zeller was guilty at all, he was guilty of a murder committed in the perpetration of a robbery. The charge of the trial judge upon this question was therefore entirely proper." In Essery v. State, 72 Tex. Crim. 414, 163 S. W. 17, it was tersely said that "when the Code said that murder committed in a certain way was murder of the first degree, the law so makes it, and a jury by their verdict could not find otherwise." In People v. Schleiman, 197, N. Y. 383, 18

Ann. Cas. 588, 90 N. E. 950, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1075, which was a prosecution based on an indictment containing a count for premeditated murder and one for murder perpetrated while engaged in the commission of burglary the court said: "The definition of murder in the first degree in the Penal Code (now the Penal Law) of this state, when committed 'From a deliberate and premeditated design to effect the death of the person killed, or of another,' is broad enough to embrace murder in the second degree, as defined in the same statute, or manslaughter in either of its degrees. Hence, if the defendant had been tried for killing Mrs. Staber with a deliberate and premeditated design to effect her death, the refusal of the trial judge to instruct the jury in reference to these lesser degrees of felonious homicide would unquestionably have been error. But the defendant was not tried for deliberate and premeditated murder at all. He was tried for killing Mrs. Staber without a design to effect her death, while he was engaged in the commission of a burglary. The evidence was directed toward the establishment of that form of murder in the first degree and toward nothing else. No suggestion was made in the charge that the defendant could possibly be found guilty of deliberate and premeditated murder. The accusation which the jury passed upon was an accusation of killing while engaged in the perpetration of a felony, a crime in which it is not necessary to prove any design to effect death. Under such circumstances, the power to convict of a lesser degree of felonious homicide which belongs to the jury in cases where the degree depends upon the intent cannot properly be exercised; because an intent to kill is not a necessary ingredient of the offense in this kind of murder. It is enough to show, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the killing was done while the slayer was committing or attempting to commit a felony. . . . Where the indictment charges murder in the first degree in the common law form only or murder in the first degree committed from a deliberate and premeditated design to effect death and the defendant is tried upon that charge, he is entitled, if he so requests, to have the jury instructed that it is within their power to find a verdict for a lesser degree of felonious homicide. Upon a murder trial such instruction may properly be refused only where the evidence is directed toward the establishment of a kind of murder in which the intent to kill is immaterial. Such was the case here. No attempt at all was made to prove the second count of the indictment which was in the common law form. As has already been pointed out, the prosecution sought only to prove, not the intentional killing of Mrs. Staber by the defendant, but her death at his hands, irrespective of any intent to kill her, while the defendant was engaged in the commission of a burglary. Intent not being an element of the crime of murder in the first degree, when committed under such circumstances, there was no room for the exercise of a power to find the defendant guilty of a lesser degree of felonious homicide depending upon the existence or non-existence of deliberation and premeditation. Hence, the learned trial judge committed no error in refusing to charge in reference to the various degrees of crime in this case or in instructing the jury that they must find the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree or not guilty. His action in this respect indicated, on the contrary, a clear and accurate comprehension of the law of criminal procedure as applicable to the circumstances of the case. The conditions are exceptional, however, which warrant a refusal to instruct the jury as to their power to convict of a lower degree of the crime charged for which the defendant is upon trial and great care should be observed, as was done here, not to withhold such instruction unless the case is one like that before us, where there was no possible view of the facts which would justify any other verdict except a conviction of the crime charged or an acquittal."

GLYNN.

Iowa Supreme Court—September 25, 1913.

163 Iowa 146; 142 N. W. 1029.

Witnesses — Cross-Examination of Plaintiff — Showing Animus.

As tending to show the animus actuating plaintiff in an action for breach of promise to marry, and as bearing on her credibility as a witness, cross-examination of her should be allowed to show that she sought to have the president of the bank, of which defendant was cashier, discharge a girl employee, on the ground that defendant was under her influence, and later changed her mind on this subject, and sought to have defendant discharged, stating in each instance that if this was done she would be satisfied and would not prosecute her action.

Privilege — Physician — Waiver by Patient.

While one, by testifying to a consultation by her with, or examination of her by, a physician at a certain time, waives the privilege to have him not testify in respect therefor, the waiver is not such as to allow him to testify as to an earlier consultation or examination, or the purpose for which at such earlier time he gave her medicine.

[See Ann. Cas. 1915A 438.]

Breach of Promise of Marriage — Evidence — Understanding of Family.

Proof of the understanding by members of the family of one of the parties that they were to marry may not, in an action for breach of marriage promise, be considered as evidence of an agreement to marry.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Testimony that it was the understanding of the members of the family of plaintiff, in an action for breach of marriage promise, that she was to marry defendant is objectionable as an opinion or conclusion of the witness.

[See note at end of this case.]

Damages — Seduction — Abortion.

While in an action for damages from breach of marriage promise alone seduction, accomplished through the promise, and pregnancy, resulting from the seduction, may be shown, on the ground of the mental anguish and humiliation from the breach of being intensified thereby, abortion, though at the instance of defendant, may not be shown, this being an element of damages only in an action for seduction.

[See Ann. Cas. 1914B 1200.]

Instructions — Applicable to One Cause of Action — Harmless Error.

Though the petition in one count, alleging breach of promise of marriage, seduction, pregnancy, and abortion at the instance of defendant, might well be treated as one for breach of promise alone, with the other matters pleaded in aggravation of damages, yet plaintiff having, under Code, § 3470, also a cause of action for seduction, with right, under section 3545, to prosecute both causes of action in one action, and the court, in receiving evidence and giving instructions, having seemed to rule that both causes of action were alleged, and objection not having been raised to each not being stated in a separate count, as they should, an instruction authorizing recovery of an element of damages recoverable only in an action for seduction is not reversible error; defendant not being prejudiced thereby.

Appeal from District Court, Warren county: HAYS, Judge.

Action for breach of promise of marriage and seduction. Mary Nolan, plaintiff, and William H. Glynn, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Berry & Watson and John A. Guhier for appellant.

C. A. Robbins, A. W. and Phil R. Wilkison and A. V. Proudfoot for appellee.

[147] LADD, J.—The defendant began paying attentions to plaintiff in 1901, and continued so to do until some time in 1909. The petition alleged that they became engaged to marry in October, 1904; that later he seduced her, and when she became pregnant advised and caused an abortion to be committed [148] upon her; and that, after repeatedly postponing marriage, finally he declined to carry out his promise. The answer was a general denial. The testimony of plaintiff tended to sustain these allegations of the petition, and is somewhat corroborated by the letters of the defendant, while the latter, though admitting having visited plaintiff during the period stated, denied ever having proposed or promised marriage, and testified that he had never had intercourse with her or known of her pregnancy or of the commission of an abortion. It is evident from this statement that the evidence was such as to carry these issues to the jury, and only the questions of law raised by the record need be reviewed.

I. On cross-examination plaintiff testified that she was acquainted with Ella Doheny, who was employed in the bank at Cuning of which defendant was cashier, also with Simon Casady, of Des Moines, and J. N. Casady, of Norwalk, who were interested in the bank as president and vice president, and was then asked, "Is it, or is it not, true that during the year 1911 you requested Simon Casady and J. N. Casady, or either of them, to discharge Mr. Glynn from the bank?" An objection as immaterial, irrelevant, incompetent, and not cross-examination was sustained. "Q. Is it true that you wrote a letter to either one of those gentlemen, Casady, and asking them in regard to the Doheny girl working in that bank, and in regard to Mr. Glynn working in that bank?" A like objection was sustained. Thereupon counsel for defendant stated that it was proposed to show that:

Plaintiff sought an interview with Simon Casady and J. N. Casady, they being officers of the bank in which defendant works, and at her solicitation at that time an interview was granted, and that the object of that interview was the discussion of matters between her and Mr. Glynn connected with this case, and that she in that interview some time in the month of June, I think 22d of June, 1911, stated to the two Casadys that she thought the trouble with Glynn was the [149] —or words to that effect—was that he was under the influence of this Ella Doheny; that she would be satisfied if they would discharge the Doheny girl (this was the purpose of our motion) from the employment of the bank, not file her petition, and not prosecute her case against Glynn; that afterwards she wrote a letter we have, in which she said that she was mistaken, and the relations existing between the Doheny girl and the defendant were not what she thought they had been, and now, if they would discharge Glynn, she would be satisfied, and her petition would not be filed, and this case would not be prosecuted; that subsequently on her own motion she sought another interview, and said that she was mistaken again, and that if they would agree to discharge the Doheny girl (and this conversation occurred along after the petition was filed) that she would be satisfied and not prosecute the case, or would dismiss it, or words to that effect. Now the intention of this testimony is to show the animus of this prosecution, to show her attitude, and to show the matter of good faith as affecting her credibility as a witness in the case. Court: The ruling will have to remain. The objection is sustained.

We think the inquiries in view of the explanation fairly within the range of proper cross-examination. The evidence sought to be elicited would have tended to show the animus actuating her in the action and have borne more or less directly on her credibility as a witness. As the trial court exercises a large discretion in fixing the limit of cross-examination tending to disclose motive or interest, we might not have been inclined to reverse on this ruling; but, as the matter concerned the relations of the parties to the action, we think the evidence, if offered on another trial, should be received.

II. Plaintiff testified to having first discovered that she was pregnant on November 8, 1906, and that she consulted Dr. Sherman near the last of the month, and about two weeks later he gave her medicine; and that he operated on her to cause an abortion April, 1907, which resulted later. The doctor denied all this, and testified that plaintiff never asked him "to perform an abortion on her," but on objection was [150] not permitted to testify whether as early as August in 1906 she consulted him as to whether she was pregnant, or he examined her to ascertain this. The ruling was correct. By her testimony she had waived the privilege as to any consultation or examination had in December or about that time (Woods v. Lisbon, 150 Ia. 433, 130 N. W. 372), but not as to more remote period, and, though the testimony called for may have been material, he was not at liberty to give it over her objection that the consultation was privileged.

III. The plaintiff testified that in April, 1907, Dr. Sherman gave her a paper of tablets, known in the record as Exhibit W. W., to be dissolved in water and used as a douche. The doctor denied having given her these in 1907, or to have given her the directions she had testified to, but stated that he gave them or similar ones to her in 1905, and on objection was not permitted to testify for what purpose they were then given, or whether they were to be used following an abortion. Assuming that he would have testified most favorably to defendant, he must have related a transaction which could have had no connection whatever with that of which she had spoken. Undoubtedly in testifying to receiving the tablets in April, 1907, and their purpose, she waived the right to insist on the protection of the statute excluding the physician's testimony concerning the same (Woods v. Lisbon, supra), but only as to matters concerning which she spoke. What the doctor may have done two years previous she did not allude to, and as to that his lips were sealed. The rule is said in 4 Wigmore on Evidence, section 2388, to be that: "A waiver is to be predicated not only when the conduct indicates a plain intention to abandon the privilege, but also when the conduct, though not evincing that intention, places the claimant in such a position with reference to the evidence that it would be unfair and inconsistent to permit the retention of the privilege. It is not to be both a sword and a shield."

For this reason, doubtless, the testimony of the doctor denying that he gave her the tablets in 1907, and stating that [151] they were given on another occasion two years previous, was received. What their purpose was then would throw no light on the transaction in 1907, and would tend to open up professional matters on which plaintiff had the right to have him remain silent. In Treanor v. Manhattan R. Co. 28 Abb. N. Cas. 47, 21 Civ. Pro. 364, 16 N. Y. S. 536, the testimony of the physician related to the precise matters concerning which the complainant had testified, and therefore the implied waiver related thereto and not to an independent transaction. The ruling was correct.

IV. A sister of plaintiff was asked, as was also her mother, in substance, "Whether or not it was understood by all members of your family that Mary was to be married to Mr. Glynn?" and over objection as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, "unless they got that understanding from Mr. Glynn, or what Mr. Glynn said to them," answered in the affirmative. Had this evidence been tendered solely as tending to establish an engagement to Mary, there would be much force in defendant's contention, for, though this may be proven "by unequivocal conduct of the parties, and by a general, yet definite and reciprocal, understanding between them, their friends and relations, and corroborated by their actions; that a marriage was to take place" (Thurston v. Cavenor, 8 Ia. 155), this must be shown by what was done and said evidencing such understanding, not among friends and relatives, but between the alleged contracting parties and such friends and relatives as assumption in conversation of an engagement or that they were to become husband and wife, or otherwise recognizing the relationship. In measuring the damages to which she might be entitled to recover, the humiliation she endured because of breaking the engagement, and the wounding of her feelings thereby, were important elements, and the fact that the members of the family with whom she constantly associated knew of their relationship could but add to and accentuate the poignancy of her grief and mortification. For this reason, the knowledge of the members of the family may be shown. [162] Reed v. Clark, 47 Cal. 195; Dunlap v. Clark, 25 Ill. App. 573. Evidence that plaintiff had communicated to her family the fact of the engagement also has been received as tending to prove consent to or mutuality of the promise to marry. Thurston v. Cavenor, 8 Ia. 155; Lewis v. Tapman, 90 Md. 294, 45 Atl. 459, 47 L.R.A. 385.

But in the eighth instruction the court told the jury that, in determining whether there was an agreement to marry, they might consider, among other things, "how the immediate relatives and friends of their respective families understood their relation toward each other." We have discovered no authority holding that proof of the understanding in the family of either party may be considered as evidence of an agreement to marry. Certainly Thurston v. Cavenor, supra, should not be construed as so holding. The point discussed was whether a modification concerning an admission by plaintiff should have been inserted in an instruction. That is the excerpt therefrom quoted above it was not intended to say the contract might be shown by the understanding of friends or relatives appears from the inapplicability of the citations following. In Daniel v. Bowles, 2 C. & P. 553, 12 E. C. L. 258, the evidence was of a conversation by defendant with the mother of plaintiff at one time and with the mother and daughter at another, and nothing will be found in Chitty on Contracts or Blackstone's Commentaries bearing on the question as to whether the understanding of the respective families may be proven. Even if what is said in Thurston v. Cavenor could be construed as so holding, it is mere dictum. To receive such evidence as tending to prove a contract would be going farther than admitting hearsay—it would be receiving testimony of a conclusion based on hearsay. The members of the family may have reached their understanding from what plaintiff had said in the absence of defendant, or have inferred as much from the long-continued attentions of defendant. And yet such attention, however long-continued, if without a proposal or promise of marriage, would not justify such a conclusion. [153] Whitcomb v. Wokcott, 21 Vt. 368. Of course, the bearing of the parties toward each other, what they may say when together in the presence of friends and relatives, always may be shown. Russell v. Cowles, 15 Gray (Mass.) 582, 77 Am. Dec. 391. "All the facts and circumstances existing between the parties prior to or after the time when the alleged marriage contract was entered into, tending to establish an engagement, must be regarded as proper evidence for the consideration of the jury." Richmond v. Roberts, 98 Ill. 472.

"The ordinary politeness and civility which a gentleman extends to a lady are not to be considered as furnishing any proof of such a promise. The safest rule which we can lay down is this: If you find that the attentions which the defendant paid the plaintiff, and the intercourse between them, were such as were usual with persons engaged to be married, and such as are unusual with persons between whom there exists no such relation, they are competent for you to consider as evidence which may or may not, as you may determine, suffice to prove a promise of marriage. It is not necessary for you to consider that there was an express promise made and accepted in terms; but if his conduct was such as to induce her to believe that he intended to marry her, and she acted upon that belief, the defendant permitting her to go on trusting that he would carry the intention into effect, that will raise a promise upon which she may recover. But this must be shown by facts and circumstances, and you cannot consider the understanding of the friends of the parties as to relation between them." Perkins v. Hersey, 1 R. I. 493. See, also, Kelley v. Highfield, 15 Ore. 277, 14 Pac. 744; Clark v. Hodges, 65 Vt. 273; 26 Atl. 726; Rutter v. Collins, 96 Mich. 510, 56 N. W. 93; Peppinger v. Low, 6 N. J. L. 384.

In Leekey v. Bloser, 24 Pa. St. 401, the ruling by which several witnesses were allowed to testify from the conduct of the parties whether a mutual attachment in their opinion existed, or only the relation of ordinary acquaintances and friends, was denounced as erroneous, saying: "On such a [164] subject the jury is as competent to weigh the facts and deduce the appropriate conclusions as the witness. And if the witness have no facts to describe to a jury, what are his conclusions and impressions but the baseless visions of his imagination? The question here was, Had Leekey promised to marry the plaintiff? There was no direct evidence of the promise; but it was competent for her to prove such attentions on his part as ordinarily characterize a matrimonial engagement, and as might lead a jury to presume a promise. The law has an open ear for the complaints of deserted innocence; and the tribunals of the law are quite ready enough to give full effect to such circumstantial evidence as is usually submitted in actions of this sort, to prove the promise of the recalcitrant lover; but if he is to be charged with infidelity to his vows, not upon proved circumstances, but upon the surmises, suspicions, opinions, and the impression of witnesses, we shall be in great danger of producing more evils than we remedy, and of sacrificing the legal rights of a man to redress the imagined wrongs of a woman." And so the opinion of the witnesses in this case as to what members of the family understood, whether based upon the attentions paid plaintiff or other information, should have been excluded on the objection urged because calling for an opinion or conclusion of the witnesses, and the instruction was erroneous in allowing the consideration of the inference of third parties in determining the existence of a contract.

V. The court, in the ninth paragraph of the charge, said to the jury:

"If you find from a preponderance of the testimony as heretofore defined to you that such marriage contract was entered into substantially as charged in plaintiff's petition, and that plaintiff is entitled to a recovery in this case, under these instructions, then it will be proper for you in estimating or determining the amount of her recovery to take into consideration her wounded feelings, humiliation, her loss of social standing, the amount and value of the defendant's property, [165] as indicating what she has a right to expect to enjoy from a consummation of said marriage, and all the other facts and circumstances disclosed upon the trial herof, as tending to show what the plaintiff has lost by reason of the defendant's failure to perform said marriage contract, as alleged in her petition. And you should allow her such sum as, in your judgment, will make her whole for the injury she has sustained by reason of the breach of such contract.

And if you shall further find from the preponderance of the testimony, that while the marriage contract was in existence and by reason thereof the defendant seduced the plaintiff, had sexual intercourse with her, and that he advised or procured an abortion to be performed upon her, then and in such case you will be entitled to consider, in estimating the amount of such recovery, her pain and suffering, occasioned thereby, her mental anguish, humiliation, and shame, injury to health, if any has been shown, and any other injury that she sustained by reason thereof, as the same has developed upon the trial herof.

If you should fail to find that plaintiff has established by a preponderance of the testimony that during the existence of the marriage contract and by reason thereof the defendant seduced the plaintiff, had sexual intercourse with her, and that an abortion or miscarriage was produced with the advice of the defendant, then you will not be entitled to consider such facts in estimating the amount of plaintiff's recovery, even though you find her entitled to recover."

No exception is taken to the first paragraph; but it is insisted that the last two are erroneous for that, as is said: (1) Abortion, and especially criminal abortion, ought not to be considered in aggravation of damages in an action for breach of promise; and (2) that physical pain and suffering because of pregnancy or childbirth, mature or premature, should not be taken into account in estimating damages in such a case. Assuming the action to have been for damages resulting from the breach of promise alone, can these be said to have been the natural consequence of such breach? Seduction, accomplished through the promise, may be shown on the theory [156] that the mental anguish and humiliation resulting from the breach will be intensified thereby. Geiger v. Payne, 102 Ia. 581, 69 N. W. 554, 71 S. W. 571; Herriman v. Layman, 118 Ia. 590, 92 N. W. 710. But some courts hold that, as seduction constitutes an independent cause of action, and the parties are in pari delicto, such proof is inadmissible. See Weaver v. Bachert, 2 Pa. St. 80, 44 Am. Dec. 159; Burks v. Shain, 2 Bibb (Ky.) 343, 5 Am. Dec. 616, and the dissenting opinion of Breese, J. in Fidler v. McKinley, 21 Ill. 308. Evidence of pregnancy resulting from seduction also is admissible, for the grief and humiliation of a woman occasioned by the breach in that situation necessarily would be greater than would be likely had not pregnancy followed. Tyler v. Salley, 82 Me. 128, 19 Atl. 107; Sherman v. Rawson, 102 Mass. 395; Kelley v. Riley, 106 Mass. 339, 8 Am. Rep. 336. But proof of the effect of pregnancy on bodily health is not admissible (Tyler v. Salley, supra), for that is a consequence of the physical condition, and in no sense of breaking the promise of marriage. The infirmities due to pregnancy and the physical suffering incident to childbirth necessarily must have been endured had the promise been consummated by marriage, and therefore cannot be attributed to the breach. In other words, there is no causal connection between such suffering and the refusal to keep the promise, and therefore it is not an element to be considered in measuring the damages to be allowed. Such a case is readily distinguished from an action for seduction, the natural consequences of which is pregnancy and the suffering incident to childbirth, both of which are elements of damages. Stevenson v. Belknap, 6 Ia. 97, 71 Am. Dec. 392; Smith v. Milburn, 17 Ia. 30.

Because of the lack of causal connection, the fact that a miscarriage occurred or an abortion was committed may not be considered in aggravation of damages in an action for breach of promise. True, abortion may be shown in actions by the father for loss of services resulting from the seduction of a daughter; but such an action cannot be maintained unless [157] pregnancy results and sickness, with consequent loss of service, construed to include loss of the comfort and society of the daughter and the honor of the father and his family, and, if for his own protection against the original wrong the defendant subjects the daughter to another, corrupting her morals to an extreme degree, imperiling her health and life, and exposing her to a deeper disgrace, this but aggravates the original wrong by adding to the loss of service, which is the gist of the action. Klopper v. Bromme, 26 Wis. 372; White v. Murtland, 71 Ill. 250, 22 Am. Rep. 101; Beaudette v. Gagne, 87 Me. 534, 33 Atl. 23.

But the perpetration of this offense, that is, of abortion, was as likely had there been no engagement, and if it occurred as an inducement to defendant to adhere to his agreement, as, some of the evidence tended to show, this was inconsistent with an inference that it was owing to a breach thereof. Moreover, according to the evidence, the abortion was committed long before the engagement was broken. The commission of an abortion is not the natural consequence of the breaking of an engagement to marry, and the evidence adduced did not tend to establish any causal connection between the two.

Ia. Giese v. Shultz, 53 Wis. 462, 10 N. W. 598, the jury was directed that, "if . . . you should find that the defendant seduced the plaintiff under a promise of marriage, and got her with child, you will, in addition to the damages I have named, take into account this fact, and give such damages as she has sustained by reason of that additional injury," and the court in adjudging this erroneous, said:

"Other elements of injury, such as loss of time, expenses of medical and other attendance, and the like, might be held proximate, and might therefore increase the damages, in an action of trespass per quod servitium amittit, in which the seduction of the servant is proved in aggravation of the damages. In that form of action the loss of service caused by the seduction is the primary cause of action, and, of course, such [158] loss is proximate. And the same may be said of the expenses which are the direct result of the act which caused the loss of service. But in this case the cause of action is further removed from the injuries just mentioned. The breach of the promise of marriage is the foundation of the action; the seduction is the result of such promise—perhaps proximate.

mate—although, but for the authorities, that might well be doubted; but the loss of service and expenses of sickness, which might or might not result from the seduction, are certainly not the proximate results of the breach of promise, although they may be of the seduction.”

On another trial practically the same instruction was given, and from the second opinion, found in 65 Wis. 487, 27 N. W. 353, it appears there was a miscarriage, and the court held this improper for the consideration of the jury.

Schmidt v. Durnham, 46 Minn. 227, 49 N. W. 126, is not necessarily inconsistent therewith. In so far as the conversation of these parties concerning the commission of an abortion was connected with the promise of marriage or its performance, evidence thereof undoubtedly was admissible; but whether the crime was in fact perpetrated had no bearing on the issue, and neither the crime, if such there were, nor the suffering occasioned thereby was a consequence flowing from the breach of promise alleged. But see section 985, Sutherland on Damages.

As the petition was in one count, the court might well have construed it to claim such damages only as resulted from the breach of the contract to marry, and have treated the allegations concerning seduction and pregnancy as in aggravation of the damages consequent of the breach. Geiger v. Payne, 102 Ia. 581, 69 N. W. 554, 71 N. W. 571. But in receiving evidence, and in giving this and other instructions, the court must have construed the petition as stating two causes of action, that of seduction, and breach of promise to marry. In actions for seduction, all the natural consequences, such as pregnancy, childbirth, sickness, and like matters, including abortion at the instance of the defendant, [159] may be considered in estimating the compensation to be awarded plaintiff. McCoy v. Trucks, 121 Ind. 292, 23 N. E. 93; Gunder v. Tibbits, 153 Ind. 591, 55 N. E. 762; Klopper v. Bromme, 26 Wis. 372; 4 Sutherland on Damages, section 1283; 35 Cyc. 1320.

Undoubtedly both causes of action could have been prosecuted in one action for, under section 3470 of the Code, an unmarried woman may prosecute an action for her own seduction, and section 3545 of the Code provides that: “Causes of action of whatever kind where each may be prosecuted by the same kind of proceedings, if held by the same party, and against the same party, in the same rights, and if action on all may be brought and tried in that county, may be joined in the same petition.” See Turner v. Bank, 26 Ia. 562; Devin v. Walsh, 108 Ia. 428, 79 N. W. 133. Of course, each cause of action should have been stated in separate counts; but no objection was raised on this ground, though the circumstance that the facts which might have been pleaded in aggravation were included in the count alleging the breach strongly tended to define a purpose not to assert another cause of action. As the court seems to have ruled that both causes of action were alleged in the petition, and no prejudice resulted, we are not inclined to denounce the instruction as containing reversible error.

Because of the errors pointed out, the judgment is Reversed.

NOTE.

Understanding of Family or Friends of Party as Evidence of Agreement to Marry.

The rule seems to be as declared in the reported case that the understanding of the families or friends of the parties to a supposed agreement to marry may not be considered as evidence of the agreement. Perkins v. Hersey, 1 R. I. 493; Munson v. Hastings, 12 Vt. 346, 36 Am. Dec. 346; Whitcomb v. Wolcott, 21 Vt. 368. See also Leckey v. Bloser, 24 Pa. St. 401; Clark v. Hodges, 65 Vt. 273, 26 Atl. 726. Compare Thurston v. Cavenor, 8 Ia. 155. In Perkins v. Hersey, supra, the court after charging the jury that an agreement to marry might be shown by facts and circumstances said: “You cannot consider the understanding of the friends of the parties as to the relation between them.” In Munson v. Hastings, 12 Vt. 346, 36 Am. Dec. 346, explained in Whitcomb v. Wolcott, 21 Vt. 368, it was held that mere attentions on the part of an unmarried man to an unmarried woman do not constitute a marriage contract and the mere fact that the neighbors suppose such a contract must exist adds nothing to their weight. The court said: “The law has not determined that any particular period of courtship shall be evidence of a marriage contract. . . . Nothing need be added as to the probable opinions and belief of third persons. It is clear that to allow such opinions to influence the finding of this contract, as between the direct parties to it, would be giving place to a principle which is wholly inadmissible in other cases.”

In Thurston v. Cavenor, 8 Ia. 155, it was said that the promise of the defendant to marry in a suit for the breach of a promise to marry “may be shown . . . by the unequivocal conduct of the parties, and by a general, yet definite and reciprocal understanding between them, their friends and relations, evinced and corroborated by their actions that a marriage was to take place.”

In the reported case it is said that the case of Thurston v. Caviar, supra, should not be considered as holding that "proof of the understanding in the family of either party may be considered as evidence of an agreement to marry" and it seems that the proper construction of the decision is that an agreement to marry may be shown by the facts and circumstances and the conduct and relation of the parties.

For a general discussion of the question whether a contract to marry may be implied, see the note to Vaughan v. Smith, Ann. Cas. 1914C 1092.

BARNEY.

Minnesota Supreme Court—November 20, 1914.

127 Minn. 346; 149 N. W. 462, 646.

Corporations — Holder of Stock as Security — Liability to Creditors.

Evidence in an action to enforce a stockholder's constitutional liability against one who appeared upon an insolvent local corporation's stockbooks as a general owner of stock, held to sustain a finding that the failure of the corporation's records to show that the stock was issued to and held by defendant as collateral security for an advance made by a third person was not due to the negligence of fraud of the corporation but to his own negligence, wherefore he was estopped, as against creditors, to deny his liability as a stockholder.

[See note at end of this case.]

(Syllabus by court.)

Appeal from District Court, Hennepin county: STEELE, Judge.

Action to enforce stockholder's constitutional liability. Charles M. Way, receiver, plaintiff, and Fred E. Barney, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Mercer, Swan & Stinchfield for appellant.
James E. Trask and John M. Bradford for respondent.

[347] PHILIP E. BROWN, J.—This is an action to enforce against defendant constitutional liability as a stockholder of a bankrupt local corporation. Plaintiff prevailed. Defendant appealed from an order refusing amendments of the findings and a new trial.

The complaint was sustained on demurrer in 116 Minn. 285, 133 N. W. 801, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 648, Ann. Cas. 1913A 719, where it was held, among other things, that the discharge of a corporation under the Federal Bankruptcy Act does not discharge or extinguish the constitutional liability of its stockholders for the payment of its debts.

Plaintiff claimed that on April 19, 1905, defendant subscribed for and became the owner of 50 shares of the capital stock of the Winslow Furniture & Carpet Co. the bankrupt corporation, of the par value of $5,000, issued in his name, an entry whereof was then made upon the stock books of the company, and that such ownership [348] continued so to appear until its bankruptcy. Defendant denied subscription for stock in or ever having been a stockholder of the corporation. He admitted the issuance, and delivery, of the shares to him in his name on the date stated, but asserted that he merely held the title in trust for the Winslow Co., as collateral security for a loan and credit aggregating $5,000, made to it by the Salisbury & Satterlee Co., another corporation, pursuant to the terms of a prior agreement between these companies, to which he was not a party; further, that the issuance of this stock and the entry of his name upon the records as a stockholder, without indicating his true relation thereto, was a fraudulent or negligent violation of the corporation's duty, the agreement mentioned, and his rights in the premises. He claimed also to have surrendered the stock in compliance with this agreement while the Winslow Co. was a going concern.

Little dispute exists as to the facts. In April, 1905, the Winslow Co., which had theretofore been a retail furniture dealer in St. Paul, contemplated opening a branch in Minneapolis, and with that end in view conferred, through Mr. Winslow, its president, with Messrs. Salisbury & Satterlee, president and vice president of a company then engaged, under that name, in wholesaling furniture in the latter city, regarding the purchase by it of shares of the former's capital stock. What occurred, the agreement entered into, and how interest was paid on the advances subsequently made, will best be understood by stating the testimony of the last-named officers as witnesses for defendant. Mr. Satterlee, after testifying that Mr. Winslow advised him of the contemplated establishment of the branch, continued:

"And that he wanted to know if he couldn't interest us in taking some financial interest in the business; that he had had some kind of proposition from other people and wanted us to take stock. We told him we wouldn't take stock, couldn't take it and wouldn't. We conversed along that line for some time and then we suggested, I suggested, or Mr. Winslow, in our conversation, it came to this arrangement, that we would let them have approximately $2,500, worth of goods and $2,500 in cash and take stock in the Winslow & Ruff Furniture Co. as security; collateral security, this stock to be issued to Mr. Barney. It was first suggested by Mr. Winslow [349] to issue it to a man in our employ, but we didn't want to have anything to do with it for the reason that with the other trade in the city here it isn't advisable or desirable to have them feel that you are backing competition coming into the city. So we suggested Mr. Barney. He didn't know Mr. Barney; never had heard of him, and said if it was satisfactory to us it would be to him. So we made the deal on that basis."

Mr. Salisbury testified:

"Through Mr. Satterlee I learned Mr. Winslow desired to open a branch in Minneapolis and with Mr. Satterlee had several conferences with Mr. Winslow. It was his desire, as I recollect it, that we should take a certain amount of stock, $5,000 was the ultimate sum that we arrived at as necessary for us to participate in his patronage, to receive his patronage for our line of goods. I was not in favor, nor was Mr. Satterlee at our conferences, of taking stock in the Winslow Furniture & Carpet Co. or in the Winslow & Ruff Furniture Co., as it was at that time. And I presume there was suggestions made along several lines; as I remember it we were trying to reach a point where we could agree upon the conditions under which we could give them $5,000, a loan of $5,000 in credit, partly goods and partly cash. And it was my understanding that when the deal was finally consummated that Mr. Winslow was to issue $5,000 worth of stock to Fred E. Barney which he was to hold to secure us for the payment of the credit which we gave him; that he was to pay us 8 per cent interest, not on the $5,000, but on the cash as soon as it was invested or turned over, and upon the monthly balances of goods. The interest was paid for at least two years if not more. And the time of payment was not definitely settled or promised or understood, except that the success of the business from Mr. Winslow's standpoint would undoubtedly allow him to take up the credit or the loan within two or three years."

After the making of this arrangement defendant, at the request of the Salisbury Co., consented to take the stock in his name, and, likewise, on April 19, 1906, attended a stockholders' meeting of the Winslow Co., at which a resolution was passed to issue the shares to him, which was done, nothing being said about their being [350] collateral. At the same meeting defendant was elected a director of the corporation at Mr. Winslow's request. The original certificate of shares was not offered in evidence, but the stub of the stock book was. It reads as follows:

Certificate

No. 8

For 50 shares

Issued to

Fred E. Barney:

Dated April 19, 1905.

From Whom Transferred:

Date 190.....

No. Original Certificate	No. Original Shares	No. of Shares Transferred
.....

Received Certificate No.

For Shares
this day of 190.....

The within certificate, No. 8, is one of a series, aggregating $25,000 of preferred stock, and is entitled to the following preference, viz.: To be paid an annual cumulative dividend, on the date of the regular annual meeting of the corporation, of eight per cent, and in case of the winding up of said corporation, said preferred stock shall be paid in full before any common stock shall receive a dividend. The right to redeem the same at any time after five years is reserved."

"Winslow & Ruff Furniture & Carpet Company.

"By Irving M. Winslow, Pres.

"By Alfred Mortenson, Sec."

This was substantially in accord with the resolution authorizing its issuance. Later defendant executed a proxy and the shares were voted thereunder at the annual meeting of the company held in February, 1906. The company's articles of incorporation provided [351] that its government should be vested in a board of three directors, to be elected annually from the stockholders, but defendant was so chosen, with four others. The Salisbury Co. advanced the credit and loan as agreed. In 1908 the Winslow Co. was adjudged bankrupt. Several months prior thereto the Salisbury Co. obtained the stock certificate from defendant, who had retained it in his possession until then, and exchanged it for a note of the Winslow Co.; but no record of this transaction was entered upon the stock books. The Winslow Co. contracted debts after April 19, 1905, which remain unpaid, and for which claims were allowed in the sequestration action subsequently brought against it. The court found the ultimate facts substantially as stated; in effect determined defendant's claim of fraudulent or negligent violation of the duty owing defendant in issuing the stock without indicating its collaterality, unfounded, and concluded that defendant held himself out to creditors as the owner of the shares, and as to them was estopped from denying ownership. Defendant challenges this determination and conclusion as being unsupported by either the evidence or findings.

In this jurisdiction, in harmony with the great weight of authority, one to whom corporate stock has been transferred as collateral security, but who appears upon the books of the corporation as its general owner, is liable as a stockholder for corporate debts; Field v. Evans, 106 Minn. 85, 118 N. W. 55, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 349, note 121 Am. St. Rep. 197. But the rule is otherwise when the holder's true relation to the stock appears of record (Field v. Evans, supra), or where absence of such disclosure is not due to his failure to exercise reasonable care: Hunt v. Seeger, 91 Minn. 284, 98 N. W. 91. Subsequently to the issue of the stock here in question, the rule stated in the Field case was, to some extent, incorporated in our statutes. See R. L. 1905, § 2862.

At the outset it is to be remembered that we are not dealing with a case where any claim is made that defendant either requested or suggested any notation as to the stock being issued as collateral; and, further, that the root of the rule of estoppel in such cases is protection of creditors, and although stock be issued by a corporation [352] directly to a creditor as collateral security, so that he does not become liable to the corporation for the price of the stock as a subscriber therefor, nevertheless, if he fails to do all that can be expected or required of a reasonably careful and prudent business man in the matter of seeing to it that the character of his holding appear of record, he will not be allowed to deny his liability to creditors not advised to the contrary by the stock books. Hamilton v. Levison, 198 Fed. 444, 446, affirmed 204 Fed. 72, 122 C. C. A. 386; State v. New England Bank, 70 Minn. 398, 402, 73 N. W. 153, 68 Am. St. Rep. 538. Since, therefore, one acting as a dummy for a creditor can stand in no better position than the creditor himself, the Field case must be deemed decisive of the questions here involved, unless it can be said that the evidence required a finding in favor of defendant's claim as to fraud or negligence. Considering the transactions between the two companies from a business standpoint, the inference may fairly be drawn that the Winslow Co.'s purpose was to obtain additional capital, or its equivalent, and that the Salisbury Co. desired patronage from it, but did not wish to be known as a stockholder, because other customers might object; wherefore defendant was induced by the latter to act as a "dummy," and to take the stock in his name in order to conceal the real transaction. Furthermore, there is no suggestion of thought, at that time, of liability or of the desirability of any record entry other than made; all evidently believing the branch establishing, would succeed, for, otherwise, neither the Salisbury Co. nor defendant would have entered into the venture. While defendant disclaimed knowledge of the agreement between the two companies, the court was not required to accept this as conclusive. It would have been an unusual transaction for defendant to have accepted shares and a directorship in a corporation in which he had no real interest, without even knowing how many shares had been agreed upon or what he was to do to carry out the purpose of the corporation requesting him to act. Moreover, it is clear from his own statement that he understood the stock belonged to the Salisbury Co., to which he was to deliver it on demand; and, in any event, his lack of knowledge was attributable to his failure to seek it. An entry of the transaction on the books [353] of the Winslow Co., or a statement that the stock was issued as collateral, would have either fully or partially disclosed what was purposed to conceal.

We sustain the findings and hold the court justified in refusing to find either negligence or fraud on the part of the Winslow Co., and that defendant's negligence justified the conclusion of estoppel.

Order affirmed.

On December 11, 1914, the following opinion was filed:

PER CURIAM.—Attention has been called to an omission to make a specific ruling in the opinion on defendant's contention that plaintiff really represents simple creditors with the same standing, only as such creditors have under the National Bankruptcy Act (Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 St. 544), and, under the agreement found by the trial court, could not claim the benefit of the estoppel herein declared, except in some such capacity as that of bona fide purchasers or lien or judgment creditors; that under that act the creditors here cannot avail themselves of an estoppel which the corporation could not claim. Wherefore, it was urged, plaintiff was precluded from the benefit of an estoppel.

The point has been considered, and is overruled.

NOTE.

Liability for Corporate Debts or Calls of Person Who Holds Stock as Collateral Security.

It is purpose of this note to review the recent cases discussing the liability for corporate debts or calls of a person holding stock as collateral security. The earlier cases on this question are collected in the notes to Adams v. Clark, 10 Ann. Cas. 774; Tierney v. Ledden, 21 Ann. Cas. 105; State v. Bank of New England, 68 Am. St. Rep.

538 and Field v. Evans, 121 Am. St. Rep. 197.

In the absence of a statutory provision to the contrary, one to whom stock has been transferred in pledge or as collateral security, and who appears on the books of the corporation as owner of the stock, is liable as a stockholder to pay calls on unpaid stock subscriptions, and to respond to creditors under statutes imposing liability on stockholders for corporate debts. Hamilton v. Levison, 198 Fed. 444; McAllister v. American Hospital Assoc. 62 Ore. 530, 125 Pac. 286. And see the reported case. "It is settled in Minnesota that a pledgee whose name is unconditionally entered as a stockholder is liable under the statute." Hamilton v. Levison, supra. In McAllister v. American Hospital Assoc. supra, it was held that where one who had signed a note as endorser to enable a corporation to borrow money was given stock of the corporation as indemnity, the legal title of which was transferred to him, he was liable to the extent of the unpaid stock subscription which his shares represented to a creditor of the corporation. In Hamilton v. Levison, supra, it appeared that the defendant who was sued on his liability as a stockholder, "accepted the stock as collateral to a claim against the company; that he never signed any subscription paper; that the claim was subsequently paid; and that he then in good faith delivered up the certificate for cancellation." It also appeared that his name was unconditionally entered as a stockholder on the stock register and that the debts for the payment of which the suit was brought to enforce the stockholder's liability were incurred while the defendant held the stock. The court in holding the defendant liable said: "The defendant was liable from the time when he actually accepted the stock, and when, as a natural result of that acceptance, his name was entered unconditionally as a stockholder. He could only escape such liability by seeing to it that the character of his holding appeared upon the books of the corporation. Moreover, he remained liable until at the earliest his name was struck off, if it can be said to have been struck off by the entry made after he delivered up the stock. The intermediate liability between these two dates did not expire at the end of one year, as in the case of the liability of bank stockholders, in Minnesota, but it endured and was open to assessment when the corporation became insolvent."

It seems that where stock has been transferred as collateral security and it appears on the stock register of the corporation that the transfer was made for that purpose, the transferee is not liable as a stockholder for the debts of the corporation. Hamilton v. Levison, 198 Fed. 444. And see the reported case. In McAllister v. American Hospital Assoc. 62 Ore. 530, 125 Pac. 286, it was held that where one who had signed a note as endorser to enable a corporation to borrow money was given stock of the corporation as indemnity, the legal title of which was not transferred to him, he was not liable to the extent of the unpaid stock subscription which his shares represented to the corporation or its creditors.

In some jurisdictions statutes have been enacted expressly exempting persons holding stock as collateral security from personal liability as stockholders. Western Pac. R. Co. v. Godfrey, 166 Cal. 346, Ann. Cas. 1915B 825, 136 Pac. 284. In that case the court in discussing the purpose of such a statute said: "It was not intended to make one who simply holds stock as collateral security . . . personally liable as a stockholder, except as otherwise expressly specified." In Hanson v. Sherman, 25 Cal. App. 169, 143 Pac. 73, wherein it appeared that a corporation issued to the defendant some of its stock as a pledge for the repayment of a loan, it was held that if the issuance of the stock was ultra vires, it did not have the effect of transforming the defendant from a pledgee into a stockholder so as to render him liable as a stockholder for the indebtedness of the corporation.

STATE.

Arkansas Supreme Court—June 1, 1914.

113 Ark. 257; 168 S. W. 148.

Criminal Law — Confession as Sufficient Corroboration of Accomplice.

Kirby's Dig. § 2384, provides that a conviction for a felony cannot be had on the testimony of an accomplice, unless corroborated by other evidence tending to connect defendant with the commission of the offense, and that the corroboration is not sufficient if it merely shows the offense was committed and the circumstances thereof. Section 2385 declares that the defendant's confession, unless made in open court, will not warrant a conviction, unless accompanied by other proofs that the offense has been committed. Held that, where defendant's daughter testified that defendant had had intercourse with her, with her consent, defendant's voluntary confession of the same fact to officers after his arrest for incest constituted sufficient corroboration to sustain a conviction.

[See note at end of this case.]

Incest — Marriage of Accused — Evidence Sufficient.

In a prosecution for incest alleged to have been committed by defendant with his daughter, a girl of 18, the state introduced a marriage certificate showing that defendant had married E. in Kansas on August 25, 1895, and E.'s sister testified that the woman mentioned in the marriage certificate was her sister and defendant's wife; that she was alive at the time of the trial; and that defendant had lived with her as his wife for the past 20 years. Held, sufficient to establish that defendant was a married man at the time of the commission of the crime.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Benton county: MAPLES, Judge.

Criminal action. J. M. Knowles convicted of incest and appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Walter Mathews for appellant.

Wm. L. Moose and Jno. P. Streepey for appellee.

[258] HART, J.—J. M. Knowles has appealed from a judgment of conviction for the crime of incest, charged to have been committed by committing adultery with Pearl Knowles, his daughter. The facts are as follows:

Pearl Knowles testified: I am eighteen years of age, and am the daughter of the defendant, J. M. Knowles. I have had sexual intercourse with him several times a month for the past three years in Benton County, Arkansas. As a result of that intercourse, I gave birth to a child. It died about two or three days after its birth, and my father buried it in the yard near the house. I submitted to all these acts of intercourse of my own accord.

Bob Campbell testified: I am chief of police of the city of Eureka Springs, in Carroll County, Arkansas. I arrested the defendant there, and he wanted to know if he was charged with murdering his child. I told him that he was charged with having sexual intercourse with his daughter. He said: "If I am not charged with murdering the child, I am not uneasy. I do not care for the charge of doing business with my daughter, for I am guilty of that."

Sid Murphy testified: I am constable in Benton County, Arkansas. I went to Eureka Springs after the defendant was arrested there and brought him back to Benton County. While on the way back he confessed to me that he had been having intercourse with his daughter, Pearl Knowles, for the past three years.

[259] Campbell and Murphy each stated that the confession made to him was a voluntary one.

A marriage certificate was introduced to the effect that John M. Knowles and Miss Catherine Edmonson were united in marriage in the State of Kansas on the 25th day of August, 1895.

Margaret Jerminiger testified: I live in the State of Kansas, and have known the defendant for twenty years. He lived in Kansas until about three years ago. The Catherine Edmonson mentioned in the marriage certificate about referred to is my sister and the wife of the defendant. He has lived with her as his wife since their marriage, and she is now present in the court room. I have visited them frequently during their married life.

Jane Lovette testified: I attended Pearl Knowles when she gave birth to the child testified to in this case. The baby died two days after it was born.

Counsel for defendant contends that the court erred in refusing to give the following instruction:

"The court instructs the jury that you cannot convict the defendant upon the confession made by him to witnesses Sid Murphy and Bob Campbell unless such confession is accompanied by other proof that the offense with which the defendant is charged was actually committed by him and the proof required to accompany such confession, in order to convict the defendant, cannot be made by Pearl Knowles alone."

Section 2385, of Kirby's Digest, provides that the confession of a defendant, unless made in open court, will not warrant a conviction unless accompanied with other proof that such offense was committed. See, also, McLamore v. State, 111 Ark. 457, 164 S. W. 119.

Section 2384, of Kirby's Digest, provides that a conviction cannot be had in any case of felony upon the testimony of an accomplice unless corroborated by other evidence tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense, and the corroboration is not sufficient if it merely shows that the offense was committed and the circumstances thereof.

[260] The testimony shows that the prosecuting witness voluntarily committed sexual intercourse with her father, and this made her an accomplice. In most jurisdictions where the question has arisen, it has been held that the evidence of a person who was a voluntary party to an incest must be corroborated, because of statutes requiring the evidence of accomplices to be corroborated. See case note to 18 Ann. Cas. at page 975; see, also, Gaston v. State, 95 Ark. 233, 128 S. W. 1033. It is argued that the confession of the defendant is not a sufficient corroboration of the testimony of the prosecuting witness to warrant the conviction of the defendant.

To support his contention, counsel relies upon the case of Melton v. State, 43 Ark. 367; but we do not think that case is authority for the position assumed by counsel. In that case the alleged accomplice testified that the defendant confessed to him that he had committed the crime, and his testimony, together with that of another accomplice, was held not sufficient to warrant a conviction. Here the confession was not made by the defendant to an accomplice, but was voluntarily made to the officers who arrested him. The defendant's own free confession was sufficient proof to show his own connection with the crime. It has been expressly held that a confession of a defendant made to one who is not an accomplice, is sufficient to corroborate the testimony of an accomplice. Patterson v. Com. 86 Ky. 313, 5 S. W. 387; People v. Cleveland, 49 Cal. 578; Partee v. State, 67 Ga. 570. In the latter case it was urged that the court erred in charging the jury to the effect that the confession of the defendant was sufficient proof or corroboration to support the testimony of the accomplice and to authorize a legal conviction if it believed that he had voluntarily and freely made it. The court expressly held that voluntary confessions are sufficient to corroborate the testimony of an accomplice so as to support a verdict of guilty. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the court did not error in refusing to give instruction No. 4, asked by the defendant.

[261] In the case of Martin v. State, 58 Ark. 3, 22 S. W. 840, the court hold that an indictment of a father for incest committed by adultery with his daughter is defective if it fails to allege that the father was at the time a married man. The indictment in the instant case does allege that the father was a married man at the time he committed the incestuous adultery; but it is contended by counsel for defendant that there is not sufficient proof to show he was married. We do not agree with him in that contention. A marriage certificate was introduced in evidence showing that the defendant had married Catherine Edmonson in the State of Kansas on the 25th day of August, 1895. Margaret Jerminiger testified that the Catherine Edmonson mentioned in the marriage certificate was her sister and the wife of defendant; that she was alive at the time of the trial, and that the defendant had lived with her as his wife for the past twenty years. This was sufficient to establish the fact that the defendant was a married man at the time the crime was committed.

There is no error in the record, and the judgment will be affirmed.

NOTE

Confession of Defendant as Sufficient Corroboration of Accomplice.

General Rule.

It is well settled that the confession of the defendant in a criminal prosecution, whether made in open court or extrajudicially, is sufficient to corroborate the testimony of an accomplice implicating the defendant in the crime for which he is prosecuted.

"The law does not authorize the court to require other and additional evidence than the proof of confession to corroborate the testimony of an accomplice, or other than the testimony of an accomplice to accompany proof of a confession." Patterson v. Com. 99 Ky. 610, 5 S. W. 765. "It is argued that as the confession, uncorroborated, itself would not be sufficient to convict, therefore it is not sufficient to prop up the testimony of the accomplice so that the two sorts of testimony together can legally convict. This is a non sequitur. On the contrary, the testimony of the accomplice would be wholly valueless, if it must be corroborated with evidence outside of itself which would legally be ample to convict. The testimony of the accomplice is good, competent evidence, but must be strengthened by other good and competent evidence in order to have sufficient force to carry legal conviction. . . . True, the corroborating circumstances must connect the defendant on trial with the crime; but surely his own free confession is as strong proof to show his own connection therewith as the strongest chain of circumstances, and much stronger than any number of slight links in an attenuated chain." Partee v. State, 67 Ga. 570.

Application of Rule.

In Russell v. State, 97 Ark. 92, 133 S. W. 188, it was held that the testimony of an accomplice could be corroborated by admissions made by the defendant and by circumstances which connected him with the crime charged, and that it was a question for the jury as to the effect to which the corroborative evidence was entitled. In People v. Eaton, 122 App. Div. 706, 107 N. Y. S. 849 (affirmed without opinion People v. Eaton, 192 N. Y. 542, 84 N. E. 1116) the court in discussing the evidence required to connect the defendant with the crime charged said: "The provision of the Code (section 399, Code Cr. Proc.) is satisfied, if the testimony of the accomplice is corroborated by such other evidence as tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime. When the defendant himself testified that he was connected with the crime, no further corroboration is required." In People v. Watson, 21 Cal. App. 692, 132 Pac. 838, wherein it appeared that the defendant was prosecuted for having caused an abortion it was held that the testimony of his accomplices might be corroborated by his own testimony. The court said: "It is . . . held that the necessary corroboration may be furnished by the defendant's own testimony. (People v. Sullivan, 144 Cal. 471, 77 Pac. 1000.) The testimony of the defendant admitting that he had prescribed for the girl, together with the testimony as to the uses to which the remedies prescribed might be put, and the other evidence referred to, must be said to have a strong tendency, aside from the testimony of the alleged accomplices, to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime charged." In Anglin v. State, 14 Ga. App. 566, 81 S. E. 804, it appeared that the defendant, who was a guard at a penitentiary, was indicted for aiding prisoners to escape. It was held that the confession of the defendant to the effect that "the door that he should have kept locked in order to guard his charges properly, and which he was instructed to keep locked, the key being in his possession, was left open," sufficiently corroborated the testimony of his accomplices who were prisoners and for whose escape the prosecution was had. The court said: "While this corroboration of what the witnesses testified to is slight, yet if the corroborating testimony was sufficient to satisfy the jury that the accomplices had testified truly, the jury were authorized to find a verdict of guilty." In State v. Hennessy, 55 Ia. 209, 7 N. W. 641, an instruction that "admissions made by the defendant to detective Smith, and other admissions made to Moran and to the deputy sheriff, Batham, are competent evidence, and if you find that they tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense, then the accomplices are corroborated," was held to be proper. The court said: "The instruction would have been plainer if it had directed the jury that it was for them to find from the evidence whether such admissions were made. But that there were conversations between these witnesses and the defendant the evidence shows without conflict, and as the jury were required by the instruction to determine the effect of such interviews, and whether they tended to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense, we think the instruction was not misleading."

In Bales v. State (Tex.) 44 S. W. 617, the defendant was prosecuted for incest. He testified on chief that he did not have intercourse with his accomplice, but on cross-examination he said: "I don't think I did such a thing. I might have done so in my sleep." The court in holding that the testimony of the accomplice was sufficiently corroborated, said: "We want no better corroboration of the accomplice, Miss Ella Rose, than the testimony of the appellant. He evidently knew that he had intercourse with his niece, and did not want to admit or deny it directly. We think the testimony of the accomplice is amply corroborated by that or the testimony of the appellant."

In People v. Zimmerman, 65 Cal. 307, 4 Pac. 20, it was held that an accomplice was corroborated by an admission of the defendant connecting himself with the crime.

In Snoddy v. State, 75 Ala. 23, it was held that the confession of the defendant admitting that he was present when a hog was killed but denying complicity in the act itself sufficiently corroborated the testimony of an accomplice implicating the defendant in the larceny of the hog under a statute prohibiting a conviction for a felony on the testimony of an accomplice unless corroborated by evidence tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense. The court said: "The confession of the defendant tended to show his participation in the killing, as well as in the act of carrying off the carcass. He confesses that he was present when the killing took place. This was sufficient to authorize the jury to conclude that he was a participant in the act, in as much as he immediately reaped the fruits of it by aiding in carrying away the carcass. It is no answer to this, that the defendant denied the fact of such participation. The settled and elementary rule as to confessions is, that the whole of what the defendant says on the subject, at the time of making the confession, must be admitted in evidence, and should be construed together by the jury. But all parts of the confession are not entitled to equal weight or credit. The jury may believe that part which inculcates the prisoner, and reject that which is exculpatory, if they see sufficient reason for doing so. What one charged with crime may say in his own favor may be rejected as unworthy of credit, while an admission against interest, or confession of guilt made at the same time, or in the same conversation, may be accepted as very probably true. . . . It was for the jury to determine the weight or degree of credit which should be attached to the confession, and to say whether it satisfactorily corroborated that portion of the statement of the accomplice which connected the defendant with the commission of the offense, which here may be assumed to be the act of killing the animal charge to be stolen."

In Anderson v. State, 34 Tex. Crim. 546, 31 S. W. 673, 53 Am. St. Rep. 722, it was held that the corpus delicti might be proved beyond a reasonable doubt by the testimony of an accomplice aided by the testimony of the defendant. See to the same effect Burk v. State, 50 Tex. Crim. 185, 95 S. W. 1064; Kennedy v. State (Tex.) 180 S. W. 238. In Anderson v. State, supra, it was said: "Was the corpus delicti proven? This must be done beyond a reasonable doubt. We proceed to answer the question upon the hypothesis that James Bagley was an accomplice to the crime. The corpus delicti cannot be proven by the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice. Nor can the corpus delicti be proven alone by the confession of the accused. Must it be proven independently of the confession? This is not necessary. Can the confession aid, corroborate the testimony of the accomplice, and, when both are taken together, be sufficient to prove the corpus delicti beyond a reasonable doubt? We answer, yes, if certain facts are proved—namely, the body of the deceased, or portions thereof, must be found or seen and identified, so as to establish the fact that the person charged to have been killed . . . came to his death by the culpable act or agency of another person. Now, Bagley swears that he was present when appellant shot and killed Kirk; that on the next morning he assisted (by keeping watch) appellant in concealing the corpse. In this testimony we have all the facts which make up the corpus delicti—Kirk's dead body, and that death was caused by the guilty agency of the accused. But was Bagley an accomplice? Concede this; will not the law permit the prosecution to corroborate him as to this fact, as well as to any other corroborative fact? If not, why not? No reason can be given in support of the negative. We are not left in the dark upon this question. People v. Jaehne, 103 N. Y. 182; Carroll v. People, 136 Ill. 456; 3 Greenl. on Ev.; 1 Bish. Crim. Proc. sec. 1071. Bagley testified to facts which, if true, establish the corpus delicti beyond any sort of doubt. Was he corroborated? He was. How? By the confession of the appellant, 'that he had killed Henry Kirk.' Now, then, this evidence most clearly proves the corpus delicti in the manner required by statute, and there was no issue on this question except the credibility of Bagley and the witnesses who swore to the confession."

Patterson v. Com. 86 Ky. 313, 99 Ky. 610, 5 S. W. 387, 765, was decided under a statute providing that a confession of a defendant, unless made in open court, would not warrant a conviction, unless accompanied by proof that an offense was committed, and another statute providing that "a conviction cannot be had upon the testimony of an accomplice, unless corroborated by other evidence tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense." The court in disposing of a contention that the lower court erred in failing to instruct the jury that an accomplice's evidence could not furnish the corroboration necessary to the support of evidence of an extra-judicial confession said: "As the law does not authorize the court to require other and additional evidence than the proof of confession to corroborate the testimony of an accomplice, or other than the testimony of an accomplice to accompany proof of a confession, we think the court properly refused to give the instruction referred to."

But in State v. Hansen, 40 Utah 418, 122 Pac. 375, it was held that in a prosecution for adultery a confession made by the defendant could not be considered as a corroboration of the accomplice's testimony where the confession related to an entirely separate and distinct transaction from the one for which the defendant was tried and convicted.

ALABAMA CITY, GADSEN AND ATTALLA RAILWAY COMPANY

v.

CITY OF GADSEN.

Alabama Supreme Court—December 4, 1913.

185 Ala. 263; 64 So. 91.

Municipal Corporations — Warrants — Agreement for Interest.

A resolution of the mayor and aldermen that interest-bearing warrants be issued to plaintiff lighting company whose claims were past due, which was entered in the minutes and carried into effect by the clerk's interlineation of the provision for interest in the then outstanding warrants, is to be construed as an agreement to pay interest in consideration of plaintiff's continuing to furnish light to the city.

[See note at end of this case.]

Authorization of Warrants — Future Indebtedness.

A resolution of the mayor and aldermen that interest-bearing warrants "be issued covering the amounts due" plaintiff applies only to warrants then due and outstanding, and not to future indebtednesses.

Same.

Where a resolution of the mayor and aldermen authorizes the clerk to issue interest-bearing warrants to plaintiff covering the amounts then due only, the action of the clerk in issuing interest-bearing warrants for debts subsequently accruing does not bind the city.

Municipal Contracts — Necessity of Record.

An informal agreement by the mayor and aldermen that interest should be paid on plaintiff's claims, which was not entered in the minutes of the board for fear other creditors would demand interest, is of no effect.

Same.

The law requires a record of the proceedings of the mayor and aldermen, so that those acting under it may have no occasion to look beyond it, to avoid leaving such proceedings to be proved by parol evidence, and to make certain that rights shall not depend on the mere recollection of witnesses.

Interest on Warrants.

A payment to the holder of city warrants having been accepted as a payment of the principal, with the understanding that the right to more interest than paid should be settled in court, the question whether the amount so paid should be applied first to the payment of interest was eliminated from the case.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Where a resolution of the mayor and aldermen provided for the issuance of interest-bearing warrants to plaintiff, whose claims were past due, which was carried into effect by the clerk's interlineation of the interest provision in outstanding warrants, plaintiff was entitled to interest for the time payment was thereafter further deferred.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

In the absence of constitutional or statutory inhibition, municipal corporations may contract for the payment of interest on warrants drawn to cover ordinary debts.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Code 1907, § 1205, providing that, if no interest is stipulated to be paid on municipal warrants, they shall draw the legal rate after presentation, recognizes a municipality's power to contract to pay interest, but it did not require further presentation of warrants upon which the city agreed to pay interest, upon demand made prior to the enactment of the statute.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Ordinarily city warrants draw interest, if at all, only after presentation to the disbursing officer and denial of payment for want of funds, since a municipal corporation, unlike a private person, is not bound to seek its creditors.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Where a city being confessedly unable to pay plaintiff's warrants, after negotiations with plaintiff agreed to pay interest so as to effect a postponement of payment, such negotiations and agreement were equivalent to a presentation for payment.

[See note at end of this case.]

Interest — Recovery Separate from Principal.

The general rule is that when the principal subject of a claim is extinguished by the act of the plaintiff, or of the parties acting in unison, all its incidents go with it, which rule is applicable where interest is awarded in the way of damages; it being recoverable only in an action for the principal and not constituting a distinct claim.

Same.

Where the payment of interest is provided for by contract, it constitutes an integral part of the debt, as much so as the principal debt itself, and an independent action for its recovery may be maintained notwithstanding payment of the principal as such has been made and accepted.

Accord and Satisfaction — City Warrants.

Evidence, in action to recover interest on city warrants, the principal and part of the interest on which had been paid, held insufficient to establish an accord and satisfaction.

Acceptance in Full Settlement.

To constitute an accord and satisfaction the sum less than the amount actually due must have been accepted in full settlement of the disputed claim.

Municipal Corporations — Presentation of Claims — Necessity.

Code 1907, § 1191, providing that claims against a municipality must be presented within a certain time or they shall be barred, is a statute of nonclaim, and presentation within its provision is not prerequisite to the bringing of suit.

Same.

A municipality cannot by ordinance impose on its creditors the duty of presentation of claims as a condition to the bringing of suit.

Interest on Warrants.

Where no date for payment of interest-bearing city warrants was stipulated, interest on the interest due should be allowed from the date of bringing suit, which event fixed the time when the interest became due and payable.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from City Court of Gadsden: DISQUE, Judge.

Assumpsit to recover interest on city warrants. Alabama City, Gadsden and Attalla Railway Company, plaintiff, and City of Gadsden, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

O. R. Hood for appellant.

M. C. Sivley for appellee.

[266] SAYER, J.—Appellant company had been furnishing light to the city of Gadsden under a contract calling for monthly settlements, and appellee had fallen far behind in making payment. Appellant demanding its money, and appellee being unable to pay, negotiation between them resulted in the adoption of a resolution by the board of mayor and aldermen on October 1, 1906, as follows: "Resolved by the mayor and board of aldermen of the city of Gadsden that warrants be issued covering the amounts due, bearing interest at the rate of eight per cent. per annum, and the clerk be instructed to issue said warrants." The resolution was shown by the minutes of the board, and was carried into effect, so far as concerned the issue of warrants, by the clerk's interlineation of words into then outstanding warrants which imported that they were to bear interest. Viewed in connection with the evidence as to the previous contention between the parties, we think this resolution cannot be fairly construed otherwise than as an agreement on the part of the city, on the consideration that appellant would continue to carry the warrants then due and continue to furnish light under its contract, to pay interest on warrants then due and outstanding. We find no sufficient justification in the language employed for an interpretation which would bring future indebtedness within the scope and influence of the resolution. For a time the clerk issued warrants for subsequently accruing claims on account of light furnished which purported to bear interest. But this feature of the later warrants created no obligation on the city for the reason that in wording them as interest bearing [267] the clerk acted without authority. True, there was testimony going to show an informal agreement by the members of the board of aldermen of later date that interest should be paid; but this agreement found no place upon the record of the proceedings of the board of aldermen. In fact, the understanding of the parties and the direction of the board was that the so-called agreement should not be spread upon the minutes, this because it was supposed that publicity in the matter would stimulate other creditors of the city to demand interest on their deferred claims and because there was an appreciation of the consideration that all creditors in like case were entitled to like treatment. This manner of dealing with the so-called agreement rendered it null and of no effect. The law requires a record to the end that those who may be called to act under it may have no occasion to look beyond it; to avoid the mischief of leaving municipal corporate action to be proved by parol evidence; to make it certain that rights which have accrued under such actions shall not be destroyed or affected by the always fallible and often wholly unreliable recollection of witnesses, however truthful and intelligent they may be."—2 McQuillan, Munn. Corp. p. 1358. This is the doctrine of our cases.—Perryman v. Greenville, 51 Ala. 507; Greenville v. Greenville Water Works Co., 125 Ala. 623, 27 So. 764.

On January 1, 1909, a number of warrants in favor of appellant, including those covered by the resolution of October 1, 1906, and as well others of later issue, were presented to the city treasurer for payment; but payment was denied for lack of funds. On December 31, 1909, appellant received payment of the principal of all these warrants with interest from the date of presentation to the treasurer, such interest being paid under authority of section 1205 of the Code of 1907 (Act [268] of Aug. 13, 1907, p. 820, § 54), which provides that, "if no interest is stipulated to be paid on warrants drawn upon the treasurer and not paid for want of funds, then the legal rate shall be allowed from the time of presentation," etc., the denial of interest for the antecedent time being based, as the brief for appellee would seem to indicate, upon the theory that the municipality was without authority to contract for the payment of interest.

This action was brought to recover a balance due of interest claimed. The evidence shows very clearly that appellant (plaintiff below) has received the principal of the debt in controversy and received the same as a payment of the principal with the understanding and purpose that the contention as to whether appellee was further liable on account of interest should be settled by a resort to the courts, thus eliminating all question as to whether the amount so received should be applied first to the payment of interest.

Our judgment is that appellant was also entitled to interest upon the indebtedness covered by the resolution contract of October 1, 1906, to the date of the payment made, less of course, any interest then paid. In view of the city's inability to meet its obligation to appellant at the time, the meaning of the contract was that appellant should receive interest during the time payment should be further deferred.

Municipal corporations, in the absence of constitutional or statutory inhibition, may contract for the payment of interest on their warrants drawn to cover ordinary debts.—2 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, (2d ed.) 26; State v. Stout, 43 Wash. 501, 86 Pac. 848, 10 Ana. Cas. 208 note. Section 1205 of the Code, to which we have referred, recognizes this law. This section did not, however, operate to require further presentation of the [269] claim upon the indebtedness affected by the resolution contract of October 1, 1906. Ordinarily, city warrants draw interest, if at all, after they have been presented to the disbursing officer and payment denied for want of funds, this because a municipal corporation, unlike a private person, is not bound to seek its creditors.—10 Ann. Cas. supra. The negotiation and agreement between the parties to this case, had in view of the city's confessed inability to pay, and with the intent and effect of postponing the date of payment, was the equivalent of a presentation within the rule of the authorities. It established between the parties that status which exists between private persons standing in the relation of debtor and creditor plus an express agreement to pay interest.

Appellee insists that appellant's suit should not be entertained for the reason that it seeks to recover interest only; that the right to recover interest, which is a mere incident to and increment of the principal debt, was lost when payment of the principal was accepted. The general rule is that when the principal subject of a claim is extinguished by the act of the plaintiff, or of the parties acting in unison, all its incidents go with it. Such is the rule where by statute or the practice of the courts interest is awarded in the way of damages. In such case it does not constitute a distinct claim and can only be recovered in an action for the principal; but, where the payment of interest is provided for by contract, it constitutes an integral part of the debt, as much so as the principal debt itself, and an independent action for its recovery may be sustained notwithstanding payment of the principal as such has been made and accepted.—22 Cyc. 1571 et seq. Our cases hold nothing to the contrary. In Westcott v. Waller, 47 Ala. 492, payment of the principal by a debtor of doubtful solvency was made and received in full satisfaction. [270] That was held to be a good accord and satisfaction. In Crowder v. Red Mountain Min. Co. 127 Ala. 254, 29 So. 847, the pertinent ruling was that a contract void as to the principal debt was void also as to any interest accruing on such principal. Other cases cited by appellee to this point may be discriminated from the case at hand by the fact that in them there was no express contract to pay interest.

Appellee contends that there was an accord and satisfaction when appellant accepted the principal of its debt and such increment of interest as the appellee was willing to pay. This contention presents an issue of fact, depending upon the intent with which the payment was made and received, and must upon the testimony be resolved in favor of appellant. The board of mayor and aldermen had determined to pay the amount which was subsequently paid upon condition that appellant would receive same in full of its claim. Appellant did not agree. The matter was then referred to a committee consisting of the mayor and some members of the aldermanic board, which committee was raised to disburse the funds secured by an issue of bonds to pay the city's floating debt, and had power to act in the premises. This committee authorized the mayor to settle appellant's claim as the board of mayor and aldermen had proposed. But in fact appellant settled with the distinct understanding on its part that it would not yield its claim to the interest here sued for and would seek to determine its right thereto in an action at law. Appellee seems to base its contention for its plea of accord and satisfaction on the idea that the mayor, acting for the committee, which in turn was acting for the board of the mayor and aldermen, had no authority to make payment except upon the condition that it should be accepted in full of appellant's claim. But the question of the mayor's authority is not involved. [271] The question is upon what understanding appellant, assuming of course that it acted in good faith and without misleading appellee's agent or agents, received the payment, and the proof is as we have stated it. On these facts there was no accord and satisfaction. To constitute an accord and satisfaction the sum less than the amount actually due must have been accepted by appellant in full settlement of its disputed claim.—Hodges v. Tennessee Implement Co. 123 Ala. 572, 26 So. 490.

We have decided that section 1191 of the Code of 1907 is a statute of nonclaim, and that presentation within its provision is not prerequisite to the bringing of a suit.—Anderson v. Birmingham, 177 Ala. 302, 58 So. 256. It hardly seems necessary to say that the municipality could not by ordinance impose the duty of prior presentation upon creditors of the city. In sustaining the demurrer to the complaint on the ground that it failed to aver a presentation of the claim to the city council or the clerk before suit brought, if that was the ground upon which the ruling proceeded, the court erred.

Interest on the interest due, in the circumstances of this case, no date for the payment of the deferred warrants having been stipulated, should be allowed, it seems, from the date of the bringing of the suit. That event fixed the time when interest under the contract became due and payable.—Ragland v. Wood, 71 Ala. 145, 46 Am. Rep. 305; Stickney v. Moore, 108 Ala. 590, 19 So. 76.

In order that a judgment may be rendered in accordance with our views, the evidence remaining the same, the judgment will be reversed, the cause remanded.

Reversed and remanded.

NOTE.

Interest on City Warrants.

The rule laid down in State v. Stout, 43 Wash. 501, 10 Ann. Cas. 208, that a municipality may by ordinance or contract provide for the payment of interest on its warrants, finds support in the reported case and in the recent case of Merchants' Loan, etc. Co. v. Chicago, 264 Ill. 76, 105 N. E. 726, affirming 182 Ill. App. 298. In that case it appeared that a city passed an ordinance requiring property owners to advance money for the construction of water mains, and authorizing the issuance of certificates or warrants providing for the payment of interest at five per cent, if at the expiration of two years the money loaned was not repaid. The plaintiff who held such a certificate sued on it and was permitted to recover the interest. The court said: "Under the statutes and the constant practice of government officials, it is manifest that to require the city to pay the interest in accordance with the terms of its express agreement is not contrary to public policy." See also Chicago v. Harford, 238 Ill. 552, 87 N. E. 325.

Where there is a statutory provision allowing interest on city warrants it has been held that a city is liable on its interest bearing warrants. Thus in Cogswell v. Escanaba, 176 Mich. 156, 142 N. W. 549, wherein it appeared that a city purchased certain voting machines and gave an interest-bearing certificate of indebtedness the court held that the holder of the certificate was entitled to interest resting its decision on Darling v. Mainstee, 166 Mich. 35, 131 N. W. 450, wherein it was remarked that a statute existed in Michigan authorizing the purchase of voting machines and the issuance of certificates of indebtedness providing for the payment of interest. In Drexel State Bank v. La Moure, 207 Fed. 702, it appeared that by statute in North Dakota, a city is authorized to issue special warrants in connection with the construction of public improvements, bearing interest at seven per cent payable at maturity. And in Chicago v. People, 116 Ill. App. 564, it was held that a municipality was liable for interest on vouchers issued for funds used in local improvements.

The recent decisions as to the right to recover interest on city warrants in the absence of statutory regulation or agreement hold that owners of city warrants or certificates are not entitled to interest. Thus in University State Bank v. Bremerton, 86 Wash. 261, 150 Pac. 439, it was held that a warrant expressly stipulating on its face that it was a noninterest-bearing instrument, did not carry interest. The court said: "Plaintiff contends also that the court erred in not allowing interest upon the warrants. Its warrant expressly stipulates that it is a non-interest-bearing instrument. This being true, we fail to see that the trial court committed any error in this regard." Substantially to the same effect was Weidner v. Reading, 20 Pa. Dist. 721. And in State v. New Orleans, 129 La. 537, 56 So. 433, it was held that the City of New Orleans, acting as an agent or trustee in managing the affairs of the metropolitan police board was not liable for the payment of interest on warrants issued by that board, it being merely an agency of the state. But in Barber Asphalt Paving Co. v. Chicago, 139 Ill. App. 121, it was held that a city was liable for the payment of interest after maturity where the city refused payment of certain vouchers at their maturity. It was said: "Municipalities become liable for interest in three cases—where there is an express agreement, where money has been wrongfully obtained by them and where money is illegally withheld by them."

In Heutermaun v. Church (Tex.) 150 S. W. 212, wherein it appeared that a provision in a city charter forbade the issuance of warrants bearing interest, an arrangement entered into by the city with a bank, to protect the city's credit by furnishing money to meet warrants which the city had not sufficient funds to pay, for which the bank received warrants with the understanding that they were to bear interest, was held not to be enforceable because of the prohibition in the city charter. The court said: "The city's charter (section 112), provides for the issuance of warrants on the city treasurer to creditors of the city, expressly stating, however: 'And such warrants shall not bear interest.' Section 115 reads: 'City warrants shall not bear interest and shall not be receivable for taxes,' etc. These provisions amount, we think, to an express direction against the payment by the city of interest on warrants issued by it." But in San Antonio v. Alamo Nat. Bank (Tex.) 155 S. W. 620, it was held under a statute providing that all judgments should bear interest, that a judgment on city warrants bore interest though by the terms of an ordinance the warrants did not, as the obligation on the warrants became merged in the judgment.

In Merchants' Loan, etc. Co. v. Chicago, 264 Ill. 76, 105 N. E. 726, a certificate or warrant stipulating for the payment of interest after two years was held to govern the time from which the interest commenced to run. In Drexel State Bank v. La Moure, 207 Fed. 702, wherein it appeared that the City of La Moure under statutory authorization issued certain special warrants for the purpose of making certain public improvements, it was held that the warrants bore interest from their maturity and that presentation for payment was not necessary to start the running of interest. While the reported case recognizes the ordinary rule that interest on city warrants commences to run from the time when presentation to the disbursing officer is made and payment is denied, it appears that actual presentation was unnecessary in that case because of the city's confessed inability to pay as evidenced by the negotiations between the parties.

STATES ACCIDENT INSURANCE COMPANY.

Illinois Supreme Court—February 17, 1915.

267 Ill. 267; 108 N. E. 296.

Accident Insurance — Injury Received while Fighting.

Where an accident policy insures against an injury effected exclusively by accidental means, insured, who assaulted a third person, and was attacked and knocked down, breaking his leg, cannot recover under the policy, though insured intended by a single blow to render the third person unable to defend himself, for an effect which is the natural and probable consequence of an act or a course of action is not produced by "accidental means."

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Appellate Court, Fourth District.

Action on accident insurance policy. John W. Hutton, plaintiff, and States Accident Insurance Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff in Circuit Court, Jasper county: Rose, Judge. Judgment affirmed by Appellate Court. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. Reversed.

Fithian & Kasserman and McKenna O'Leary for appellant.

William B. Wright for appellee.

[267] COOKE, J.—The appellee, John W. Hutton, obtained a judgment in the circuit court of Jasper county against the appellant, the States Accident Insurance Company, for $500, which was affirmed by the Appellate Court for the Fourth District. A certificate of importance having been granted, this appeal has been perfected from the judgment of the Appellate Court.

The suit was brought upon a policy of accident insurance issued by appellant which insured the appellee against "injuries effected exclusively by external, violent and accidental means." The record discloses that at the close of appellee's case, and again at the close of all the evidence, a peremptory instruction was offered to find the issues for [268] the appellant, which was refused in each instance. In the Appellate Court this action of the court was assigned for error, and the errors there assigned have been re-assigned here. While in the argument of appellant this action of the court is not specifically referred to, the effect of the argument made is that there was no evidence tending to support appellee's claim or to disclose a cause of action, and this is the only question of law presented upon this appeal. Counsel for appellee in his brief states: "If this case has any standing in the Supreme Court it is upon the theory that there is no evidence in the record on behalf of plaintiff which, standing alone, and undisputed, would support the verdict of the jury; in other words, if it is rightfully here it is because the court refused, at the close of plaintiff's evidence and at the close of all the evidence, to instruct the jury to find the issues for the defendant," and his argument, in effect, is directed to upholding the action of the court in refusing the peremptory instructions. We shall therefore consider the case as though this action of the court was specifically mentioned by appellant as the ground relied upon for reversal.

There was practically no conflict in the testimony of the various witnesses as to the facts. According to the testimony of appellee, in which the facts are presented in as favorable light as by any other witness, there had been some little difficulty between him and one John Huddleston prior to November 9, 1911. On that evening he and Huddleston had a conversation in the city of Newton in reference to their difficulty, after which appellee went to his office. Having finished his work there he went to a restaurant in that city to get his supper. As he entered the restaurant from the west he saw Huddleston sitting on a stool on the south side of the room, at a lunch counter. Without saying a word to Huddleston appellee walked up behind him and struck him a blow with his fist on the side of the face or head, intending, as he states, to hit him so hard that [269] "he wouldn't get up and begin it all over." The blow did not have the desired effect. Huddleston immediately arose from his seat, whereupon the appellee struck at him again. Huddleston then pushed or knocked appellee down, breaking his leg. It is uncertain from the testimony of appellee whether his leg was broken in the fall or whether it was twisted and broken before he fell, but in any event it was broken, according to the undisputed testimony, while he was engaged in the fight with Huddleston.

Appellant contends that where an accident policy insures against an injury effected exclusively by accidental means there can be no recovery where such injury is the result of the voluntary act of the insured although such result may be entirely unexpected and undesigned, and insists that the evidence does not even tend to prove that the injury was caused by accidental means, inasmuch as appellee had voluntarily engaged in a fight, of which the injury received was but the natural and probable consequence. The contention of appellee is based upon the proposition that his act in assaulting Huddleston was attended with an unexpected and unusual result,—that is, the breaking of his leg,—and one which could not have been reasonably anticipated and which he did not intend to produce. We are of the opinion that the position of appellee is not tenable. Where one voluntarily and deliberately engages in a fight or brawl and places another in a position where he, too, must fight to defend himself, it is a natural result, and one known to all sensible men as likely to follow, that one or both of the combatants will receive more or less serious injury. As to whether the assailant or the one assailed would be the more likely to be injured would depend upon the comparative strength and skill of the antagonists as well as upon the fortunes of the combat. It is shown in this case that both appellee and Huddleston were large, powerful men, possessed of more than average physical strength. While appellee testifies that it was his intention to render Huddleston [270] incapable of defending himself by a single blow, he was bound to take notice of the fact that he might not be able to accomplish that design, and that if he then persisted in the attack the chances were largely in favor of Huddleston exercising the right to defend himself by all necessary means. Appellee persisted in the assault upon Huddleston after having failed to accomplish his purpose in striking the first blow and continued the same up until the instant that his leg was broken. In the meantime Huddleston was defending himself solely by the use of his arms and fists. Appellee was a practicing physician and surgeon, thirty-five years of age at the time of the assault, and a man of intelligence and experience. He was bound to know that one of the natural and probable consequences of voluntarily engaging in an assault under such circumstances was that he might be injured, although he could not, of course, foresee the exact form of the injury he might receive, or, indeed, be able to know certainly that he would be injured at all. Such being true and the assault committed upon Huddleston being the deliberate and voluntary act of appellee, the injury which he received as a result cannot be said to have been caused by accidental means.

An effect which is the natural and probable consequence of an act or course of action cannot be said to be produced by accidental means. (1 Cyc. 248.) In Fidelity, etc. Co. v. Stacey, 143 Fed. 271, 6 Ann. Cas. 955, 74 C. C. A. 409, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 657, suit was brought upon a policy which insured against disability or death resulting, directly and independently of all other causes, from bodily injuries sustained through external, violent and accidental means. In that case the insured committed an assault upon one Porter, striking him in the face with his fist. As a result of the blow there was an abrasion of the skin on the hand of the insured which afterwards became infected and resulted in his death. It was there held that an injury received in this way was not by accidental means within the meaning of the policy.

[271] In Taliaferro v. Travelers' Protective Assoc. 80 Fed. 368, 49 U. S. App. 275, 25 C. C. A. 494, it was held that the death of the insured was not accidental where it appeared that in an altercation with another he was the first to draw his pistol, and, after stating that he "must have revenge" and warning the other "to put himself in shape," struck him in the face with his pistol, whereupon the other drew his own pistol and shot the insured, causing his death. In passing upon the question the court there said that "the deceased voluntarily engaged in an encounter with deadly weapons, the result of which was not an unlikely result but was such as any reasonable person might have foreseen," and that if a man should do an act from which it was possible death might not result but of which death would be the naturally expected result, such death could not be said to be accidental.

In Lovelace v. Travelers' Protective Assoc. 126 Mo. 104, 28 S. W. 877, 47 Am. St. Rep. 638, 30 L.R.A. 209, Lovelace, the insured, attempted to eject a man who was drunken and boisterous from the office of a hotel. In doing this he used no other means than his hands, and while making the attempt the other drew a pistol and shot him, causing his death. The court there held that the death of Lovelace was an accident and not a risk voluntarily assumed, inasmuch as he had made the attempt to eject the other by force from the office of the hotel without knowing that the other person was armed. In this case a different question would be presented if Huddlestun had resisted the attack on appellee by the use of a deadly weapon, but instead of that it is conclusively shown that the assault was met in kind and that he used no more than the necessary means which would have been employed by any reasonable man in his defense.

In Prudential Casualty Co. v. Curry, 10 Cal. App. 642, 65 So. 852, it was held that where the insured in an accident policy, while armed with a gun, brought on a difficulty with a third person also armed with a gun, with knowledge of that fact, and the third person shot the insured in self-defense, his [272] death was not occasioned by accidental means, for an accident may be said to be an unforeseen or unexpected event of which the insured's own misconduct is not the natural and proximate cause, and hence a result ordinarily and naturally flowing from the conduct of the insured cannot be said to be accidental even when he may not have foreseen the consequence, and the happening of an event, to be termed an accident, must not only be unforeseen but without the design and aid of the insured.

The above cases, while not involving the identical facts here presented, lay down the principle which must govern. Applying the rules there announced, we must hold that the evidence on behalf of appellee does not tend to show that the injury sustained by appellee was caused by accidental means, but does show that it was the natural and probable result of his voluntary act in making the assault upon Huddlestun.

The court erred in refusing to give the peremptory instructions. For this error the judgments of the Appellate and circuit courts are reversed and the cause remanded to the circuit court.

Reversed and remanded.

Farmer, J., dissenting.

NOTE.

Right to Recover under Accident Insurance Policy for Injuries Received while Fighting.

Generally.

If the insured in an accident insurance policy voluntarily and deliberately engages in a fight as the aggressor, and receives injuries which are the natural and probable consequence of his act, there can be no recovery under the policy as the injuries cannot be said to be produced by accidental means. Taliaferro v. Travelers' Protective Assoc. 80 Fed. 368, 49 U. S. App. 275, 25 C. C. A. 494; Fidelity, etc. Co. v. Stacey, 143 Fed. 271, 6 Am. Cas. 955, 74 O. C. A. 409, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 65, reversing 137 Fed. 1012; Prudential Casualty Co. v. Curry, 10 Ala. App. 642, 65 So. 852; Gaines v. Fidelity, etc. Co. 111 App. Div. 386, 97 N. Y. S. 836, affirmed 188 N. Y. 411, 11 Ann. Cas. 71, 81 N. E. 169; Fidelity, etc. Co. v. Smith, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 111, 71 S. W. 391. And see the reported Case. In Fidelity, etc. Co. v. Stacey, supra, it appeared that the insured committed an assault and received an abrasion of the skin of one of his fingers. Subsequently the finger became infected, and blood poisoning resulted, from the effect of which he died shortly thereafter. The policy insured "against disability or death resulting directly, and independently of all other causes, from bodily injuries sustained through external, violent, and accidental means." The court said: "Everything connected with the transaction clearly indicates that the insured intended to do exactly what he did on that occasion. Therefore the injury which he received at the time was the natural and logical result of an intentional act on his part. He was a man of intelligence, and it must be presumed that he knew that in making an assault with his fist in the manner described he would probably sustain more or less injury to himself. . . . In order to enable one to recover in an action based on an accident policy on account of accidental injury, it must be shown that the insured would be entitled to recover for the original injury; and unless it appears that such original injury was due to an accident then known, or the results flowing therefrom could be imputed to the result of an accident, recovery could not be had. All other results are accidental causes disconnected with the original cause, and cannot be said to flow therefrom. . . . In view of the facts in this case we are of opinion that the injury received in the first instance was not due to an accident, and therefore the results which flowed therefrom cannot be said to be due to an accidental cause. Such being the case, the court below should have instructed the jury that there was not sufficient legal evidence upon which to base a finding in favor of the defendants in error; and should have directed them to return a verdict in favor of the plaintiff in error. The court erred in refusing to instruct the jury to that effect." In Taliaferro v. Travelers' Protective Assoc. 80 Fed. 368, 49 U. S. App. 275, 25 C. C. A. 494, the sole question involved was whether the death of the insured was occasioned by accident, within the meaning of that term as used in the policy. It appeared that the deceased had been the aggressor in an altercation and was shot and killed after he had drawn his gun and struck his adversary in the face with it. The court said: "Where a person thus invites another to a deadly encounter, and does so voluntarily, his death, if he sustains a mortal wound, cannot be regarded as accidental by any definition of that term which has heretofore been adopted. It might as well be claimed that death is accidental when a man intentionally throws himself across a railroad track in front of an approaching train, or leaps from a high precipice, or swallows a deadly poison. It is possible that death may not result from either of these acts, but death is the result which would naturally be expected, and, if such is the result, it is not accidental." In Prudential Casualty Co. v. Curry, 10 Ala. App. 642, 65 So. 852, commented on and approved in the reported case, the court said: "In this case it appears from the undisputed facts that the insured, . . . was at fault in bringing on the difficulty that resulted in his death, and that he accosted T. who was passing along the public road, and whom he knew to be armed with a deadly weapon, profanely challenging his relation with 'some women' and presenting a Winchester rifle at T. 'cocked and ready to shoot Teague.' That T. should thereupon defend himself by shooting and mortally wounding [insured] with the rifle gun he carried in plain view could not be said to be unforeseen. . . . The risk of death having been voluntarily assumed under these circumstances by the insured . . . and death having been produced by those means which were reasonably calculated to cause it, his death cannot be said to have been an accident under the terms of the policy insuring against death through accidental means; nor can it be said to have been produced through accidental means." In Fidelity, etc. Co. v. Smith, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 111, 71 S. W. 391, it appeared that the insured made an unprovoked assault on one B. and was injured by the latter in defending himself from the assault. The court said: "The testimony clearly shows an unjustifiable assault by the plaintiff upon the witness B. It is true that B. stated that he did not intend to injure the plaintiff, and that the injuries inflicted were accidental, but on cross-examination he said: 'I struck the plaintiff in the scuffle, and that was all there was to it. He only threw one chair at me. I didn't do anything after that. He was struck about that time by myself to protect myself. I struck him to keep him from making any further advances on me, and that in self-defense.' The language quoted shows that B. struck the plaintiff for the purpose of protecting himself; and while he may not have intended to inflict all the injury that was inflicted, his striking the plaintiff was by design and not accidental." In Gaines v. Fidelity, etc. Co. 111 App. Div. 386, 97 N. Y. S. 36, affirmed 188 N. Y. 411, 11 Ann. Cas. 71, 81 N. E. 169, it was held that there was sufficient testimony to justify the conclusion that the deceased came to his death as the result of an assault committed by him on the person of one C., that the shooting by C. which followed was the direct result of the assault, and that the injuries inflicted on the insured, which caused his death, were intentional and not accidental, thereby depriving the beneficiary of any right to recover under the policy.

If, however, an insured person engages in a fight and suffers unforeseen or unexpected injuries there may be a recovery under a policy insuring against injuries produced by accidental means. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Wynne, 107 Ga. 584, 34 S. E. 113; Lovelace v. Travelers' Protective Assoc. 126 Mo. 104, 28 S. W. 877, 47 Am. St. Rep. 638, 30 L.R.A. 209; Union Accident Co. v. Wilis, 44 Okla. 578, 145 Pac. 812, L.R.A. 1915D 358; Union Casualty, etc., Co. v. Harroll, 98 Tenn. 591, 40

S. W. 1080, 60 Am. St. Rep. 873. Thus in Lovelace v. Travelers' Protective Assoc. supra, commented on in the reported case, it appeared that the insured was shot and killed while attempting to eject the slayer from the office of a hotel. In deciding whether the occurrence was an "accident" within the terms of the policy sued on, the court made a distinction between the natural and the unforeseen risks assumed by the insured, and said: "It may be assumed that, by his course of conduct, he voluntarily assumed the risks of a fight. But there is nothing in the circumstances to show that he voluntarily assumed the risk of death. We consider his killing an 'accident,' in the popular and ordinary sense in which that word is generally used. It certainly was an accident, so far as he was concerned. We do not doubt that such should be the construction given to the word in the contract in suit; and that, in so concluding, we give effect to the true purpose and intent of the parties to the document." In Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Wyness, 107 Ga. 584, 34 S. E. 113, it appeared that the insured held a policy insuring him against "bodily injuries effected . . . through external, violent, and accidental means." The policy stipulated that it did not cover "intentional injuries inflicted by the insured or any other person," etc. After the death of the insured his wife brought suit on the policy; and the defense was that the insured came to his death as the result of intentional injury or injuries inflicted on him by one K. by means of a pistol. According to the testimony the insured and another were in a bar room, engaged in a discussion touching their relative physical prowess. K. entered, inquired as to the discussion and flourished a pistol. The insured exclaimed "Put up that damned thing; it is liable to go off," and grabbed it. K. attempted to retain his hold on it, and a scuffle for its possession ensued, during which a bystander ran up and seized K.'s arm. Just then the pistol was discharged inflicting the fatal wound. The court said: "It is well settled by the great weight of authority that where one person injures another, and the injury is not the result of misconduct or participation of the injured party, but is unforeseen by him; it is, as to him, accidental, although it may be inflicted intentionally by the other party." In Union Accident Co. v. Willis, 44 Okla. 578, 145 Pac. 812, L.R.A.1915D 358, it appeared that the policy provided for payment in the event that the insured should sustain personal bodily injury, effected directly and independently from all other causes, through external, violent and purely accidental means. It was further provided that no indemnity should be paid for injuries intentionally inflicted on the insured by himself or some other person.

The insured was knocked down by a blow in the face struck by another individual, and sustained a fracture of the skull, resulting in his death. The testimony as to the origin of the trouble and as to who was the aggressor was conflicting. The court held that the death was accidental as to the insured and said: "The result was unforeseen and unusual, and not such as would ordinarily follow a blow with the fist. It was not the logical result of a deliberate act, and could not reasonably have been anticipated. . . . It was the result of fortuitous circumstances." In Union Casualty, etc. Co. v. Harroll, 98 Tenn. 591, 40 S. W. 1080, 60 Am. St. Rep. 873, it was held that the death of the insured would be accidental although it appeared that he was advancing on his adversary in a threatening manner at the time the latter shot him, if the deceased did not know at the time that his adversary was armed with a deadly weapon. And for the same reason it was held that he had not voluntarily exposed himself to unnecessary danger, so as to defeat a recovery under the policy sued on. In Collins v. Fidelity, etc. Co. 63 Mo. App. 253, the court said: "An injury not anticipated and not naturally to be expected as a probable result, by the insured, though intentionally inflicted by another, is an accidental injury within the terms of the policy." See to the same effect Accident Ins. Co. v. Bennett, 90 Tenn. 256, 16 S. W. 723, 25 Am. St. Rep. 685.

For cases discussing generally the construction of a provision in an accident insurance relating to injuries resulting from the "intentional act" of the insured or another see the note to Ryan v. Continental Casualty Co. Ann. Cas. 1914C 1234.

If the insured is defending himself or is retreating from the attack of an adversary and receives an unforeseen or unintentional injury there may be a recovery under a policy insuring against injuries produced by accidental means. Phelan v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 38 Mo. App. 640; Myers v. Maryland Casualty Co. 123 Mo. App. 682, 101 S. W. 124; Erb v. Commonwealth Mut. Acc. Co. 232 Pa. St. 215; 81 Atl. 267. See also Newsome v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 143 Ga. 785, 85 S. E. 1035. See also Allen v. Travelers' Protective Assoc. 168 Ia. 217, 143 N. W. 574. In Phelan v. Travelers' Ins. Co. supra, it appeared that the plaintiff was injured while defending himself from an unexpected attack. The court said: "The defendant is unquestionably liable unless it escapes by reason of two of the conditions of the contract of insurance, or by either of such conditions. The first of these conditions is, that the injury shall happen 'through external, violent and accidental means.' The second is, that when the injury is occasioned by intentional injuries inflicted by the insured or any other person.' As to the first point, there is no doubt here but that the injury to plaintiff was from external and violent means and the only question is, was it accidental? An accident, as commonly understood, is an occurrence which is not intended; and therefore a thing which is done intentionally is not done accidentally. But as to the condition of the policy now under consideration, we must restrict the words, accident and intentionally as they will apply to the conduct of the insured as distinguished from the conduct of the party doing the injury. . . . We are of the opinion that as to the plaintiff, the injury though intentionally inflicted by his assailant, was an accident within the meaning of the policy, and for which, but for the second condition above quoted, defendant would be liable." In Erb v. Commonwealth Mut. Acc. Co. 232 Pa. St. 215, 81 Atl. 207, it appeared that the insured was killed by shots from a pistol in the hand of his wife's sister, as they were fighting for its possession. The assault had been started by the deceased but at the time of the shooting he had withdrawn and was acting in defense. It was also found that the shooting was unintentional. The court said: "Under the words of the policy the death of an insured would not be effected by accidental means if it were not the natural and probable consequences of his own act, and should have been foreseen. It would not be accidental if the result of a duel or of a deadly assault commenced by him where he had reason to expect a deadly defense and generally where by his conduct he had invited violence, the reasonable consequence of which he should have anticipated. But under the facts of this case, the insured had no occasion to anticipate danger when he began the assault; he continued the struggle after he had lost the pistol to prevent its use against himself and had withdrawn from the conflict when he received the fatal wound."

Particular Clauses in Policy.

Where the accident policy sued under contains a specific clause against fighting, and it appears that the insured was injured in a fight in which he was the aggressor, there can be no recovery. Gresham v. Equitable Acc. Ins. Co. 87 Ga. 497, 13 S. E. 752, 27 Am. St. Rep. 263, 13 L.R.A. 838; Washington v. Union Casualty, etc. Co. 115 Mo. App. 627, 91 S. W. 988; Morris v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (Tex.) 43 S. W. 898. In Gresham v. Equitable Acc. Ins. Co. supra, it appeared that the accident policy sued on covered, bodily injuries inflicted by external, violent and accidental means. It excepted, however, various classes of accidental injuries which might be embraced in those general terms, among them being those caused by duelling, fighting, wrestling, etc., those happening in consequence of voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, hazard or perilous adventure, or while engaged in, or in consequence of, any unlawful act, and all injuries the result of design, either on the part of the claimant or any other person. The court said: "A faultless and unwilling conflict by the insured, one which he neither provoked nor invited, one which he did not accept when formally or informally tendered, one in which he was forced to engage for self-defence alone and from which he withdrew, or endeavored in good faith to withdraw, when his defence was accomplished, ought not to, and would not, be treated as a causative fight on his part within the meaning and intent of the policy, but would be regarded as right and proper resistance to aggressive or offensive violence. . . . In order to attribute to the insured anything caused by the fight he must have had some voluntary agency in causing the fight itself. If he had such agency, if by improper speech or voluntary conduct he was a material factor in bringing on the fight, he was, as between himself or his wife and the insurance company, chargeable with the consequences. If the fight was the cause of the mortal injury, and he was the cause of the fight, whether in whole or in part, he was, to that extent, the cause of his own death. If he begat the fight, and the fight begat the shooting, and the shooting begat the injury, he bore an ancestral relation to the last offspring as well as to the first. At all events, being father to the fight, neither he nor his wife, under the terms of this policy, could profit by the fight or by what it brought forth." In Washington v. Union Casualty, etc. Co. 115 Mo. App. 627, 91 S. W. 988, the court said: "The present action is based on a policy of insurance. The judgment in the trial court was for the plaintiff. The plaintiff became engaged in a difficulty with another, in which we shall assume the other party was the aggressor and that plaintiff was without fault. In the difficulty, the other party threw a brick at plaintiff striking him on the arm and injuring him. The policy contained the following clause: 'This insurance does not cover disability from chronic or venereal diseases or diseases not common to both sexes; or from diseases resulting from the use of intoxicants or narcotics; or from disease or sickness or injuries resulting from a surgical operation; or from injuries intentionally inflicted upon the assured or received while or in consequence of violating the law, or fighting.' There can be no doubt that the judgment rendered is in the face of the express provision of the policy. That provision is that, if the injury was intentionally inflicted, there was no liability. In other words there was no insurance for such character of injury. Such has been the decision in a number of cases directly on the question." In Morris v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (Tex.) 43 S. W. 898, it appeared that the accident policy sued on insured against all accidents except those arising from causes therein mentioned, which were accidents from fighting, from violating law and from intentional injuries inflicted by the insured or another. The insured was killed in a fight brought on by himself. The court said: "It was admitted by appellants that [insured] came to his death while engaged in a fight brought on by himself, and in open violation of law, and that the policy was thereby rendered null and void."

However, it has been held that where the insured is fighting in self-defense and sustains an injury there may be a recovery under an accident policy although it contains a specific clause against fighting. Thus in Coles v. New York Casualty Co. 87 App. Div. 41, 83 N. Y. S. 1063, it appeared that the policy sued on provided that it did not cover injuries "resulting, directly or indirectly, wholly or in part, from 'fighting, wrestling, scuffling, altercation, feud, quarrel or assault,' or from 'voluntary or unnecessary exposure to danger.'" The insured was a bartender. On the occasion of his receiving the injury complained of he had opened the door of the bar room where he was employed and ordered an individual to leave the place because of some disturbance he was creating. The latter grappled with the plaintiff, causing him to fall, and thereby the injury was inflicted. The plaintiff testified that he acted solely in self-defense. The court in reversing a judgment in favor of the defendant, said: "In the absence of any contrary qualification in the language of the policy, it is reasonable to assume that the fighting, wrestling, scuffling, etc., which are guarded against by the provisions in question, refer to altercations for which the insured is in some degree to blame and in which he is, to some extent at least, a voluntary participant, and not to those which are unavoidable and beyond his control, or which have not been occasioned by any improper conduct on his part. The terms of the policy are to be strictly construed against the insurer, and all questions of doubt resolved in favor of the insured." In Supreme Council, etc. v. Garrigus, 104 Ind. 138, 3 N. E. 818, 54 Am. Rep. 298, the court said: "The charge that appellee was engaged in an affray is moreover the statement of a conclusion, and is not sufficient to meet the averments in the complaint; that appellee received the wound without any agency, fault or negligence on his part. If the facts were stated instead of the conclusion, as the rules of pleading require, it might appear that the only part appellee took was in defence of his person against the assaults of his adversary or adversaries, and that thus, whatever injuries he received were received without any fault or wrong on his part. Nor will it do to say, that because the injury was intentionally inflicted by the assailant and wrongdoer, it was not accident to appellee, within the meaning of the word 'accident,' as used in the relief fund laws, etc., of the order." However, in U. S. Mutual Acc. Assoc. v. Millar, 43 Ill. App. 148, the court said: "Under the certificate of insurance in this case, it is stated that the insurance under that certificate shall not extend to or cover accidental injuries resulting from, or caused directly or indirectly, wholly or in part, by fighting. That the injury to plaintiff resulted directly or indirectly from the fact of the altercation between him and C. is clearly shown by the evidence in this record, and this whether the injury occurred during or immediately following the struggle. The fact that the assured engaged in a fight, though he himself was not the assaulting party, is clearly within the meaning of the terms of the policy as excluding injuries so received from its operation and insurance as being caused by fighting or being intentionally inflicted by another."

Where it appears that the insured was injured while fighting and the action is defended on the ground that the injuries resulted from a "voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger," the right to recover depends on whether the insured was the aggressor. Thus in Empire L. Ins. Co. v. Johnson, 142 Ga. 330, 82 S. E. 893, an action on a policy which provided that the insurer did not assume liability for risks "where the accident or disability therefrom results wholly or partially, directly or indirectly, from voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger," it appeared that the insured was killed as the result of a blow received while fighting. The evidence of the details of the fight and particularly as to how it began was conflicting. The court held that it was proper under the issues of the case and the evidence, for the court to instruct the jury as follows: "If you believe the plaintiff's husband did not voluntarily enter into a fight, but became involved in it by the fault of Zuber, and what he did was in defense of himself, then such act on the part of the plaintiff's husband would not bar her right to recover, and she could recover the whole amount of the policy." In Campbell v. Fidelity, etc. Co. 109 Ky. 661, 60 S. W. 492, 22 Ky. L. R. 1295, it appeared that the insured was shot and killed by a policeman on whom he had committed an assault. The action was defended on the ground, inter alia, that the insured had voluntarily exposed himself to danger. On appeal the court said that the jury should have been instructed in substance as follows: "If the jury believe from the evidence that [the assured] assaulted [the policeman] and at the time of such assault realized that such assault was dangerous to him [the assured] and with such knowledge and consciousness of such danger voluntarily made the assault which exposed him to the danger, they should find for the defendant." In Collins v. Fidelity, etc. Co. 63 Mo. App. 253, the court said: "As to voluntary exposure to danger, we need merely say that there was evidence tending to show that deceased wrongfully brought on the difficulty, which he must have known might likely result fatally, and which did result in his death, and did thereby expose himself to unnecessary danger. But there was also evidence in plaintiff's behalf, tending to show that he did not bring on the trouble and that the difficulty was without his fault and not within expectation. In such instance, though there is an exposure to danger, it is not a voluntary exposure. Each of these views were submitted to the jury and we must accept the verdict as supporting the plaintiff's contention. Since the deceased did not voluntarily expose himself to unnecessary danger, and since his death resulted from a pistol shot intentionally fired at him by K. we are led to the conclusion, that the death was an accident, as that term should be applied to the deceased."

For a general discussion of the construction of the term "voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger" as used in an accident insurance policy, see the notes to Hunt v. U. S. Accident Assoc. 10 Ann. Cas. 449; Bakalars v. Continental Casualty Co. 18 Ann. Cas. 1123, and Empire L. Ins. Co. v. Johnson, Ann. Cas. 1916B 287.

CHRISTENSON ET AL.

MADSON.

Minnesota Supreme Court—October 30, 1914.

127 Minn. 225; 149 N. W. 288.

Insurance — Insurable Interest — Policy Taken Out by Insured.

Where a person procures insurance upon the life of another, it is the general rule that he must prove an insurable interest in such life in order to recover upon such policy; but, where a person insures his own life and appoints another to receive the proceeds of such insurance, the appointee establishes a prima facie right to recover by proving the contract of insurance and the happening of the event upon which it is to become payable. If facts exist which preclude such recovery they are matters of defense.

[See note at end of this case.]

Beneficial Associations — By-laws — Designation of Beneficiaries.

The classes of persons eligible as beneficiaries under policies issued by a fraternal association are to be determined by the rules adopted for the express purpose of governing such matters, and not by general statements made for the purpose of indicating the general object of such association, and restrictions limiting the classes who may be so designated must be expressed in positive terms and cannot be inferred from general statements.

Statement in Constitution as Restrictive.

The by-laws of the association having provided that policies may be made payable to the affianced wife of the insured, a policy so payable is valid, although the object of the association, as stated in its constitution, is to provide insurance for the surviving relatives of its members.

[See Ann. Cas. 1913E 492.]

Immoral Relation between Insured and Beneficiary.

Under the evidence in this case, the court did not err in refusing to find that immoral relations existed between the insured and his beneficiary.

(Syllabus by court.)

Appeal from District Court, Hennepin county: JELLEY, Judge.

Action on benefit certificate. William L. Christenson et al., plaintiffs, and Mary Madison, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff's appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Jay W. Crosse for appellants.

Grotte & Beuten for respondent.

[226] TAYLOR, C.—On June 7, 1909, James P. Christenson procured the Danish Brotherhood in America, of which he was a member, to issue to him a benefit certificate for $1,000 payable, upon his death, to defendant, Mary Madison, as his betrothed. He paid all the assessments upon the certificate until his death which occurred in December, 1912. In October, 1911, he delivered the certificate to Mary Madison, the beneficiary therein named, who has ever since retained it, but he was never married to her. He had been previously married and had grown-up children, but his wife had procured a divorce from him on April 5, 1900. After his death, his children brought this suit against the brotherhood to recover the amount of the certificate. The brotherhood admitted liability under the certificate, paid the money into court, and caused Mary Madson to be substituted as defendant.

The suit proceeded to trial between the children as plaintiffs and Mary Madson as defendant, and she will be referred to as defendant hereafter. The case was tried by the court without a jury. The court, among other things, found that defendant was the affianced wife of James P. Christenson; that both the law and the rules of the order authorized the issuance of benefit certificates payable to the affianced wife of the insured; and that the certificate in controversy was, by its terms, payable to defendant as such affianced wife. The court thereupon directed that judgment be entered to the effect that defendant was entitled to the proceeds of the certificate, and that the money paid into court be delivered to her. Plaintiffs appealed from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

1. Plaintiffs insist that the evidence is not sufficient to sustain the finding that defendant was betrothed to Christenson. His death [227] debarred her, a party in interest, from testifying as to conversations between them, and the only evidence to support the finding is the fact that the certificate, by his direction, was made payable to her as his betrothed. Plaintiffs invoke the rule, frequently stated in the books, that the beneficiary under a policy of life insurance, in order to recover thereon, must allege and prove an insurable interest in the life of the insured. This rule is based upon the theory that a policy, issued to one who has no interest in the continuation of the life of the person insured, is both a gambling contract, and a contract which creates a motive for desiring the termination of such life, and is therefore against public policy and void. The rule is applied very generally where the insurance is procured by the beneficiary and the suit is consequently founded upon a contract between the beneficiary and the insurer; but where the insured himself procures the insurance, the contract is between him and the insurer, not between the beneficiary and the insurer, and his interest in his own life sustains the policy and need not be proven. In such case he has the right to appoint the person to whom the proceeds of the policy shall go, and, if he make such appointment, the one so appointed takes by virtue of the contract between the insured and the insurer, not by virtue of a contract between the insurer and the appointee, and in order to recover thereon it is sufficient for the appointee to prove the contract and the happening of the event which entitles him to the benefit thereof. If there be facts which preclude the appointee from recovering, they should be alleged and proven as a defense. In other words, if the insured himself procured the issuance of the policy and caused the beneficiary to be named therein, the policy is prima facie evidence that the beneficiary so named is entitled to the proceeds thereof at the death of the insured; but, if the insured did not procure the issuance of the policy, the beneficiary thereunder must allege and prove the facts entitling him to receive such proceeds. In Campbell v. New England Mut. L. Ins. Co. 98 Mass. 381, the court say:

"The policy in this case is upon the life of Andrew Campbell. It was made upon his application; it issued to him, as 'the assured'; the premium was paid by him; and he thereby became a member of the [228] defendant corporation. It is the interest of Andrew Campbell in his own life that supports the policy. The plaintiff did not, by virtue of the clause declaring the policy to be for her benefit, become the assured. She is merely the person designated by the agreement of the parties to receive the proceeds of the policy upon the death of the assured. The contract (so long as it remains executory), the interest by which it is supported, and the relation of membership, all continue the same as if no such clause were inserted. Fogg v. Middlesex Mut. F. Ins. Co. 10 Cush. (Mass.) 337, 346; Sandford v. Mechanics' Ins. Co. 12 Cush. 541; Hale v. Mechanics' F. Ins. Co. 6 Gray (Mass.) 169, 66 Am. Dec. 410; Campbell v. Charter Oak F. etc. Ins. Co. 10 Allen (Mass.) 213; Forbes v. American Mut. L. Ins. Co. 15 Gray (Mass.) 249, 77 Am. Dec. 360. It was not necessary, therefore, that the plaintiff should show that she had an interest in the life of Andrew Campbell, by which the policy could be supported as a policy to herself as the assured." The same rule is recognized by other courts. Ætna L. Ins. Co. v. France, 94 U. S. 561, 24 U. S. (L. ed.) 287; Provident L. Ins. etc. Co. v. Baum, 29 Ind. 236; Milner v. Bowman, 119 Ind. 448, 21 N. E. 1094, 5 L.R.A. 95; Prudential Ins. Co. v. Hunn, 21 Ind. App. 525, 52 N. E. 772, 69 Am. St. Rep. 380; Union Fraternal League v. Walton, 109 Ga. 1, 34 S. E. 317, 46 L.R.A. 424, 77 Am. St. Rep. 350; Foresters of America v. Hollis, 70 Kan. 71, 78 Pac. 160, 3 Ann. Cas. 535; Guardian Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Hogan, 80 Ill. 35, 22 Am. Rep. 180; Massachusetts Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Kellogg, 82 Ill. 614; Scott v. Dickson, 108 Pa. St. 6, 56 Am. Rep. 192; Hill v. United L. Ins. Assoc. 154 Pa. St. 29, 25 Atl. 771, 35 Am. North Eastern Mut. L. Assoc.* 51 Vt. 613; Bursinger v. Watertown Bank, 67 Wis. 75, 30 N. W. 290, 58 Am. Rep. 848; Dolan v. Supreme Council,

2. Plaintiffs contend that defendant entered into meretricious relations with Christenson and by so doing terminated the betrothal. There is no finding that any improper relations existed between them. Plaintiffs made a motion to amend the findings by inserting [229] therein a statement that defendant became the mistress of Christenson. The court denied this application, and, under the evidence, it cannot be held that the court erred in so doing. As the existence of the alleged improper relations has not been established, it is not necessary to determine whether the marriage engagement would be broken by subsequent cohabitation without being married.

3. Plaintiffs further claim that the constitution of the Danish Brotherhood in America excludes the betrothed of the insured from the class of persons to whom benefit certificates may be made payable. The brotherhood is incorporated under the laws of the state of Nebraska. The certificate in question was issued in the state of Minnesota to a citizen of Minnesota. The laws of both Nebraska and Minnesota provide that such certificates may be made payable to the affianced wife of the insured; and the by-laws of the Danish Brotherhood contain a like provision. But plaintiffs contend that this provision of the by-laws violates the constitution of the brotherhood and is void. The provisions of the constitution upon which plaintiffs rely are the following:

"Sec. 2. The object of the Danish Brotherhood is to work toward a union among the Danes in America; to perpetuate the memories from Denmark and to strengthen each other in true brotherhood; to help one another by financial aid to sick and needy members; to help unemployed brothers to employment, and to provide for an insurance and guarantee fund, whereby every brother will have a guaranty that his surviving relatives, in case of his death, will receive a sum as stipulated by law, and to aid the local lodges, in cases where long continued sickness or some accident makes extra assistance necessary.

"Sec. 5. In case of the death of a brother, the brotherhood, according to the constitution and by-laws, shall provide for the payment to his surviving relatives of such sum as is described in his certificate of membership, and which, according to the constitution and by-laws, is his rightful due, either $250, $500 or $1,000, according to the scale after which he has paid, while the assessment, which every member must pay to this object, must not exceed the provisions described in the by-laws."

[230] These sections of the constitution merely give a general outline of the purpose of the brotherhood. They contain no prohibitory or restrictive language, and were not intended to mark out and limit, except in a general way, the nature and extent of the power to make contracts.

To determine whether a certain person may lawfully be appointed as beneficiary, we must look to the rules and regulations adopted for the purpose of pointing out and defining who may, and who may not, become such beneficiaries. Such questions are to be determined by the provisions established for the express purpose of governing such matters, and not by the general phrases used in setting forth the general purpose of the association. This is true although the specific regulations are found in the by-laws and the general language in the constitution. Of course mandatory provisions in the constitution, and prohibitions and limitations therein must be observed; but the statement of the purpose of the organization, couched in general terms, is not ordinarily intended to restrict and define with exactness the powers of the association. The restrictions and limitations upon the powers of the association are usually contained in provisions, either in the constitution or the by-laws, adopted for the express purpose of outlining, limiting and defining such powers; and whether the association has power to make a particular contract is ordinarily to be determined by reference to such specific regulations, and not by reference to the general language used to express the general object for which the association was formed. Banasek v. Western Bohemian Fraternal Assn. 122 Minn. 272, Ann. Cas. 1914D 1123, 142 N. W. 334, 49 L.R.A. (N.S.) 141; Walter v. Hensel, 42 Minn. 204, 44 N. W. 57.

It is also the general rule that restrictions limiting the classes who may be designated as beneficiaries must be expressed in specific and positive terms, and cannot be inferred from general statements contained in either the constitution or by-laws. Pleasant v. Locomotive Engineers Mut. L. etc. Ins. Assoc. 70 W. Va. 389, 73 N. E. 976, Ann. Cas. 1913E 496; and cases cited in note appended thereto.

The constitution of the Danish Brotherhood contemplates the [231] existence of appropriate by-laws. The by-law in question expressly provides that the insured may make his benefit certificate payable to his fiancée. There is no other specific provision in respect to this matter; and, as the constitution contains no prohibitory or restrictive language, the phrase, "surviving relatives," used in stating the general object of the brotherhood, cannot be construed as invalidating such by-laws or forbidding the insured to make his certificate payable to his affianced wife.

Order affirmed.

NOTE.

Selection by Insured of Beneficiary Not Having Insurable Interest in Former's Life as against Public Policy.

Life Insurance, 587.

Mutual Benefit Insurance, 587.

Rule in Kentucky, 588.

Life Insurance.

The general rule laid down in Dolan v. Supreme Council, etc. 15 Ann. Cas. 232, that public policy does not forbid a person to take out a policy of insurance on his own life and select as a beneficiary one who has no insurable interest in his life, where this is done in good faith and with no intention to violate the rule against wagering insurance contracts, is upheld in the following recent cases: Afro-American L. Ins. Co. v. Adams (Ala.) 70 So. 119; American Nat. Ins. Co. v. Moore (Ala.) 70 So. 190; Langford v. National L. etc. Ins. Co. 116 Ark. 527, 173 S. W. 414; Floyd v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. (Del.) 90 Atl. 404; Baltimore L. Ins. Co. v. Floyd (Del.) 91 Atl. 653; New York L. Ins. Co. v. Murtagh, 137 La. 760, 69 So. 165; Brogi v. Brogi, 211 Mass. 512, 98 N. E. 573; Sargent v. Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. 49 Pa. Super. Ct. 239; Mohr v. Prudential Ins. Co. 32 R. I. 177, 78 Atl. 554. In New York L. Ins. Co. v. Murtagh, supra, the rule was thus stated: "The objection that the beneficiary, Miss Delery, had no insurable interest in the life of W. H. Oncken, is without merit. Oncken insured his own life, paying the premiums, and designated Miss Delery as beneficiary. In Hearing's Succession, 26 La. Ann. 327, the court said: 'A man may take out a policy of insurance on his life in the name of any one, or, having taken it out in his own name, he may, with the consent of the assurers, transfer it to whom he pleases.' This doctrine was approved in Stuart v. Sutcliffe, 46 La. Ann. 247, 14 So. 912. See also Heinlein v. Imperial L. Ins. Co. 25 L.R.A. 627, note, and Rose Dolan v. Supreme Council, etc. 152 Mich. 266, 116 N. W. 383, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 555, 16 Ann. Cas. 232. In the last case the syllabus reads: 'The insurance of one's life for the benefit of another having no insurable interest therein is not contrary to public policy.' In Deal v. Hainley, 135 Mo. App. 507, 116 S. W. 1, it was declared that an insured may designate a beneficiary having no insurable interest in the life of the insured, if the transaction is bona fide; but that if the transaction is collusive the beneficiary cannot recover under the policy but may be reimbursed for whatever money he advances. The court said: 'Though defendant's nephew could not insure his uncle's life, the relationship and the intimacy and favors which grew out of it, are items to consider in dealing with the question of whether the uncle procured the policy and wholly for defendant's sake; for those circumstances enhance the probability that he did. If Coleman took the insurance on the inducement of defendant, who was the active and moving party in the transaction, the policy was speculative. [Wainwright v. Bland, 1 M. & Rob. (Eng.) 481; Shilling v. Accidental Death Ins. Co. 2 H. & N. (Eng.) 41; Bromley v. Washington L. Ins. Co. [122 Ky. 402] 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 747; Cammack v. Lewis, 89 U. S. 643, 21 U. S. (L. ed.) 244.] In that event defendant is entitled to keep no more of the proceeds of the policy than the amount of his claim against Coleman's estate. . . . If Coleman procured the insurance, but on an understanding with defendant that the latter's interest in it should be only a security for what the former owed, then defendant may retain no more of the proceeds than enough to make him whole." In Prudential Ins. Co. v. Williams, 113 Ark. 373, 168 S. W. 1114, the same principle was applied to an assignment of an insurance policy. The court said: "Now, out of the conflict of authority on the question of wagering contracts of insurance, this court has taken the position in former decisions that a contract of insurance, taken out in the name of one who has no insurable interest in the life of the person insured, is a wagering contract and void (McRae v. Warmack, 98 Ark. 52), but that 'any person has a right to procure insurance on his own life, and afterward to assign the policy to another, provided it be not done by way of cover for a wager policy, even though the assignee has no insurable interest in the life of the insured.' Page v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 99 Ark. 340."

Mutual Benefit Insurance.

The rule that in mutual benefit insurance as in ordinary life insurance, the selection in good faith by the insured of a beneficiary having no insurable interest in the former's life violates no consideration of public policy, is sustained by the reported case and other recent decisions. Barnett v. United Brothers, etc. 10 Ala. App. 382, 64 So. 519; Slaughter v. Grand Lodge (Ala.) 68 So. 367, 369; Grand Lodge, etc. v. Barnard, 9 Ga. App. 71, 70 S. E. 678; Cain v. Knights of Pythias, 11 Ga. App. 364, 75 S. E. 444; Pollock v. Household, 150 N. C. 211, 63 S. E. 940; Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. O'Neil, 36 Okla. 792, 130 Pac. 270; Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Cummings, 66 Ore. 272, 286, 126 Pac. 982, 133 Pac. 1169, 47 L.R.A. (N.S.) 252. See also Middlestadt v. Grand Lodge, etc. 107 Minn. 228, 120 N. W. 37. Thus in Barnett v. Unit- ed Brothers, etc. supra, it was said: "The theory of the asserted right of the plaintiffs to recover the amount payable under the policy is that the designation of beneficiaries having no insurable interest in the life of the insured was the same in effect as if there had been no designation at all, and that the result was to entitle the plaintiffs as the next of kin to claim the benefit of the above-quoted by-law of the defendant. This theory involves the assumption that a person cannot insure his own life for the benefit of another who has no insurable interest in it. The assumption is unwarranted. The public policy which forbids a mere stranger, having no insurable interest, to take out or otherwise acquire insurance on the life of another (Helmetag v. Miller, 76 Ala. 183, 52 Am. Rep. 316) does not prevent one who procures and retains insurance on his own life from making the benefit payable to another, without regard to whether the latter has any insurable interest (Stoelker v. Thornton, 88 Ala. 241, 6 So. 680, 6 L.R.A. 140; Hill v. United L. Ins. Assoc. 154 Pa. St. 29, 25 Atl. 771, 35 Am. St. Rep. 807; Union Fraternal League v. Walton, 109 Ga. 1, 34 S. E. 317, 46 L.R.A. 424, 77 Am. St. Rep. 350; 25 Cyc. 708). The person with whom the defendant contracted, namely, the deceased, of course had an insurable interest in her own life."

In Sage v. Finney, 156 Mo. App. 30, 135 S. W. 996, it appeared that a member of a mutual benefit insurance company, finding that he was unable to continue payments on a policy of insurance on his own life, designated a third person as beneficiary to the extent of one-half the amount of the policy in consideration of the payment of the future premiums and assessments. It was held that while the law looked with disfavor on a situation where the beneficiary, having no insurable interest, agreed to pay the premiums on a policy, nevertheless where the beneficiary had acted in good faith, the court would always endeavor to reimburse him for the amount of money expended. The court said: "While one may insure his own life, paying premium thereon himself, in favor of another who has no insurable interest therein, as was said in Locher v. Kuechenmeister, 120 Mo. App. 701, 720, 98 S. W. 92, it is true the law looks with disfavor upon such transactions as this, where the insurance is procured with the consent of the insured but in favor of one with no insurable interest, who undertakes to pay the premiums therefor, and denounces them as wagering contracts. Though such contracts are obnoxious to public policy, because they tend to encourage one to hasten the event upon which the insurance depends, they are not unlawful in the sense that they are immoral nor as is a contract which stipulates for the doing of something prohibited by a positive statute. In this view, the courts accept such contracts as sufficient to give rise to equities between the parties which they will consider and apply, to the end of compensating one who has invested his means in good faith for the purpose of keeping the insurance in force. Indeed, the rule of decision with respect to such contracts seems to be that they are void only in so far as they purport to confer a right upon one, who has no insurable interest in the life of another, to the insurance over and above the amount of the indebtedness of the insured person to the beneficiary and such premiums and interest thereon as may have been paid on the policy by the beneficiary. It is said, although such contracts are invalid in so far as they attempt to transfer all or any precise amount of the insurance above the indebtedness of the insured to the beneficiary and beyond such premiums and interest as the beneficiary may invest therein, they are not of that fraudulent kind with respect of which the courts regard the parties equally culpable and refuse to interfere with the result of their action. In other words, such contracts, though considered and treated as invalid because obnoxious to public policy in so far as they purport to give the beneficiary any precise or definite amount of the insurance without regard to the amount of the indebtedness which the insured may owe to the beneficiary or the premiums and interest thereon which the beneficiary may have invested therein, are always treated with as sufficiently efficacious to afford the beneficiary an equitable right to the insurance money vouchsafed in the policy to the extent of compensating the indebtedness, if any, existing in his favor against the insured together with such premiums and interest as he has expended in keeping the insurance in force. [Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 775, 26 U. S. (L. ed.) 924; Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Richards, 99 Mo. App. 88, 72 S. W. 487; Strode v. Meyer Bros. Drug Co. 101 Mo. App. 627, 74 S. W. 379; *Quinn v. Rule in Kentucky.

Whatever previous doubt there may have been as to the attitude of the Kentucky courts on the question under consideration, the matter seems to have been settled definitely by the case of Rupp v. Western L. Indemnity Co. 138 Ky. 18, 127 S. W. 490, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 675, in favor of the beneficiary. In that case the court said: "This is a sound and reasonable rule, and if it were otherwise it would be in conflict with the universal doctrine that a person who is compos mentis can give away his property to any person he pleases; it would operate to render invalid all devices to persons not closely enough related to have an insurable interest in the life of the testator. What reason can be given warranting the declaring of an insurance policy void when a friend, a stranger in blood, is made the beneficiary by the assured, that would not apply with the same force to a testator devising property to a person not having an insurable interest in the life of the testator? Yet such devices have been universally upheld. Is it possible that a beneficiary in an insurance policy, such as is alleged in the case at bar, would have a greater desire for the premature death of the assured and take steps to produce it, than a creditor would especially Harris, who was only the surety of Embury in the case, supra, and in which case the policy was upheld and declared not to be a wagering contract?" And further on in discussing the case of Caudell v. Woodward which is cited in the previous note on this question as a possible authority for an opposite holding the court said: "It is claimed that in the case of Caudell v. Woodward [96 Ky. 646] supra, establishes a different principle. That case was decided upon the organic law of a fraternal order, but language is used in the opinion which, seemingly, sustains appellee's contention. However, the conclusion reached in the case at bar is also announced in that opinion; that is, one who obtains a policy of insurance on the life of another must have an insurable interest in the life of that other. The opinion in that case also announced the doctrine that one is prohibited from inducing another to take out insurance, or become the owner of such insurance by assignment, unless he has an insurable interest in the life of that other; and that Mrs. Woodward, a stranger, could not recover on the policy, because it is well settled that one obtaining a policy of insurance on the life of another, or who induced another to take out a policy for his benefit, must have an insurable interest. All these propositions are fundamental and sound in law. There is nowhere, however, any reason given in the Caudell case why a person cannot take out insurance on his own life, pay the premiums, and make a person who is not related to him the beneficiary; nor could there have been presented any reason against it that would not have applied with equal force to a gift of the same amount by will as well." To the same effect see Western L. Indemnity Co. v. Rupp, 147 Ky. 489, 144 S. W. 743; Allen v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 166 Ky. 605, 179 S. W. 581.

NOZISKA ET AL.

ATEN.

South Dakota Supreme Court—May 17, 1915.

35 S. Dak. 451; 152 N. W. 694.

Parties — Joinder of Plaintiffs — Action for Negligence of Attorney.

Where one claimant against a debtor assigned his claim to another, so that one suit could be brought on both claims, and both claimants signed the attachment bond, and were required to pay the amount thereof, both are proper parties plaintiff in an action against the attorney who brought the former suit for negligence which resulted in their being compelled to pay the amount of the attachment bond.

Amendments — Adding New Parties Plaintiff.

Where the attorney for plaintiffs, in support of a motion to amend a complaint in the name of two individuals against an attorney for negligence which resulted in plaintiffs having to pay an attachment bond which they had signed, files an affidavit showing that at the time he drew the complaint he thought the plaintiffs were partners, and that the claim on which the former suit was brought was a partnership claim, but that he afterwards learned that two others were partners of one of the plaintiffs, and that the other plaintiff had assigned his claim to the partnership for collection, the showing is sufficient to warrant the court, in its discretion, to permit the complainant to be amended by adding the other partners as parties plaintiff.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 150, authorizing the court before or after judgment, in furtherance of justice, to amend any pleading by adding or striking out the name of the party, the court has power to permit such an amendment to be made.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Tripp county: WILLIAMSON, Judge.

Action for damages. John C. Noziska et al., plaintiffs, and A. K. Aten, Jr., defendant. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

E. O. Patterson for appellant.

R. H. Molitor for respondent.

[453] WHITING, J.—This action was instituted in the name of John C. Noziska and F. F. Sinkler, as plaintiffs, and in their complaint they alleged, in substance, as follows: That the defendant is, and was at all times therein mentioned, a duly licensed and practicing attorney at law, holding himself out as such attorney within this state; that plaintiffs employed the defendant, as such attorney, to prosecute a certain action in justice court, on behalf of plaintiffs and against one Mundorf and wife, for the recovery of money claimed to be due for merchandise sold and delivered by plaintiffs to said Mundorfs; that the defendant undertook to prosecute said action in a proper skilful, and diligent manner as the attorney for these plaintiffs; that the defendant, in prosecuting such action, procured the issuance of a writ of attachment, and, by virtue of such writ of attachment, had certain property of the Mundorfs seized, attached, and taken into the possession of one Holbrook, then a constable in and for the county wherein said action was brought; that these plaintiffs, by an undertaking given under the advice of defendant, indemnified the said Holbrook against loss by reason of said seizure and attachment; that it thereafter appeared that the said Mundorfs were not residents of this state; that thereupon said action, under the advice and procurement of defendant, was abandoned, and another action instituted on behalf of these plaintiffs by said defendant, in which said action defendant sought to make service of process on the Mundorfs by advertisement, though no writ of attachment or summons in garnishment was procured or issued in said second action; that, upon such defective service of process and lack thereof, such action was prosecuted to judgment, and the property of Mundorf, seized as aforesaid, and still held by said constable, was sold to satisfy the said judgment, all being done upon the advice of defendant acting as such attorney for plaintiffs; that thereafter Mundorf brought an action in conversion against the constable for the conversion of the property attached and held by him; and recovered judgment for the value of same, and for interest and costs, which said judgment these plaintiffs were compelled to, and did, pay and satisfy in accordance with their undertaking [454] and agreement with said constable, to hold him harmless. Plaintiffs sought to recover from the defendant the amount so paid out in satisfaction of the judgment against the said constable. After answer plaintiffs sought leave of court to amend the complaint herein by substituting, in place of John C. Noziska as one of said plaintiffs, the names of John C. Noziska, E. D. Noziska, and D. L. Noziska, as copartners doing business under the firm name and style of Colome Mercantile Company. Leave was granted, and the complaint was amended by the change in the name of the plaintiffs, and by adding an allegation to the effect that the said parties named as copartners were copartners doing business under the name and style of Colome Mercantile Company, and further amended to show that the undertaking entered into with the constable was the joint undertaking of the said copartnership and sinkler. Trial was had, and verdict rendered in favor of plaintiffs. Judgment having entered on said verdict, the defendant has appealed to this court from such judgment, and has assigned as error: (1) The granting of the order allowing the amendment to the complaint; (2) two certain rulings of the court sustaining objections to questions asked of the plaintiff Sinkler when a witness upon the stand; (3) the overruling of defendant's motion, made at the close of plaintiff's case, and at the close of all of the evidence, asking for a directed verdict in favor of defendant.

The two assignments questioning the rulings of the court in excluding evidence need no further attention from this court than to state that, even if erroneous, it is clear the rulings could not have been prejudicial.

In support of his motion for directed verdict, appellant urged that, in the action wherein it was claimed he was guilty of negligence, the sole plaintiff was the mercantile company; that appellant was not attorney for Sinkler in such action; that, under the evidence in the present case, no separate judgments could be entered in favor of the partnership and Sinkler; and that it appeared from such evidence that the plaintiffs were not jointly interested in the result of this action, but that their interests were separate and distinct. There is no merit in any of these contentions. It appeared that the mercantile company and Sinkler held separate accounts against the Mundorfs. In accordance [455] with the advice of appellant, Sinkler, for the mere purposes of suit and to prevent the necessity of two actions, assigned his claim to the mercantile company, in whose name, as plaintiff, the two actions in justice court were prosecuted, in both of which actions recovery was sought upon Sinkler's claim, as well as the claim of the nominal plaintiff. Appellant was attorney for both the mercantile company and Sinkler. The mere fact the action was brought in the name of one of such parties for the purpose of avoiding the necessity of two suits did not make him attorney for that one party only; in all that he did in the actions in the justice court appellant was acting as the attorney for both the partnership and Sinkler. It is unnecessary for us to consider the contention that no separate judgments could be entered herein for the reason that the trial court did not enter separate judgments. It needs neither argument nor authority to show that the claim of respondents against appellant is a joint claim. These parties had become jointly obligated to save the constable harmless; their liability to such constable was not limited to the proportionate amounts of their claims against the Mundorfs; their liability being joint, their cause of action against appellant, which cause of action sprung from such liability to such constable, was also joint; and it was no affair of appellant's whether the amount paid to the constable was paid by one or both of said parties; this was a matter of adjustment solely between themselves.

Did the court err in granting the amendment? Appellant in objecting to such amendment, contended: (1) That the amendment proposed was not authorized by the statute, that such proposed amendment was in effect, the substitution of new parties plaintiff, and not the addition of new parties, and that the proposed complaint was not an amendment of the complaint, but a new complaint, setting forth a new cause of action; (2) that, from the affidavits submitted upon the hearing of the motion to amend, it appeared that all the facts presented as a basis for such amendment were within the knowledge of the plaintiffs at the time of the commencement of this action, and that their attorney knew, or should have known, of the existence thereof. From the affidavit of respondents' attorney, submitted upon the motion to amend complaint, it appeared that he drew the original complaint supposing [456] that the plaintiffs therein named were partners, that the claim upon which the suits in justice court were brought was a claim which they, as partners, held against the Mundorfs, and that these two plaintiffs individually had given the undertaking to the constable; that he had since learned that the three Noziskas were partners, and that such partnership was one of the real parties in interest, and should have been made a party plaintiff. While the showing made by defendant was such as might have justified the trial court in refusing the amendment, yet we do not believe, that such court, in granting the amendment, abused its discretion, provided, as a matter of law, it had power to allow the amendment.

Was the amendment such as one as is authorized by section 150, C. C. P.? Such section provides:

"The court may, before or after judgment, in furtherance of justice, . . . amend any pleading, . . . by adding or striking out the name of any party, or by correcting a mistake in the name of a party, or a mistake in any other respect; or by inserting other allegations material to the case. . . ."

If this action had been brought by respondent Sinkler alone, and he had erroneously alleged, either that he alone entered into the undertaking with the constable, or that he and some other party other than the true party entered into such undertaking, certainly the trial court would have had authority to allow an amendment correcting the mistake in such allegation, as such amendment would be one that should be allowed in furtherance of justice, unless, for some reason shown to the court, the court, in the exercise of a wise discretion, should have refused same. Kelsey v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 1 S. D. 80, 45 N. W. 204. After such amendment Sinkler could have prosecuted such action to judgment and recovered against appellant upon such amended complaint, provided appellant failed to demur to such complaint upon the ground of defect of parties plaintiff. That being true, it follows that there could be no error in granting to Sinkler the amendment showing who, in fact, was his joint obligor on the undertaking. If that had been the only amendment, then, unless there was a demurrer interposed upon the ground of defects in parties plaintiff, the cause could have been prosecuted to judgment, and judgment recovered by Sinkler, although his codefendant was nonsuited. If, after such amendment, the defendant [457] had—as he clearly in such case might—demurred upon the ground that there was a defect of parties plaintiff in that the partnership was not a party to such action, clearly the court, in sustaining such demurrer, would have been bound to allow such partnership to be joined in an amended complaint and the cause to proceed. 15 Enc. P. & P. 750, 751; 30 Cyc. 143, 144.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

"The question as to when and whether such parties should be brought in as necessary to a complete determination of the controversy is within the sound discretion of the trial court." Bloom v. Home Ins. Agency, 91 Ark. 367, 121 S. W. 293. "It is the constant practice of the courts of chancery to allow amendments of bills by the introduction of new plaintiffs, where the purposes of justice require it." Coffman v. Sangston, 21 Gratt. (Va.) 268. "The statute, section 657, Revised Statutes 1899, which is looked to as authority to require the court to allow the amendment to stand, has always received a most liberal construction by the courts of this state, and while they are not all in accord upon the question of permitting an amendment of the petition by adding the name of a new party, where the new party added is the real party in interest, yet the later decisions on this question are to the effect that it may be done where the ends of justice will be met thereby, and the defendant not injured." Merriman v. Springfield, 142 Mo. App. 506, 127 S. W. 122. "Order XVI. rule 2, . . . provides that 'where an action has been commenced in the name of the wrong person as plaintiff, or where it is doubtful whether it has been commenced in the name of the right plaintiff or plaintiffs, the court or a judge may, if satisfied that it has been so commenced through a bona fide mistake, and that it is necessary for the determination of the real matter in dispute so to do, order any other person or persons to be . . . added as plaintiff or plaintiffs upon such terms as may seem just.'" Duckett v. Gover, 6 Ch. D. (Eng.) 82, 46 L. J. Ch. 407, 25 W. R. 554. In Long v. Crossley, 13 Ch. D. (Eng.) 388, 49 L. J. Ch. 168, 41 L. T. N. S. 793, 28 W. R. 226, it was said: "The 13th rule of Order XVI. provides that the court may, at any stage of the proceedings, order 'that the name or names of any party or parties' (which I take to mean 'any person or persons') 'whether plaintiffs or defendants, who ought to have been joined, or whose presence before the court may be necessary in order to enable the Court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved in the action, be added.' What is the question involved in the present action? Put broadly, it is the specific performance of the contract with the defendants. Is the presence of Mr. Long and his sister necessary in order to enable the court effectually and completely to adjudicate upon and settle this question? It appears to me that it is. It is said by Mr. North that, if they are added as co-plaintiffs, the action must still fail. I think that at present I have nothing to do with that. The object of the provisions of the rules was, not that a party's case should be so framed as to succeed, but that it should be so framed that it can be adjudicated upon by the court; whether in his favor or against him. I therefore allow an amendment by adding the proposed co-plaintiffs, and by stating the plaintiff's title under the marriage settlement." In Ayscough v. Bullar, 41 Ch. D. (Eng.) 341, 58 L. J. Ch. 474, 60 L. T. N. S. 471, 37 W. R. 529, it was said by Lindley, L. J.: "The whole object to be obtained by amending and adding a co-plaintiff is to better the position of the first plaintiff. . . . Now it appears to me that, when once you are satisfied that there has been a bona fide mistake, that the whole thing is honest, and that it is necessary in order to do justice to her and to the defendant that she should have this liberty to amend, such liberty ought to be granted."

The rule at common law was that an action at law could not be amended by adding parties plaintiff. Zukowski v. Armour, 107 Ill. App. 668; Ayer v. Gleason, 60 Me. 207; Chouteau v. Hewitt, 10 Mo. 131; Chamberlin v. Hite, 5 Watts. (Pa.) 373; Wood v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 96 Mich. 437, 56 N. W. 8. "If by the common law amendments of the character made in this case were allowed, is it not obvious that much of the learning in the books on the subject of parties would have been useless, and instead of the labored essays of this branch of the law we meet with, the subject might have been disposed of in a much more summary way. The consequence of not joining a plaintiff as a party, is shown in all the elementary works on pleading; but we have not been enabled to find where it is said, that the omission can be obviated by an amendment. If it were allowable, it would certainly have been somewhere suggested. There is nothing in the affidavit which was the foundation of the motion to amend, which might not be alleged by every one making such applications, and if it were allowed, rules sanctioned by the profession from time immemorial would be subverted. Mistakes in the names of parties have been amended; but to allow new plaintiffs or defendants to be inserted in a declaration by way of amendment, would be going a length wholly unprecedented. The fact that the plaintiffs in this case were a company consisting of many individuals, does not vary the principle. The names of all the individuals composing a firm or company not incorporated, must be set forth with certainty in the declaration." Chouteau v. Hewitt, 10 Mo. 131. This rule still seems to obtain in at least one jurisdiction. Wood v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 96 Mich. 437, 56 N. W. 8. In that case it was said: "In no case has it ever been contended that an amendment to bring in new parties in an action at law could be allowed. . . . The court was in error in permitting this amendment to be made. When it appeared upon the trial that the plaintiff was not the sole owner of the claim, the court should have directed a verdict in favor of the defendant. Plaintiff could not maintain the action in her own name when it appeared that she was not the sole owner of the claim, and, under the most liberal construction of the statute of amendments, the court had no power to amend by bringing in another party plaintiff."

An amendment of a cause of action by adding parties plaintiff may, in many jurisdictions, be made at any time before final judgment. Union Naval Stores Co. v. Pugh, 156 Ala. 369, 47, So. 48; Acquital v. Crowell, 1 Cal. 191; Polk v. Coffin, 9 Cal. 56; Price v. Goodrich, 141 Ill. App. 568; Gnuake v. Duffy, 177 Ill. App. 648; Edinger v. Duffy, 177 Ill. App. 648. In Cimini v. Zambarano, 36 R. I. 122, 89 Atl. 295, it was said: "Under our statute courts are given broad powers in permitting amendments and in adding and striking out parties. Such powers have been exercised frequently after verdict and before the creation of the superior court by the Supreme Court after hearing upon petition for new trial. We see no objection to such action by the superior court after hearing upon motion for a new trial; provided amendments are permitted upon terms that shall protect the rights of adverse parties."

Application of Rule:

IN GENERAL.

It is generally held that a creditor's bill may be amended by adding parties plaintiff. Richmond v. Irons, 121 U. S. 44, 7 S. Ct. 788, 30 U. S. (L. ed.) 864; Anderson v. Superior Ct. 122 Cal. 216, 54 Pac. 829; McDougald v.

Dougherty, 11 Ga. 570; Perkins v. Berry, 103 N. C. 131, 9 S. E. 621; Stephenson v. Taverner, 9 Grat. (Va.) 398. Compare McLennan v. Montreal Bank, 17 West. L. Rep. (British Columbia) 489. In Maughan v. Blake, L. R. 3 Ch. (Eng.) 32, a plaintiff suing as a personal representative of a creditor's estate was permitted after discovering that the right to take out administration was in other persons, to amend her petition by making those persons coplaintiffs in a suit for the administration of a debtor's estate.

In Tillery v. Candler, 118 N. C. 888, 24 S. E. 709, an amendment adding a relator as a party plaintiff was held to be proper.

In Gannon v. Johnston, 40 Okla. 695, Ann. Cas. 1915D 522, 140 Pac. 430, it was held that an amendment adding the grantor as a party plaintiff was proper in an action by the grantee for the recovery of land. See to the same effect Augusta Mfg. Co. v. Vertrees, 4 Lea (Tenn.) 75.

In Livingston v. Marshall, 82 Ga. 281, 11 S. E. 542, it was held that a sworn bill might be amended by adding a new and proper party complainant, without swearing to the amendment.

PERSONS INTERESTED WITH ORIGINAL PLAINTIFF.

Where the plaintiff has an interest in the subject-matter of the suit, the petition may be amended, and other persons having a like interest may be joined as coplaintiffs. Murray v. Booker, 58 S. W. 788, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 781; Weinstein v. Harrison, 66 Tex. 546, 1 S. W. 626; Sillings v. Bumgardner, 9 Grat. (Va.) 273. In Murray v. Booker, supra, a joint owner of the damaged property was permitted to be added as a party plaintiff by amendment in an action to recover damages resulting from the overflow of land. See to the same effect Cole v. Gilford, 63 N. H. 60. In McGhee v. Alexander, 104 Ala. 116, 16 So. 148, a bill to enforce a vendor's lien for unpaid purchase money was brought by the children of an intestate whose domicile was in Georgia. By the laws of Georgia a surviving husband shared equally with the children in the personal property of a deceased wife. It was held that an amendment adding the surviving husband of the intestate as a party plaintiff was proper.

Parties for whose use or benefit an action is brought, or who have an equitable interest in the cause of action, may be added as parties plaintiff by amendment. Patterson v. Stapler, 7 Fed. 210; Glenn v. Black, 31 Ga. 393; Fidelity, etc. Co. v. Nisbet, 119 Ga. 316, 46 S. E. 444; Beall v. Hutcheson, 131 Ga. 66, 61 S. E. 1125; McIntyre v. Easton, etc. R. Co. 26 N. J. Eq. 425; Cousar v. Heath, 80

S. C. 466, 61 S. E. 973; Lanes v. Squyres, 45 Tex. 382; Galveston, etc. R. Co. v. House, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 263, 23 S. W. 332; Townsend v. Three Lakes Lumber Co. 67 Wash. 654, 122 Pac. 29. See also Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. La Porte, 33 Ind. App. 691, 71 N. E. 166; Reed v. Reed, 16 N. J. Eq. 248. Compare Cass v. McCutcheon, 15 Manitoba 667, 669. In Glenn v. Black, 31 Ga. 303, the action was brought by a sheriff for the use of certain judgment creditors to recover the purchase price of lots sold by him and an amendment adding other usees was held to be proper. The court said: "The plaintiff, at the trial term, moved to amend his declaration by adding other usees than those originally named in it. This amendment neither introduced a new cause of action, nor in any way varied the liability of the defendant. Technically speaking, it did not change the party plaintiff. The sheriff is the party plaintiff; with him the contract set out in the declaration was made. The usees are introduced to show, in the language of the statute, who is, or are, interested in the enforcement of the contract. If any party having an interest identical with the usees named in the declaration, be accidentally omitted, it would be proper and just that the omission be supplied by amendment. It was argued that there was, by this amendment, a misjoinder of plaintiffs. But there was, in reality, after the amendment, but one plaintiff, viz.: the sheriff. . . . There can be but one recovery for such failure, or refusal to comply with the terms of the sale, and as the Act provides that the sheriff shall sue for the use of the party interested, all persons so interested should be joined as usees. The money recovered, if any, goes into the sheriff's hands, and he is subject to the order of the Court, in distributing it among the usees. The amendment was properly allowed." In Townsend v. Three Lakes Lumber Co. 67 Wash. 654, 122 Pac. 29, an action brought to recover damages for the unlawful cutting and removal of timber from the plaintiff's land, an amendment adding as parties plaintiff the plaintiff's father and mother, who appeared to have some legal or equitable interest in the land, was held to be proper.

As to the right to amend a petition or complaint by adding or substituting a new plaintiff suing for the use of the original plaintiff see the note to Louisville etc. R. Co. v. Ramsay, Ann. Cas. 1913B 108.

It seems that an action brought by either husband or wife may be amended by adding as a party plaintiff the other spouse, where the latter has a legal or equitable interest in the cause of action. Pitts v. Powledge, 56 Ala. 147; Seipel v. Baltimore, etc. R. Extension Co. 129 Pa. St. 425; 18 Atl. 566; Hasbrouck v. Winkler, 48 N. J. L. 431, 6 Atl.

Co.* 21 Wash. 488, 58 Pac. 574; Davis v. Seattle, 37 Wash. 223, 79 Pac. 784. See also Ainger v. White, 85 Vt. 446, 82 Atl. 666. "During the trial in the District Court, it appeared that the original plaintiff's wife was a part owner of the goods for the destruction of which the suit was brought, and it was moved to nonsuit the plaintiff because his wife did not join in the action, the court refused to nonsuit and permitted the wife to be joined as co-plaintiff. We think the amendment was within the authority conferred by the statutes. . . . Besides, it did not in the least affect the merits of the suit. The husband, being in possession of the goods as an owner, at the time of the trespass by the defendant, a stranger to the title, had himself the right of recovering all the damages resulting from the injury done." Hasbrouck v. Winkler, 48 N. J. L. 431, 6 Atl. 22. "The objection to the amended complaint is not well taken. By the amendment the wife was joined with the husband. It will be assumed that the court was satisfied to grant the amendment, whether leave was formally entered before or after the amended complaint was filed. The property destroyed was community property, and there can be no question but that the wife was a proper party to the action with her husband." Hedican v. Pennsylvania F. Ins. Co. 21 Wash. 488, 58 Pac. 574. In Davis v. Seattle, 37 Wash. 223, 79 Pac. 784, the court in holding that an action by a married woman against a city for injuries sustained by her in falling on a defective walk could be amended by adding her husband as a party plaintiff, said: "The first contention of appellant which we will consider is that the court erred in allowing the amendment whereby the husband, B. W. Davis, was made a party plaintiff; appellant insisting that a married woman, residing with her husband, cannot, suing alone, recover damages for personal injuries sustained by herself; and that it is error to permit her, as such plaintiff, having no cause of action; to amend her complaint; and make her husband; the party having the cause of action, a party plaintiff, and to do so after the conclusion of the original plaintiff's evidence, and after she had rested her case on the trial. . . . While the respondent Alice J. Davis could not have recovered in this action, suing alone, did the court commit error in permitting the amendment whereby the husband, B. W. Davis, was made a party plaintiff, and afterwards, with his wife, recovered judgment? Section 4953, Bal. Code, provides: 'The court may, in furtherance of justice, and on such terms as may be proper, amend any pleadings or proceedings, by adding or striking out the name of any party,' etc. We think that, under this section, and under the circumstances of this case, the amendment was properly allowed. Appellant did not claim any surprise, and made no request for a continuance; no new issues, requiring additional preparation for trial, were formed; unnecessary delay and loss of time were avoided; there was no material change in the cause of action or in the defense; and no abuse of discretion by the court was shown. The amendment was certainly in 'furtherance of justice,' was properly allowed, and not erroneous."

A suit on a partnership claim may be amended by adding as parties plaintiff partners whose names have been omitted. McNabb v. Toronto Constr. Co. 19 Ont. W. Rep. 191, 2 Ont. W. "The bill is brought in the firm name and right, and has been litigated in that right, and the want of the other member is a defect that can be cured by amendment." Frese v. Bachof, 14 Blatchf. 432, 9 Fed. Cas. No. 5,110. "The action was originally commenced in the name of B. H. Tyrel, plaintiff. An amended petition was afterwards filed in which Elmer B. Tyrel and Benj. L. Tyrel were added, as co-plaintiffs with the original plaintiff, B. H. Tyrel, and it was alleged therein that the three co-plaintiffs were co-partners doing a general printing business under the firm or partnership name of B. H. Tyrel. . . . It is said that such amendment changed the cause of action from one in favor of one party to a cause of action in favor of several. Or from a several cause of action to a joint cause of action. This argument is without merit. The cause of action was in no respect changed. No new or different cause of action was introduced thereby. The controversy remained the same as it was before the amendment and the parties were the same, the only difference being that the amendment cured a defect in the description of the parties. Plaintiffs, co-partners, conducted their business under the firm name of B. H. Tyrel. The bringing in of the two remaining partners only operated to bring all of the parties in interest before the court in a cause of action which had accrued to the partnership of B. H. Tyrel." Tyrel v. Millihen, 135 Mo. App. 293, 115 S. W. 512.

OTHER BENEFICIARIES OF ACTION FOR DEATH BY WRONGFUL ACT.

It seems to be the more prevalent rule that an action to recover damages for death by wrongful act may be amended by adding parties plaintiff. Houglund v. Avery Coal, etc. Co. 152 Ill. App. 573, affirmed 246 Ill. 609, 93 N. E. 40; Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. La Porte, 33 Ind. App. 691, 71 N. E. 166; Silva v. New England Brick Co. 185 Mass. 151, 69 N. E. 1054; *Crockett v. Culbertson, 72 Tex. 375, 10 S. W. 706, 13 Am. St. Rep. 805, 3 L.R.A. 567; International, etc. R. Co. v. Howell, 105 S. W. 560, affirmed 101 Tex. 603, 111 S. W. 142. See also Hodges v. Twine, 9 Kan. 350; Weber v. Hannibal, 83 Mo. 262; International, etc. R. Co. v. Boykin, 32 Tex. Civ. App. 72, 74 S. W. 93. Compare Staunton Coal Co. v. Fischer, 119 Ill. App. 284; Johnson v. Phoenix Bridge Co. 197 N. Y. 317, 90 N. E. 953, modifying 133 App. Div. 807, 118 N. Y. S. 88; Paris, etc. R. Co. v. Robinson (Tex.) 127 S. W. 294; East Line, etc. R. Co. v. Culbertson, 72 Tex. 375, 10 S. W. 706, 13 Am. St. Rep. 805, 3 L.R.A. 567. In Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. La Porte, supra, the court in discussing the right to amend the complaint in an action for damages for death by wrongful act, said: "The right of action is given to the personal representative alone, and because he does not sue for the benefit of the decedent's estate, but sues for the recovery of damages which, when recovered, shall inure to the benefit of the widow and next of kin of the decedent, it is necessary that he show in his complaint the existence of some person or persons who have suffered pecuniary injury through the death of his intestate. If upon the trial . . . it should appear in evidence that there is some person not named in the complaint who suffers such loss, in addition to those named as the injured persons in the complaint or who is entitled exclusively to the damages recovered, we are of the opinion that the complaint might be amended to correspond with such proof." In Mostenbocker v. Shawnee Gas, etc. Co. (Okla.) 152 Pac. 82, it was said: "The amended petition purports to have been filed on behalf of the mother and brothers and sisters, and is a joint petition, and was evidently so considered by the court. . . . With reference to the third proposition of defendants in error, that the petition sought to change the cause of action from one under general statutes declaratory of the common law to one under the death by wrongful act statute, it appears that the action was originally brought by plaintiff Sarah E. Mostenbocker, in her own right, upon the theory that she was entitled to all of the damages which might be recovered in the action, and aside from the fact that the action was brought in her individual name, there is no substantial difference between the allegations of the petition as to the alleged acts of negligence upon which the case was tried in the former action and the amended petition in the present appeal. . . . It is true that in the former appeal counsel urged plaintiff's right to maintain the suit for her exclusive benefit under sections 2881, 2882, Comp. Laws 1909, which contention was overruled. The facts alleged, however, are the same so far as the cause of the injuries resulting in the death of deceased are concerned, out of which the cause of action accrued; and it is what the pleadings state by which we must be governed, instead of the argument and theories of counsel, put forward in a futile effort to sustain plaintiff's exclusive right to a recovery contrary to the provisions of the statute. The right of action was given by the statute, based upon the acts of negligence complained of, to the parties therein named, and we therefore hold that there was no change of the cause of action from one law to another." In Crockett v. St. Louis Transfer, Co. 52 Mo. 457, the action was "brought under the Damage Act (1 W. S. sec. 2, p. 519) by the father and mother to recover the sum of five thousand dollars as a forfeiture for the death of their infant child, occasioned by the alleged carelessness of defendant's agent in driving one of their transfer wagons." The father having died and the mother having remained pendente lite it was held that the second husband was properly made a party plaintiff at the trial after the close of the evidence. In Hongland v. Avery Coal, etc. Co. 152 Ill. App. 573, an action brought by two minors to recover damages for the death of their father caused by the default of the defendant, it was held that an amendment of the declaration after verdict by adding as a co-plaintiff an adult son of the deceased was proper. The court in Hongland v. Avery Coal, etc. Co. 246 Ill. 609, 93 N. E. 40, said: "The cause of action was the death of William Hongland under the circumstances alleged in the declaration and shown by the proofs, and the right to bring suit on the cause of action was given by the statute to his children. The suit was begun within one year from the time the cause of action accrued, and the addition of a necessary party plaintiff afterwards was not the commencement of a new suit or the statement of a new cause of action. The first section of the act in relation to amendments and joinders provides that the court in which an action is pending 'shall have power to permit amendments in any process, pleading or proceeding in such action, either in form or substance, for the furtherance of justice, on such terms as shall be just, at any time before judgment rendered therein.' The 39th section of the Practice act authorizes amendments at any time before final judgment, 'introducing any party necessary to be joined as plaintiff or joint defendant, discontinuing as to any joint plaintiff or joint defendant, changing the form of the action, and in any matter either of form or substance, in any process, pleading or proceeding which may enable the plaintiff to sustain the action for the claim for which it was intended to be brought or the defendant to make a legal defense.' These sections of the statutes contain ample authority to sustain the ruling of the court in permitting the amendment." Silva v. Brier Co. 185 Mass. 151, 69 N. E. 1054, was an action of tort under an employers' liability act brought by the plaintiff as administrator of the estate of a decedent who was killed by the negligence of his employer. The declaration alleged that the deceased was instantly killed, and at the trial it appeared that such was the case. Thereupon the defendant moved that a verdict should be directed for it on the ground that the action could not be maintained by the administrator. The plaintiff moved to amend his writ, by inserting as plaintiffs the names of the widow and children, and alleging that they were dependent on his wages for support, and that the action was brought for their benefit. The court in holding that the amendment could be allowed said: "We think that the court had power to allow the amendment. The declaration alleges in so many words 'that said deceased left no widow but three children for whose use and benefit this action is brought.' This, taken in connection with the further allegation that the deceased was instantly killed, shows, it seems to us, that the cause of action intended to be relied on was the right of recovery given by the statute to the next of kin in cases of instant death. The fact that the death is alleged to have been instant shows that the cause of action intended to be relied on could not have been the right that is given to the administrator to recover for death in cases where the death is not instantaneous, or where it is preceded by a period of conscious suffering. The mistake arose, not in regard to the nature of the cause of action, but in supposing that the administrator was the party in whose name the action should be brought. And in such a case it is plain that the court has power to allow an amendment bringing in the proper parties." In McArdie v. Pittsburg R. Co. 41 Pa. Super. Ct. 162; it was held that an action by a husband to recover damages for the death of his wife was properly amended by adding as plaintiffs the names of their children although the statutory period for bringing an action had expired.

But in East Line, etc. R. Co. v. Culberson, 72 Tex. 375, 10 S. W. 706, 13 Am. St. Rep. 805, 3 L.R.A. 567, it was held that an action brought by a wife for the benefit of herself and her children to recover damages for the death of the husband and father could not be amended after the statutory period for bringing the action had passed by adding as a party plaintiff the mother of the deceased. In Johnson v. Phenix Bridge Co. 197 N. Y. 316, 90 N. E. 953, modifying 133 App. Div. 907, 118 N. Y. S. 88, it appeared that an action was brought in New York, by the widow of the deceased as his administratrix to recover damages for the death of her husband under the Civil Code of lower Canada. The right given by that code was "not representative, but individual and personal" and but one action could be brought in behalf of those who were entitled to the indemnity. It was held that the action could not be amended by adding as parties plaintiff the father and children of the deceased after the period given by the statute for bringing the action had passed.

It seems to be fairly well settled that an action by a parent to recover damages for the death of a child may be amended by adding as a party plaintiff the other parent. Cytron v. St. Louis Transit Co. 205 Mo. 692, 104 S. W. 109; Waltz v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 31 Pa. Super. Ct. 286, affirmed in 216 Pa. St. 165, 65 Atl. 401; Bracken v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 32 Pa. Super. St. 230, 75 Atl. 189. See also Buel v. St. Louis Transfer Co. 45 Mo. 562, "The right to add the name of a husband, or of a wife, by way of amendment after the expiration of the statutory period, if either one had properly brought suit within the time limited, is no longer an open question." Sontum v. Mahoning, etc. R. Co. supra. In Cytron v. St. Louis Transit Co. 205 Mo. 692, 104 S. W. 109, it was said: "The cause was heard below on an amended petition. As originally brought, the father, Meyer Cytron, alone sued. The child was the son of Meyer and Rosie Cytron, husband and wife. Presently, but after one year had elapsed, an amended petition was filed, the amendment consisting in making Rosie Cytron a party plaintiff. Thereupon defendant lodged a demurrer—the force thereof spent on facts disclosed by that amendment, to-wit, the existence of a living mother as well as a father and a failure to join that mother as a plaintiff in the first petition. . . . At the close of the case defendant asked and the court refused to give a peremptory instruction. At the beginning of the case defendant objected to the introduction of any testimony because the petition did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. This objection was overruled—defendant saving timely exceptions to both said rulings. As we see it, it is one or the other of them that defendant now assigns as reversible error, in that by joining Rosie Cytron in the amended petition, the plaintiffs, in effect, instituted a new suit more than one year after the cause of action accrued—all this (it is said) in the teeth of the statute then existing, to-wit, Revised Statutes 1899, section 2868, reading: 'Limitation of Actions.—Every action instituted by virtue of the preceding sections of this chapter [chapter 17 on Damages, etc.] shall be commenced within one year after the cause of such action shall accrue.' . . . The statute in hand is not a span more or a whit less than one of limitation and repose. Its passport as such statute is stamped on its very face, because it is written there that it is a statute with an honest purpose of limitation and repose only. The legislature, intending it to fill that office, said so in so many words—the subhead of the section reading, 'Limitation of Actions.' We ought not to allow that obvious legislative intent to perish by construction; and by repeated adjudications we have so construed the statute as to preserve its life. . . . Indeed, it is only by the grace of allowing the averment of the answer, now under exposition, to be taken as a plea of the one-year Statute of Limitations that any life is left in it—or that it has place in an answer. And this is so because, strictissimi juris, in so far as the amendment may be claimed to constitute a departure, that departure, as such, was waived by answering over . . . and, being waived, the right to object to it is gone unless we interpret the plea as a plea of the Statute of Limitations, and, hence, a substantive defense. Being a statute of limitation, and the question under consideration in final analysis involving the right of amendment after the limitation has run, at the threshold lies the inquiry: 'What is the proper judicial attitude toward amendments with reference to the Statute of Limitations?' As said in Walker v. Wabash R. Co. [193 Mo. l. c. 474] supra: "The answer in the language of Napton, J., in Lottman v. Barnett, 62 Mo. l. c. 170, is: "Amendments are allowed expressly to save the cause from the Statute of Limitations, and courts have been liberal in allowing them, when the cause of action is not totally different." The rule thus announced is steadily applied. . . . The cause of action under the amended petition was the identical cause of action counted on in the original. It substantially required the same quantum and quality of evidence. The measure of damages was the same under each. The amendment did not substantially change the claim or defense. Hence the general identity of the transaction was preserved, and we conclude there is no substance in the assignment of error in hand."

Limitations of Rule.

An action cannot be amended by adding new parties plaintiff where the effect of the proposed amendment would be to introduce a new cause of action.

"The court has no authority to convert a pending action that cannot be maintained, into a new one, by admitting a new party plaintiff solely interested, and allowing him to assign a new and different cause of action, if the defendant shall object. The statute allowing necessary additional parties to be made in an action, does not contemplate such an exercise of power. There is neither principle nor statute, nor practice, that allows such a course of procedure; it would certainly lead to endless complications, confusion and injustice. An action separate and distinct from a pending one, must be begun according to the ordinary course of procedure." Merrill v. Merrill, 92 N. C. 657. "As soon as an action is brought and the complaint is filed, it takes on and has a distinctiveness and integrity of nature as to the parties to it, and that may come or be brought into it, and the cause or causes of action sued, that permeate and go with it to its end. It is not subject to the arbitrary control of the parties or of the court—it must be proceeded in according to law, and only such amendments as to parties or the cause of action, may be made as its nature and scope warrant. Amendments in this respect must be such, and only such, as are necessary to promote the completion of the action begun—all parties necessary for that purpose may come or be brought into it, and so also, any and all such amendments may be made as to the cause of action, as may be necessary to its completeness in all respects. But neither general principles of practice, nor the statute providing for amendments, authorize amendments that reach beyond these purposes. Especially, the court has no authority to allow such amendments as to parties, or as to the cause of action, as make a new, or substantially a new action, unless by the consent of the parties. Indeed, this would not be to amend, in any proper sense, but to substitute a new action by order, for and in place of a pending one, which the court cannot do. General principles of procedure, and, as well, the statutory regulations upon the subject, contemplate and intend that an action shall embrace but one litigation or matter, and only such parties, matters and things as are necessary, germane, and incident to it, except that several causes of action may be united in the same action, as specially provided by statute. Any other rule or method would certainly be subversive of orderly and intelligent procedure, and lead to intolerable confusion, as well as injustice to litigants. . . . Now, in the case before us, the action was brought by the second guardian against the first one and the sureties to his guardian bond, to compel him to account, etc. The plaintiff died pending the action. Afterwards, his administrator became a party plaintiff and filed his complaint, alleging a new, distinct and entirely different cause of action, that arose since the action began. "To this there was a demurrer, which was sustained, and the court allowed the plaintiff to make new parties plaintiff, who, putting aside the complaint and all prior pleadings, filed a new complaint, alleging a new, distinct and different cause of action, substituted for the original plaintiff and the original cause of action alleged. This was undertaking substantially to make a new action out of a pending one. The court therefore properly decided that the plaintiffs could not maintain the present action." State v. Turner, 96 N. C. 416, 2 S. E. 51. In Smith v. Boyd, 18 Ont. Pr. 296, reversing 18 Ont. Pr. 76; Macleman, J. A. in holding that an amendment adding a new party plaintiff was properly refused, said: "I am of opinion that the learned Chief Justice exercised a sound discretion at the trial in refusing the amendments then asked for. So far as the action was one for damages personal to the plaintiff by reason of the alleged fraud on the part of the defendants, the plaintiff had the opportunity of proceeding with it and trying it out, which he declined to do, and it was properly dismissed; nothing else could be done upon the evidence before the court. The amendments sought were for the purpose of recovering the money, not for the plaintiff himself, for that would have involved the taking of the partnership accounts, but for the benefit of the creditors of the firm, a cause of action, if any, which admittedly belonged to Clarkson, and which it may be doubtful whether the plaintiff could compel the creditors, or Mr. Clarkson on their behalf, to litigate. But, however that may be, the application at the trial was substantially an application for leave to bring a new action by or on behalf of a new plaintiff, which involved an amendment of the writ of summons, a new statement of claim, and other pleadings, as well as a new trial. That being so, I think, with great respect, it was the more convenient and proper course, to do as the learned Chief Justice did, to put an end to the existing action and to leave the plaintiff and Mr. Clarkson to bring such new action as they might be advised." In Peek v. Spencer, L. R. 5 Ch. (Eng.) 548, 39 L. J. Ch. 538, 18 W. R. 558, 22 L. T. N. S. 450, it was said: "As regards the merits of the case, there was certainly a knowledge by the plaintiff of the existence of enfranchised copyholders at the time when his original bill was filed. Then the answer was put in, and the original plaintiff's title was as distinctly put in issue, and as distinctly controverted as it is possible that a plaintiff's title can be; and the only allegations in the affidavit made on the application for leave to amend are, in effect, that the bill is defective for want of parties. I do not object to his amending as to the persons on whose behalf he sues, but what I do object to is the introduction of a new plaintiff with a new and distinct title. I do not think it would be just towards the defendant. The Master of the Rolls seems to have thought that the cases were very nearly identical, but I do not consider that the cases are identical, where the right of each depends upon totally different and distinct proofs, and upon totally different and distinct titles; in fact, Mr. Peek may possibly fail in the proof of everything, and yet Mr. Huntingford, because his name is added to the bill, may sustain it. Under those circumstances, I do not think it right that the name of a new plaintiff should be added." In Merrill v. Merrill, 92 N. C. 687, it was held that a suit for an accounting against an administrator brought by the next of kin of the decedent could not be amended by adding as a party plaintiff the administrator de bonis nris.

As a corollary of the rule that a new cause of action may not be introduced by the addition of parties plaintiff, if the original plaintiff has no cause of action he cannot by an amendment, adding parties plaintiff show a good cause of action. Clowes v. Hilliard, 4 Ch. D. (Eng.) 414, 46 L. J. Ch. 271, 25 W. R. 224; Walcott v. Lyons, 29 Ch. D. (Eng.) 584, 54 L. J. Ch. 847, 52 L. T. N. S. 399; State v. Rottaken, 34 Ark. 144; Anderson v. Superior Ct. 122 Cal. 216, 54 Pac. 829; Sillings v. Bumgardner, 9 Grat. (Va.) 273; Coffman v. Sangston, 21 Grat. (Va.) 263; Keyser v. Renner, 87 Va. 249, 12 S. E. 406; Franklin v. Hays, 2 Swan (Tenn.) 521. See also Matthews v. Bloodworth, 111 Ark. 545, 185 S. W. 263; Zukowski v. Armour, 107 Ill. App. 663; Davis v. New York, 14 N. Y. 506, 67 Am. Dec. 186, 3 Duer 119; Doyle v. Carney, 190 N. Y. 386, 83 N. E. 37, reversing 115 App. Div. 921, 101 N. Y. S. 1119. In Anderson v. Superior Ct. supra, it was held, under a statute requiring that in a suit by a creditors' bill five creditors must unite and must hold claims to the amount of five hundred dollars, that where a petition did not fulfil those requirements it could not be amended by adding new parties plaintiff.

In Lewis v. Alston, 176 Ala. 271, 58 So. 278, it was held that a bill could not be amended by adding a person as a party complainant one who was a necessary party to the suit but who should be a party respondent.

A cause of action cannot be amended by adding as plaintiff persons who have no interest in the suit. Riely v. Kinzel, 85 Va. 480, 7 S. E. 907; Cass v. McGatchen, 15 Manitoba 667, 669. See also Cimini v. Zambiarano, 36 R. I. 123, 69 Atl. 295, wherein it was said: "Rulings permitting amendments and changes of parties are subject to review by this court, if the cause comes here upon exception. The amendment permitted by the superior court was to make the allegation of the declaration conform to what we have called a meaningless condition of the bond that the plaintiff in replevin should pay such damages and costs as the plaintiff in replevin should recover against him. According to the opinion which we have heretofore stated concerning this condition the amendment was a needless one; but in no view of the matter did the amendment harm the defendant. The action of the superior court in adding Antonio Liberatore as a party plaintiff was erroneous; not because the court was without power to add parties at the time the change was made, but because upon the evidence Liberatore was not properly a party to the action."

It seems that an action cannot be amended by adding a party as plaintiff without his consent. Matthews v. Bloodworth, 111 Ark. 545, 165 S. W. 263; Watt v. Popple, 16 Manitoba 348; Hill v. Hambly, 12 British Columbia 253; Hogan v. Baetz, 1 West. L. Rep. (Yukon Ter.) 393. Compare Harris v. Swanson, 62 Ala. 299; Union Naval Stores Co. v. Pugh, 156 Ala. 369, 47 So. 48. In several jurisdictions the written consent of the party to be added as a plaintiff is necessary. Major v. Mackenzie, 17 Ont. Pr. 18; Winniffrith v. Finkelman, 25 Ont. W. Rep. 692; 5 Ont. W. N. 781; Fricker v. Van Grutten [1896] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 649, 65 L. J. Ch. 823, 75 L. T. N. S. 117, 45 W. R. 53; Frampton v. Williams, 2 F. & F. (Eng.) 603; Tryon v. National Provident Inst. 16 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 678, 54 L. T. N. S. 167, 34 W. R. 398, 55 L. J. Q. B. 236. See also Cox v. James, 19 Ch. D. 55, 51 L. J. Ch. 184, 30 W. R. 228, 45 L. T. N. S. 471. In Fricker v. Van Grutten supra, it appeared that the solicitors for the party to be added, in his presence and with his authority, signed a written consent to add him as a plaintiff. Notwithstanding that, the court held that he was improperly added as he had not signed the consent with his own hand.

It seems that where the jurisdiction of a federal court is dependent on the diversity of citizenship of the parties, an amendment adding an indispensable party plaintiff will not be permitted where the effect of the amendment would be to destroy the jurisdiction of the court. Delaware, etc. R. Co. v. Jersey City, 168 Fed. 128.

LOWENSTEIN ET AL.

Arkansas Supreme Court—June 15, 1914.

113 Ark. 404; 169 S. W. 224.

Wills — Jurisdiction of Equity to Construe.

A court of equity has jurisdiction to construe a will creating a trust.

[See 13 Ann. Cas. 2; 129 Am. St. Rep. 79.]

Rules of Construction — Intent of Testator.

The court in construing a will must ascertain the intention of testator as gathered from his entire will, and give effect to it, when not in conflict with recognized rules of law.

Trusts — Creation.

A testator owning chiefly real estate and some personal property of speculative value, who directs his executors to pay specified sums to trust companies, to pay specified sums in instalments to beneficiaries named, with gift over on their death, and who directs the executors to close up the estate as speedily as possible, creates a trust for the benefit of the beneficiaries named.

Executors — Power to Sell Lands.

An executor has no power to sell the land of his testator, unless directed to do so by the will, either expressly or by necessary implication.

[See 78 Am. St. Rep. 178.]

Same.

A testator, who directs his executor to dispose of his real estate, thereby confers on the executive power to execute the requisite deeds of conveyance.

Same.

Any words in a will which show an intention to confer on the executor power to sell real estate and execute the requisite deeds, or any form of a will which imposes duties which cannot be performed without a sale, necessarily creates a power of sale.

Power to Mortgage.

Where the bulk of the estate of a testator, who directs his executors to deposit specified sums with trust companies to pay to named beneficiaries, is real estate, and the testator directs the executors to close up the estate as speedily as possible, so that the creditors and beneficiaries may promptly receive what is due them, the executors have power to sell, but not to mortgage, the estate.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A mere power of sale of real estate conferred on executors by will does not include a power to mortgage.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The court, in construing the provisions of a will conferring power on the executor, must seek to give effect to the intention of testator, and, where the will merely authorizes by implication the executor to sell real estate, the court may not construe the provisions to authorize a mortgage.

[See note at end of this case.]

Sale by Executor — Rights of Lessee.

Where an executor authorized by will to sell real estate exercises the power of sale of land encumbered by a lease made by testator, the sale must be made subject to the rights of the lessee.

Appeal from Chancery Court, Pulaski county: MARTINEAU, Chancellor.

Action to construe will. A. M. Heiseman et al., executors, plaintiffs, and Emilie Lowenstein et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. REVERSED.

[405] Appellants, as executors of the will of Abe Stiewel, deceased, instituted this action in the chancery court against appellees, who are devisees and legatees under the will. The object of the complaint is to have a construction of the will and the directions of this court as to the duty and power of the executors in selling, mortgaging, and leasing the lands of their testator. Abe Stiewel died in Little Rock, Pulaski County, Arkansas, on the 25th day of August, 1913, and the will was duly admitted to probate and appellants qualified as executors under the will. The will is as follows:

"1. I desire that all of my debts shall be paid in full.

"2. It is my desire that my sister, Mrs. Emilie Lowenstein, in addition to insurance for one thousand ($1,000) dollars in the order of B'nai B'rith, which she holds on my life and money she has on deposit with me, shall receive from my estate the sum of twenty thousand ($20,000) dollars and interest in the manner herein provided for, as follows, to wit: That is to say, the executors of my will shall cause to be deposited in a proper and solvent trust company the sum of twenty thousand ($20,000) dollars at the best rate of interest they can obtain therefor to the credit of said Emilie Lowenstein, conditioned that she shall not draw exceeding the sum of two hundred ($200) dollars per month as long as she may live, or the said fund may last; said money to be so deposited as soon as an order, if required, can be obtained from the probate court having jurisdiction of my estate to do so.

"2. Should my said sister die before the said sum is exhausted, then her son, Julius Frank, if living, shall receive five thousand ($5,000) dollars of said sum so remaining [406] to be paid to him in like manner, that is, at the rate of two hundred ($200) dollars per month by said trust company, and the remainder of said sum of twenty thousand ($20,000) dollars shall be disposed of as hereinafter set forth.

"3. It is my desire that my sister, Mrs. Fannie Shield, shall receive from my estate the sum of fifteen thousand ($15,000) dollars, and interest, in the following manner, to wit: That is to say, the executors of my will shall cause to be deposited in a proper and solvent trust company the sum of fifteen thousand ($15,000) dollars, at the best rate of interest they can obtain therefor, to the credit of said Fannie Shield, conditioned that she shall not draw exceeding the sum of two hundred ($200) dollars per month so long as she may live, or the said fund may last, said money to be deposited as aforesaid as soon as an order, if required, can be obtained from the probate court having jurisdiction of my estate to do so, and if any part of said fund shall remain on hand at my sister's death, it shall be disposed of as hereinafter set forth.

"4. It is my desire that my sister, Mrs. Julius Meyer, shall receive from my estate the sum of fifteen thousand ($15,000) dollars free from the claims or control of her husband or her sons; said sum to be forwarded by my said executors to Rudolph Richard, of Selma, Alabama, son-in-law of said Mrs. Julius Meyer, as soon as the order, if required, of said probate court can be obtained so to do, conditioned that said Rudolph Richard shall deposit said money in some solvent trust company at a fair rate of interest, and that my sister, Mrs. Julius Meyer, shall not draw exceeding the sum of two hundred and fifty ($250) dollars per month so long as she may live, or the said fund may last. Should my sister die before the said sum is exhausted, then her four (4) daughters named Lillian, Sadie, Gertie and Hulda, are to be the recipients of the two hundred and fifty ($250) dollars per month in lieu of their mother, until their death, or the fund is exhausted.

[407] "5. It is my desire that my brother, H. I. Stiewel, in addition to any indebtedness he now owes me (which I hereby remit), shall receive from my estate the sum of ten thousand ($10,000) dollars, and interest, to be paid to him by my executors as follows, to wit: That is to say, they shall pay to him the sum of five hundred ($500) dollars in cash and the sum of nine thousand, five hundred ($9,500) dollars shall cause to be deposited in a proper and solvent trust company at the best rate of interest they can procure therefor, to the credit of said H. I. Stiewel, conditioned that he shall not draw exceeding the sum of one hundred and fifty ($150) dollars per month so long as he may live or the said fund may last; said sum to be so deposited as soon as the order, if required, of said probate court can be obtained so to do.

Should any of the said sum of nine thousand five hundred ($9,500) dollars and interest remain on hand on the date of his death, it shall be disposed of as hereinafter set forth:

"6. It is my desire that my nephew, Julius Frank, shall receive from my estate in addition to the legacy referred to in the second paragraph of this will the sum of one thousand ($1,000) dollars from my said executors as soon as an order, if required, can be obtained from said probate court to do so.

"7. It is my desire that my nephew, Albert Shield, and my niece, Carrie Shield, shall respectively receive from my estate the following sums, to wit: Albert Shield, one thousand ($1,000) and Carrie Shield, two thousand five hundred ($2,500) dollars, from my executors as soon as an order, if required, can be obtained from said probate court to do so.

"8. It is my desire that my executors shall pay the following amounts respectively to my nephews and nieces hereinafter named in this paragraph as soon as the order, if required, of said probate court can be obtained to do so, to wit: One hundred ($100) dollars each to my niece, Edna Shield, my nephew, Julius Shield, my nephew, Morris M. Meyer, my nephew, Arthur Meyer, my niece, Elsie Richard (nee Meyer).

[408] "9. I desire that my executors shall pay over to my niece, Elsie Richard (nee Meyer) for her three (3) children the sum of five hundred ($500) dollars as soon as they obtain the order, if required, of said probate court to do so.

"10. It is my desire that my nieces, Gertie Meyer, Lillian Meyer, Sadie Meyer, and Hulda Meyer, shall each receive from my estate the sum of twenty-five hundred ($2,500) dollars to be paid by my executors to Rudolph Richard, of Selma, Alabama, in trust for them, conditioned that he shall pay over said sum in such installments or manner as to him may seem best calculated to meet their needs. But in any event to be paid over on the marriage of each of them; in the event either of said nieces shall die before the said legacy shall be paid to her, the same shall go to the surviving ones among my said nieces. In the event of the marriage of any of said nieces, their husband shall have no control over said amount; should any of said nieces die before me, the sum so devised shall go as hereinafter provided.

"11. It is my desire that my niece, Carrie Mothner (nee Richard), shall receive from my estate the sum of twenty-five hundred ($2,500) dollars and interest in manner following, to wit: My executors shall, as soon as an order, if required, of said probate court shall be obtained so to do, cause to be deposited in a proper and solvent trust company to her credit at the best rate of interest they can obtain the said sum conditioned that she may draw not exceeding one hundred ($100) dollars per month thereof so long as she may live or said fund shall last, and her husband shall have no control over the same, and if any of said amount is still on hand at her death, it shall be given to her children as if she was living.

"12. To my nephew, Morris S. Richard, I bequeath fifteen hundred ($1,500) dollars in addition to the indebtedness he now owes me (which I remit), and to my nephew, Sidney Richard, I also bequeath fifteen hundred ($1,500) dollars, which said sums my executors, as soon as an order can be obtained, if required so to do, shall cause to be deposited in some proper and solvent trust [409] company at the best rate of interest they can obtain in the names of said nephews, respectively, conditioned that neither of said nephews shall draw exceeding fifty ($50) dollars per month of said fund, so long as they may respectively live or said fund may last. Should any part of either of said sums remain on hand at the death of either of my said nephews, it shall be disposed of as hereinafter set forth.

"13. My executors shall cause to be paid out of my estate to my sister-in-law, Mrs. Hattie Stiewel, in trust for her three children, the sum of twenty-five hundred ($2,500) dollars as soon as they can get an order, if required, of the said probate court so to do; in addition to said sum they shall cause to be deposited in some proper and solvent trust company the sum of ten thousand ($10,000) dollars at the best rate of interest they can obtain, and the said sum shall be paid pro rata to my nieces, Theresa and Sadie Stiewel, and my nephew, Morris Stiewel, so that each shall receive a third thereof when they shall become of age or marry; and if either before date of distribution shall die one before the other, the share of such one shall go to the others, the interest, however, accumulating on said amount may be used to defray expenses of the support and education of such children and may be paid over to their guardian or mother for this purpose.

"14. My executors shall, as soon as an order, if required, of said probate court can be obtained so to do pay to my four nephews, Harry Vernon Stiewel, Robert Stiewel, Louis Stiewel, and Roy Julian Stiewel, two hundred and fifty ($250) dollars each.

"15. If any legatee shall die before me the legacy left him or her by this will shall lapse.

"16. All sums or amounts not required to pay debts, cost of administration, executors and other expenses and all amounts or parts of my estate not above specifically devised, shall go to my heirs to correspond in the distribution thereof to the proportion which the several legacies above given bears to the entire value of my estate.

[410] "17. I nominate as executors of this will and testament, A. M. Heiseman, Jacob Niemeyer and Morris M. Cohn, and in case of death, or other disqualification or refusal of either of said persons to act as such, then the remaining two may act, and selecting a third person to act with them as such executor, or two may act, but not less than two executors shall act, and the sum of $5,000 is hereby set apart to be and constitute full compensation for all services performed by said parties as such executors; if they desire to charge that sum or any part thereof. I desire that the said persons may act as such executors without being required to give bond as such as it is my desire that said executors shall close up the estate committed to their charge as speedily as possible, so that the creditors of my estate, if there are any, and my legatees may promptly receive what is due to them.

"18. Should my estate be insufficient in amount to pay all of the legacies above mentioned after payment of expenses, debts, and executors and costs, the legacies shall be proportionately reduced."

The following facts were proved: The appraised value of the estate left by the testator is about two hundred thousand dollars. The debts owed by the estate amount to about one hundred thousand dollars. The testator left very little cash, and his estate comprised both real and personal property, but consisted chiefly of real estate. His personal property consisted chiefly of stocks in certain corporations. He owned 3,150 shares of Arkansas and Arizona Copper Company stock; 326½ shares of stock in the National Copper Mining Company; 70 shares of stock in the Ozark Diamond Company; and 310 shares of stock in the Southern Trust Company of Little Rock. The evidence shows that this stock could not be disposed of to advantage by public sale, as required by statute. Part of the real estate owned by the testator is situated on Second and Main streets, in the city of Little Rock, for which he paid seventy-five thousand dollars. The present value of it is estimated at one hundred and thirty-five thousand dollars. On the day Mr. Stiewel [411] died, he made an agreement with the Bankers' Trust Company, whereby he agreed to give it a lease of that property for a period of thirty years at a rental of 6 per cent.; on a one hundred and fifty thousand dollar valuation for the first ten years, 8 per cent.; on a valuation of one hundred and sixty thousand dollars for the next ten years; and 6 per cent. on a valuation of one hundred and seventy thousand dollars for the third ten years. By the same document he gave the bank an option to buy the property for the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, provided it exercise the option within one year. It was also provided that Stiewel should have the right to sell to any other purchaser if he desired to do so, with the privilege to lessee of having the right to buy at the same price. After Stiewel's death, his heirs and legatees named in his will, who are appellees in this action, executed a document whereby they ratified and carried into effect the said agreement. The evidence shows that this property cannot be sold to advantage at public sale. It also shows that the other real estate mentioned in the will cannot be sold to advantage at public sale.

The chancellor sustained a demurrer to the complaint of appellants, and the case is here on appeal.

Morris M. & Louis M. Cohn for appellants.

[413] HART, J. (after stating the facts).—In the case of Williamson v. Grider, 97 Ark. 588, 135 S. W. 361, the court said:

"Where a trust is created by a will, a court of equity has jurisdiction to construe the will. The power is incident to the jurisdiction which courts of chancery have over trusts. And this upon the theory that as chancery will compel the performance of trusts, so it will assist trustees and protect them in the due performance of the trusts, whenever they seek the aid and discretion of [414] the court as to its establishment, management, and execution."

So, also, in the case of Davis v. Whittaker, 38 Ark. 435, the court said:

"Such suits are within the ordinary jurisdiction of courts of equity. They are commonly entertained as the suits of the trustees or executors seeking the aid, advice, and protection of the court in the execution of the trust," etc.

In regard to the construction of wills, in the case of Parker v. Wilson, 98 Ark. 553, 136 S. W. 981, the court said:

"The power of one, legally competent to make a will, to dispose of his property as he sees fit, subject to the restrictions provided by the statutes, is a legal incident to ownership. In construing the provisions of a will, the intention of the maker is first to be ascertained, and, when not at variance with recognized rules of law, must govern. The intention of the testator must be gathered from all parts of the will, and such construction be given as best comports with the purposes and objects of the testator, and as will least conflict." See, also, Gregory v. Welch, 90 Ark. 152, 118 S. W. 404.

Tested by these principles, we think the will in question created a trust. The testator was a business man of long experience and knew the extent of his indebtedness and the amount and kind of property held by him. He knew that he had very little cash on hand, and that his estate consisted for the most part of real property, and the balance of personal property of speculative value. After the payment of his debts, he directed that legacies should be paid by his executors to certain of his relatives; that these legacies should be paid in cash, and the amount thereof should be deposited in trust companies to be paid to the legatees in the manner directed by the will. The seventeenth clause of his will provided that his executors "shall close up the estate committed to their charge as speedily as possible so that the creditors of my estate, if there are any, and my legatees may promptly receive what is due to them." The testator also recognized that his whole estate might be insufficient for the purpose of [415] paying his debts and the specific legacies provided in the will; for the last clause of his will provides: "Should my estate be insufficient in amount to pay all of the legacies above mentioned after payment of expenses, debts, and executors and costs, the legacies shall be proportionately reduced." This brings us to the question of whether the executors were given the power in the will to sell, mortgage or lease the property. It is well settled that an executor has no power to sell the land of his testator unless directed to do so by the will either expressly or by necessary implication. In this case the will does not give the executors express authority to sell the real estate. It is equally well settled that, because the testator has a right to dispose of his real estate as he sees fit, if he directs that to be done by his executors, which necessarily implies that the estate is first to be sold, a power is given by implication to the executors to make such sale and execute the requisite deeds of conveyance. Going v. Emery, 16 Pick. (Mass.) 107, 26 Am. Dec. 645; Lippincott v. Lippincott, 19 N. J. Eq. 121. In the latter case the court held:

"The appointment of one as executor of a will that directs lands to be sold, does not, of itself, confer on him the power to sell. But if the executor is directed by the will, or bound by law, to see to the application of the proceeds of the sale, or if the proceeds, in the disposition of them, are mixed up and blended with the personalty—which it is the duty of the executor to dispose of and pay over—then a power of sale is conferred on the executor by implication." See, also, May v. Brewster, 187 Mass. 524, 73 N. E. 546.

In 2 Perry on Trusts (4 ed.) § 776, the author says:

"No particular form of words is necessary to create a power of sale. Any words which show an intention to create such power, or any form of instrument which imposes duties upon the trustee that he cannot perform without a sale, will necessarily create a power of sale in the trustee."

[416] Tested by these legal principles, we think the will conferred upon the executors the power to sell the lands of the testator. As we have already seen, the bulk of his estate consisted of real property, and several legacies were left which the testator directed to be paid in cash. His directions in this respect could not be complied with unless the executors had the power to sell the real estate left by him. He directed his executors to close up the estate committed to their charge as speedily as possible, so that his creditors might be promptly paid and the legatees promptly receive what is due them.

We now come to the question as to whether a power of sale includes a power to mortgage. There is some conflict in the authorities on this question, but we believe that the better reasoning, if not the weight of authority, is to the effect that a mere power of sale does not include a power to mortgage. Stokes v. Payne, 58 Miss. 614, 38 Am. Rep. 340; Bloomer v. Waldron, 3 Hill (N. Y.) 361; Ferry v. Laible, 31 N. J. Eq. 566; Willis v. Smith, 66 Tex. 31, 17 S. W. 247; Hubbard v. German Catholic Congregation, 34 Ia. 34; Cumming v. Williamson, 1 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 17. This results from the fact that a mortgage is regarded as a security for debt rather than a conditional estate, and hence its execution is regarded as creating an encumbrance rather than as transferring the title. That is to say, a mortgage is treated as a mere security for a debt, and the legal estate can only be used for the purpose of enforcing the payment of the debt secured. The cardinal principle that governs in the construction of powers is to effectuate the intention of the donor; but we cannot gather from the terms of the will any intention on the part of the testator looking to a mortgage of his estate. The will does not in express terms authorize the executors either to borrow money or to mortgage the real estate. By the terms of the will, the executors were directed to close up the estate as speedily as possible, and to pay the debts of the testator and the legacies named in the will promptly. The testator anticipated that the whole estate might be necessary to pay all the legacies and to pay his debts. Therefore, [417] in the last clause of his will he provided that if his estate was not sufficient to pay all the legacies after the payment of his debts, the legacies should be proportionately reduced. All this precludes the supposition that a mortgage was ever within the intention of the testator. See Williamson v. Grider, supra. And, as we have already seen, a power of sale does not include the power to mortgage except in those States where a mortgage is characterized as a conditional sale instead of being regarded as a security for a debt.

We do not deem it necessary to decide whether or not the executors have the power to make a lease for a long term of years as it does not seem to us that it will be necessary for the executors to do this. It appears from the allegations of the complaint that before his death, Stielwel executed a lease for the term of thirty years to the Bankers' Trust Company on the property at the corner of Second and Main streets in the city of Little Rock, and, of course, any sale of that property by the executors will be made subject to the rights of the lessee under the lease. It may be said, however, that the will places the control and management of the estate in the hands of the executors, and they will have power to make leases for such length of time as may be necessary until they exercise the authority to sell and dispose of the land. It follows that the decree will be reversed and the cause remanded with directions to the chancellor to enter a decree in accordance with this opinion.

NOTE.

Power of Trustee to Mortgage Trust Property.

The reported case adheres to the general rule laid down in Stump v. Warfield, 104 Md. 530, 10 Ann. Cas. 255, that a mere power given to a trustee to sell the trust property does not include a power to mortgage it. So in the recent case of Sanger v. Farnham, 220 Mass. 34, 107 N. E. 359, it was held that the trustees who were authorized to sell the trust property for the purpose of making a division of the estate did not have power to mortgage it. Similarly in Warren v. Pazolt, 203 Mass. 328, 89 N. E. 381, it was said that the borrowing of money on mortgage was not a necessary incident of a trustee's power to sell the trust property and to change investments. Likewise in Snyder v. Collier, 85 Neb. 552, 123 N. W. 1023, 133 Am. St. Rep. 682, it was said that ordinarily a legal presumption exists that a trustee has no power to mortgage the trust estate, and that a prospecting mortgagee should therefore exercise reasonable diligence to ascertain whether the trustee has authority to encumber the trust property. And see Hamilton v. Hamilton, 149 Ia. 321, 128 N. W. 380.

The court in the reported case, however, alludes to the cardinal principle that in construing a power the intention of the donor is of paramount importance. This principle has been applied in several recent cases. Thus in Dewein v. Hooms, 237 Mo. 23, 139 S. W. 195, it appeared that by a will the widow of the decedent was made executrix and was given "full power and absolute authority" to dispose of his property, and the testator directed that this clause should be "so construed as to give her absolute title to and in the whole of my estate, . . . to enable her to dispose of the same at her option, and that she may make a good title to the purchaser or purchasers." It was held that a power to encumber the property by a deed of trust existed, especially in view of the fact that the decedent indicated clearly by his will that his widow was the chief object of his bounty and that it was his foremost wish that she should be cared for after he should die. Likewise in Hamilton v. Hamilton, 149 Ia. 321, 128 N. W. 380, it was held that where the power was testamentary in character the intent of the testator was the central question, and that under a will which read "all the rest, residue and remainder of my estate, . . . I will, devise and bequeath to my beloved husband, . . . to have and to hold . . . during his life with full power to sell, transfer and dispose of the same or as much thereof as may from time to time be needed for his support and maintenance during his said lifetime," the power to mortgage, for the purpose mentioned in the will, was given.

It has been held that though the power to mortgage is expressly given, a trustee does not have a broad power to mortgage for any purpose. Williamson v. Grider, 97 Ark. 588, 135 S. W. 361; Andrews v. Guayaquil, etc. R. Co. 75 N. J. Eq. 535, 72 Atl. 355; Smith v. Peyrot, 201 N. Y. 210, 94 N. E. 662, reversing judgment 134 App. Div. 954, 118 N. Y. S. 1143; which affirmed judgment in 116 N. Y. S. 543. Thus where a testatrix empowered the trustees named in her will to "mortgage, sell or lease the lands belonging to me and to apply the proceeds of such rents to the payment of my debts, and should they deem it expedient to mortgage said lands for the purposes above mentioned, then their mortgage of same so given shall bind my children, and the lands are subject to said mortgage," it was held that no power was given to the trustees to mortgage crops and personal property, rents, etc., "for securing advances to operate a plantation. Williamson v. Grider, 97 Ark. 588, 135 S. W. 361. Likewise it has been held that under a will which gave the executors full power in their discretion to sell, convey and mortgage any or all of the testator's real estate "for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this instrument" the executors had no power to mortgage the estate for the purpose of raising funds to loan or advance to the heirs, where it appeared that at the time the attempt to mortgage was made the debts and specific legacies had all been paid. Smith v. Peyrot, 201 N. Y. 210, 94 N. E. 662, reversing judgment 134 App. Div. 954, 118 N. Y. S. 1143, which affirmed judgment in 116 N. Y. S. 543. So where an association by deed of trust conveyed certain securities to trustees with the power to dispose of them only for single purpose, namely, that of raising money in order to enable the association to perform its obligations under a construction contract, it was held that a pledge of the securities by the trustees to secure advances made for purposes other than the construction work, was invalid. Andrews v. Guayaquil, etc. R. Co. 75 N. J. Eq. 535, 72 Atl. 355.

In several recent cases an order authorizing a mortgage of the trust property has been granted on an application by the trustee to the court. In Butler v. Badger, 128 Minn. 99, 150 N. W. 233, it was said that a court, on application, clearly has the right to authorize a trustee to raise a temporary loan secured by a mortgage on the trust property. And in New York L. Ins. etc. Co. v. Conkling, 159 App. Div. 337, 144 N. Y. S. 638, it was said that a testamentary trustee may be authorized by the court to mortgage real property held by him for the purposes of paying off taxes thereon.

Where it appears that contemplated permanent improvements to trust property will increase the rental and market value thereof the trustee, on application to the court, may be authorized to mortgage the premises to raise money to effect the improvements. Matter of Windsor Trust Co. 142 App. Div. 772, 127 N. Y. S. 586. And it has been held that a court in the exercise of its general chancery jurisdiction may authorize a trustee to mortgage the trust property to the extent of the interest of the life tenants, for the purpose of securing a loan to pay a collateral inheritance tax and for making necessary repairs on the trust property, where the estate is held in trust as a home for the joint use and benefit, support, and maintenance out of the proceeds, of a husband and wife and his infant children during the lives of the parents, with remainder in fee simple to the children. Shirkey v. Kirby, 110 Va. 455, 66 S. E. 40, 135 Am. St. Rep. 949.

In Lyddane v. Lyddane, 144 Ky. 159, 137 S. W. 838, it appeared that a testator devised all of his property to his widow in trust for the benefit of herself and her children, to be managed by her as she might think best until his youngest child attained the age of twenty years, at which time, if a majority of his heirs consented, the estate might be divided.

The estate, at the time of the testator's death, was in debt to a considerable sum which had been reduced by the widow's management to about $9500. When the creditors pressed for payment she applied to the circuit court for authority to borrow money on the security of a mortgage to pay off the outstanding indebtedness, and it was held that, under the facts as disclosed a proper case had been made out for allowing a mortgage of the property.

In Long v. Simmons Female College, 218 Mass. 135, 105 N. E. 553, it appeared that real estate had been devised to trustees in trust to pay the income "or so much thereof as said trustees shall see fit" to the testator's daughter, "and so much of said remainder as shall not be paid, applied or used" the trustees were directed to hold subject to certain provisions in the will which established a trust in certain property, the income of which was to be paid to the testator's granddaughter and her issue. The trustees were given no power to mortgage the real estate. Under a statute which provided that "probate courts . . . may authorize any trustee or trustees appointed under any will, trust, deed or indenture, and having the control or management of any real estate, to mortgage the same for the purpose of paying the sums assessed thereon for betterments, or the expenses of repairs and improvements thereon made necessary by such betterments," it was held that the probate court had jurisdiction to empower the trustees to mortgage the land whereon buildings stood which were destroyed by the great Boston fire of 1872 and to order a certain portion of the income from the property to be set aside as a fund for the payment of the principal of the debt.

In Shepard v. Shepard, 20 Ont. W. Rep. 810, 3 Ont. W. N. 469, it was held that an act which conferred on a court the power to make an order authorizing trustees to mortgage trust property should not be construed as giving the court power to compel the trustees to mortgage.

It has been held that where a deed of trust authorized and gave trustee the power to mortgage "all or any portion of the property," the trustee was liable personally where he bound himself by a personal covenant in a mortgage deed, even though he described himself as covenanting as a trustee, provided there was nothing in the case to show that both parties did not intend to relieve the trustee from personal liability, or to indicate that the mortgagee intended to rely solely on the mortgaged property for his security. Knipp v. Bagby, 126 Md. 461, 95 Atl. 60.

Appeal from District Court, Clay county: LEE, Judge.

Action to cancel notes. W. G. Crandall et al., plaintiffs, and E. E. Trowbridge et al., defendants. From judgment rendered, defendant Swenson appeals. AFFIRMED.

[155] Action in equity to cancel notes given by the plaintiffs, one of which was for $1,200.00 and endorsed to defendant Swenson, the other for $2,500.00, endorsed by Swenson to Gillespie, and by him endorsed to the Peoples Savings Bank, of Spencer, Iowa. Defendants were not all served and there was no appearance for some of them. Defendant Swenson, who is the appellant, is a resident of Nebraska. Service of original notice was made upon him by the sheriff of Clay County on October 28, 1912, at Spencer, Iowa. He appeared specially for the purpose of objecting to the jurisdiction of the court and moved to set aside the return and service on the ground that he was induced by the fraud of plaintiffs to come to Spencer for the purpose of enabling plaintiffs to serve the notice upon him there. The hearing was had upon affidavits and oral examination of some of the persons making affidavits. Appellant's motion was overruled, and he appeals.

Alvin F. Johnson and Helsell & Helsell for appellant.

Payette & Whitney for plaintiffs and appellees.

W. W. Cornsoll for defendants First National Bank and Peoples Savings Bank.

[156] PAXTON, J.—With the merits of the controversy between plaintiffs and defendants, we have nothing to do on this appeal. There has been no general appearance, or plea to, or trial upon the merits, except that the Savings Bank has filed an answer. The appearance by defendant Swenson was under Par. 4, Chap. 162, Acts of the Thirty-Fourth General Assembly. The question is, whether plaintiffs practiced a fraud upon appellant, as alleged. It is almost entirely a question of fact. The fraud alleged is, that the presence of appellant in Clay County, Iowa, was procured by plaintiffs upon the representation that if he would come to Spencer, Iowa, he would there have delivered to him an automobile as payment of the $1,200 note of plaintiffs which Swenson held, and by plaintiffs' concealing from him certain facts which, if he had known, would have caused him not to come within the jurisdiction. Appellant says his presence in Iowa was not voluntary; that plaintiffs' purpose was unknown to him. If the presence of appellant in Iowa was procured by trickery, deceit, or the fraudulent and wrongful acts of plaintiffs, or those acting in their behalf, the court did not obtain jurisdiction, and in that case the motion to quash should have been sustained. Appellant cites upon this point: Dunlap v. Cody, 31 Ia. 260, 7 Am. Rep. 129; Mooney v. Union Pac. R. Co. 80 Ia. 346, 14 N. W. 343; Toof v. Foley, 87 Ia. 8, 54 N. W. 59; Mahoney v. State Ins. Co. 133 Ia. 570, 110 N. W. 1041, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 490; Allen v. Wharton, 59 Hun 622; 13 N. Y. S. 38; Townsend v. Smith, 47 Wis. 623, 3 N. W. 439, 22 Am. Rep. 793; Van Horn v. Great Western Mfg. Co. 37 Kan. 523, 15 Pac. 562; Wood v. Wood, 78 Ky. 624; Chubbuck v. Cleveland, 37 Minn. 466, 35 N. W. 302; 5 Am. St. Rep. 864; Wanzer v. Bright, 52 Ill. 35; Heston v. Heston, 52 N. J. Eq. 91; 28 Atl. 8; Battelle v. Youngstown Rolling Mill Co. 16 Lea (Tenn.) 355; Frawley v. Pennsylvania Casu- alty Co. 124 Fed. 259; Cavanaugh v. Manhattan Transit Co. 133 Fed. 818.

Plaintiffs both signed the notes and were interested in [157] the California land deal, and were investigating the facts to make defense. They are each chargeable with the acts of the other, or their attorney, as to the service of notice in the action by plaintiffs. Toof v. Foley, supra.

It is the claim of appellant that plaintiffs had been planning to have Swenson come to Iowa in order to serve him with notice, and that they concealed such purpose from him. There is no other claim of concealment. If such was not their purpose, then, of course, there was no concealment of it. The evidence, which will be later pointed out, shows that until after Crandall had the conversation with Gillespie on the morning of October 28, and when Crandall supposed Swenson had already started to Spencer, there was no intention to sue Swenson, consequently no fraud or concealment.

Fraud and fraudulent intent and purpose may be inferred from the acts and representations of the parties and all the facts and circumstances shown. Bean Chamberlain Mfg. Co. v. Standard Spoke, etc. Co. 131 Fed. 215, 65 C. C. A. 201. But as between honest and dishonest motives and purposes, we should presume honesty of intent and purpose unless the facts and circumstances are such as to satisfy the mind that the acts and statements relied upon are fraudulent or dishonest.

The legal propositions seem to be settled, so that it is unnecessary to discuss the cases. We do not understand counsel for appellees to controvert the legal propositions in appellant's authorities before cited. They contend, however, that under the evidence there was no fraud or unfairness, and that appellant came voluntarily to Spencer, Iowa. After a careful examination of the record, we are of opinion that the position of appellees ought to be sustained.

Without going too much into detail, we shall state the more important facts appearing in the record. Although the hearing was of a motion, supported by affidavits, with counter-affidavits, the record is voluminous for such a case, and there is necessarily more or less repetition. The facts are, in the main, without substantial dispute, although there [158] is some conflict as to some of the details which we shall endeavor to point out. To better understand the situation, we shall briefly state the claim of plaintiffs in the action. It is, in substance, that about May 25, 1912, plaintiffs and another contracted for the purchase of land in California; that thereunder $8,700.00 would be due August 1, 1912; plaintiffs were unable to meet the payment, and in August, defendant

Trowbridge represented that defendant Swenson would advance that amount of money if plaintiffs and Trowbridge would execute their note for that amount, which plaintiffs agreed to, and did, do. The note was delivered to Trowbridge for Swenson as security for the money to be furnished by Swenson; that later, in August, 1912, Trowbridge and Swenson represented to plaintiffs that Swenson had forwarded $8,700.00 to the person in California, to whom it was due, and had accepted as security therefor the note of plaintiffs and Trowbridge, but informed plaintiffs that the note was too large for Swenson to handle and that Swenson desired to have smaller notes given in lieu thereof; that this was done at the request of Swenson, and three new notes of $5,000.00, $2,500.00 and $1,200.00 were given; that Trowbridge, Swenson and one George Gillespie conspired together to induce plaintiff to execute the $8,700.00 note; that Swenson had not agreed to furnish the money; that Swenson had not sent any money to California, and that the statement that it had been done was false. The $1,200.00 note, endorsed by Trowbridge to Swenson, and still held by him at the time this suit was brought, and the negotiations for its payment, are involved in this appeal. The $2,500.00 note is held by defendant Savings Bank, and it has answered, claiming to be an innocent holder.

We shall state the substance of the affidavits and testimony bearing upon the alleged fraud by which appellant claims plaintiffs induced him to come to Iowa. October 4, 1912, plaintiff, Crandall, sent appellant a telegram making inquiry whether he would be at home the next day. Appellant replied by telegraph from Nebraska that he would be at home. [159] The next day, Mr. Heald, of Spencer, Iowa, an attorney for plaintiffs, saw Swenson at his home in Nebraska. It is shown by the affidavit of appellant, and not disputed by appellees, that at this time Mr. Heald maintained a friendly attitude towards appellant and stated that plaintiffs might have some financial difficulty in meeting some of the notes on the date of their maturity, and that Crandall had recently purchased an automobile, which he desired to sell to appellant and have the purchase price apply as a payment of the $1,200 note held by appellant; appellant stated to Heald that he would consider Crandall's proposition and requested Heald to have Crandall send a detailed description of the automobile; that Heald also stated that plaintiffs desired to enlist appellant's services in disposing of the land for which the notes had been given. October 15th, Crandall wrote a letter to appellant referring to the conversation between appellant and Heald in regard to procuring appellant's assistance to sell the land and in regard to the sale of the automobile, stating further that he expected to go to Council Bluffs the next Saturday night, and suggesting that appellant meet him Sunday to go over the matters. October 18th, appellant answered by letter and wire that he would be unable to meet Crandall as suggested, but in the letter stated that he would be glad to meet him at any time in Council Bluffs or Omaha, and that he would be pleased to be of service in helping dispose of the California land; he again asked for a detailed description of the automobile. October 22nd, Crandall wrote appellant a second letter, again referring to the land and requesting appellant to meet him in Omaha to discuss the matter. On the same date, Crandall also wrote appellant a letter giving a description of the automobile and stating that he would sell the same, fully equipped, for $1,275.00, adding that he (Crandall) would drive the car to Omaha and turn it over to appellant if appellant would meet him the following Sunday. On the same day, Swenson wired Crandall, addressed to Spencer, Iowa, that he would pay $1,200.00 for the automobile if [160] Crandall would drive the car to Omaha. October 25th, Crandall wired Swenson that he would meet him at the Hinshaw Hotel in Omaha Sunday morning. On Sunday, October 27th, appellant went to Omaha and met Crandall and Heald pursuant to the arrangement, and he says that he expected to receive the automobile at Omaha and surrender the $1,200 note; he testifies by affidavit that at this time Crandall stated that he had decided definitely to sell the car for $1,200.00 and take the note. Crandall did not take the car to Omaha, and appellant says that Crandall requested appellant to go to Spencer and get the car. Appellant says that Heald and Crandall stated to him that they had started with it from Spencer, but were compelled to turn back and go by rail because it was windy and appellant's eyes were weak. Crandall and Heald qualify this statement somewhat and deny that they said they had started with the car, but Crandall says that he did not drive the car because it was a big undertaking for him on account of his eyes and the wind, and further, that he did not feel justified in driving it so far, not knowing whether he could make the deal for the car. As to this matter there is a flat contradiction, by both Crandall and Heald, of appellant's affidavit, that they had agreed to exchange the car at $1,200.00 for the note. Their testimony is to the effect that Crandall wanted $1,275.00 for the car and that he never told appellant that he had decided definitely to sell the car for $1,200.00; that Crandall told Swenson that he could go to Spencer and look at it, and Crandall would arrange with Heald to turn the car over at any price that Swenson and Heald might agree upon; that Crandall told Swenson that he was going to California the next day and that Mr. Heald was going back to Spencer that night and asked him to go back with Heald, but that Swenson said he could not go to Spencer before the next morning; that he told Swenson that any deal he made with Heald would be satisfactory, and that Swenson said he would go up and look at the car. He says that, as he understood it, the train that Swenson would [161] leave on the next morning would leave Omaha at 7:45. Appellant states that he told Crandall on the 27th that he would leave for Spencer on an afternoon train the next day, but that in fact he did start from Omaha at 10:55 the next morning; that he arrived in Spencer about 8:00 o'clock P. M., October 28th, and says he immediately telephoned to Heald that he had arrived, and requested Heald to come down to the garage and instruct those in possession of the automobile to deliver the same and that the note would be delivered to Heald; that Heald replied it was too late to close the deal that night and stated that he would come down in the morning; that about thirty minutes after this conversation the notice was served upon appellant. The car was not delivered. Appellant says that his purpose in going to Spencer was to exchange the note for the automobile; that he had no other business to transact at Spencer or anywhere in the state; that he would not have gone to Spencer or into the state except for the misrepresentations and deceit. He says that since said time he has learned that for some time prior thereto Crandall and Heald had been making inquiries and investigations in regard to the transfer of the notes to him and that the friendly attitude towards him assumed by them was feigned and for the purpose of deceiving him and procuring his presence within the jurisdiction.

An important feature of the case is a conversation had between Heald and defendant, George Gillespie, at Omaha on the morning of October 28th, shown by the affidavit and examination of Crandall, and there is no dispute in the testimony either as to the conversation itself having taken place or as to what Gillespie told Crandall, so that this must be taken as true. As to this matter, Mr. Crandall says that he was then on his way to California and had purchased his ticket; that on the morning of the 28th he interviewed Gillespie in Omaha and questioned him regarding the trip of Mr. Swenson and Mr. Johnson to Spencer, Iowa, at the time of procuring the notes in controversy, and that Gillespie told [162] him that he (Gillespie) was at Spencer at the time Mr. Swenson and Mr. Johnson, who is Swenson's attorney, were at Spencer; that Mr. Johnson went to Spencer with Mr. Swenson as Swenson's attorney, and that the purpose of the trip was to get the notes from him (Crandall) in exchange for the note of $8,700.00 which Barber and Crandall had given Swenson some time before; that Gillespie also told Crandall that the purpose of getting the new notes for the larger note was to get one for $2,500.00 for him (Gillespie), which amount Trowbridge was owing him and which should be turned over in payment of the debt; that Gillespie also told him that Swenson had not advanced any money on account of the $8,700.00 note, or on the notes in controversy, to Trowbridge; that both Johnson and Swenson while at Spencer appeared to be very uneasy and when they left town with their automobile they picked him (Gillespie) up at the hotel and, instead of going down the main street, they went out of town on a back street; that when he was informed of these matters by Swenson he came to the conclusion that they had been guilty of dishonesty in procuring the notes, as Swenson had told him at the time the notes in controversy were given that he had advanced the money on the $8,700.00 note and turned the same in at Trowbridge's office in Omaha. He says that when informed of these matters by Gillespie, he concluded that neither Swenson nor Johnson were acting honestly in the matter and that the transfer of the notes was for the purpose of putting Swenson and Gillespie in the position of innocent purchasers of negotiable paper. He also says that Gillespie told him that he would help him and would state all the facts.

It appears in the record that Gillespie had negotiated the $2,500.00 note to the defendant Savings Bank about September 10, 1912. This note had been indorsed by Trowbridge to Swenson, and by Swenson to Gillespie.

Crandall also states that after the conversation with Gillespie he concluded for the first time to bring suit against Swenson to recover the notes; that he went to the telegraph [163] office at about 9:35 o'clock in the morning, which was soon after the conversation with Gillespie, and telegraphed Mr. Heald as follows: "Auto deal off—Don't deliver car—Starting suit to recover notes." He also telegraphed to F. F. Faville to start suit against Swenson to recover notes and see Heald; that at 9:45 that morning he took the train for California. He says that he did not have time to look Swenson up after the conversation with Gillespie, and that he supposed Swenson had already started for Spencer.

These are the main facts. There may be some others which will be referred to later. We are satisfied from the record that up to the time of the conversation between Crandall and Gillespie there was no bad faith on the part of plaintiffs or their attorney in the negotiations with Swenson; neither was there any bad faith after that time. Crandall testifies that up to that time, and at the time of the conversation with Swenson on the 27th of October, he fully intended to let Swenson have the car, the price to be agreed upon between Swenson and Heald. The $1,200.00 note did not become due until December 26, 1912, and it is argued by appellant that the negotiation in regard to trading the automobile for the note not yet due was unusual, but the evidence shows that Crandall had ordered an automobile some time before and was having trouble to get it; that both plaintiffs were hard pressed for funds and their credit had become impaired because of the California deal and they were anxious to turn the automobile on the note; Swenson lived in another state, and it would take some time for the parties to make the turn.

It is argued by appellant that the plaintiffs and their attorney, Heald, assumed a friendly attitude towards Swenson for the purpose of misleading him. The record shows that, while plaintiffs believed that Swenson was concerned in the fraud, they had no proof of that fact up to the time of the conversation with Gillespie. As some of the witnesses put it, they concluded that Swenson, Trowbridge and Gillespie would all stand together.

[164] Appellees admit that they were investigating the matter and that they went to Swenson and his attorney; that they questioned Swenson at different times about there being anything crooked in connection with his holding the note, and that Swenson admitted that it was a crooked transaction, but as the witnesses put it, he did not admit that he was crooked about it. Swenson was assuring them all the time that he had been acting in good faith and was an innocent purchaser of the notes. There was nothing underhanded or concealed about what plaintiffs did. They went directly to Swenson's attorney, Johnson, and told him that a fraud had been perpetrated upon them and inquired of him regarding Swenson's knowledge of Trowbridge's failure to send the money, and as to whether Swenson had paid any money to Trowbridge. Johnson himself says in his affidavit that Crandall and Heald stated to him that they were out investigating the whole transaction and asked for the address of Swenson, which Johnson gave them. Both Swenson and Johnson led plaintiffs to believe that Swenson was an innocent purchaser and had gotten the notes from Trowbridge for a large sum of money he had loaned him previous thereto.

It is urged by appellees that when Crandall had the conversation with Gillespie on the morning of October 28th, this was the first time they had any tangible proof to substantiate their suspicions of Swenson's participation in the fraudulent transaction of the notes. Swenson and Johnson both filed their affidavits on this hearing, but neither of them deny Gillespie's statement to Crandall that they acted as Gillespie described while in Spencer. The matters referred to by Gillespie have a bearing on the question as to whether Swenson was an innocent holder of the $1,200.00 note and as to whether he participated in the fraud alleged to have been perpetrated upon plaintiffs by Trowbridge and Gillespie.

Counsel for appellant place stress on the fact that some of the earlier letters from Crandall to Swenson suggest that Swenson assist them in disposing of the California land, but [165] this was after Swenson and Johnson had assured Crandall of Swenson's entire innocence in connection with the alleged fraud. Plaintiffs had become considerably involved by attempting to handle the California land. Swenson was, it appears, a person who was loaning money and was engaged in such transactions, and he was perfectly willing to assist them. Plaintiffs seem to have believed that if they could handle the California land and secure the title they could save the land and their loss would be less and they could make a profit on the land. It is contended by the appellant that plaintiffs and Heald had been scheming for some three weeks to induce him to go to Spencer, but there is nothing in the record anywhere that plaintiffs or their attorney at any time made a suggestion even that appellant go to Iowa until the evening of October 27th. As already stated, the evidence of Crandall and Heald is, that the parties had not agreed upon the price of the automobile. Crandall was then on his way to California, and, if they had not agreed upon the price, there was nothing Crandall could do except to leave the matter of price for further negotiations between Swenson and Heald. Crandall says that at that time he fully intended to deliver the machine to Swenson when the price should be agreed upon. Appellant's theory is, that the sole purpose of his going to Spencer was to get the car and surrender the note; that the terms had already been agreed upon, and the only thing to do was to make the exchange. If this be true, there was no necessity for Swenson going to Spencer. He could have sent someone else for the car, or he could have had the car shipped to him, or Swenson could have refused to deal for the car unless it was brought to Omaha, so that in this way appellant could have frustrated any such scheme by any of the methods just suggested.

Other circumstances are referred to in argument at considerable length, but the opinion is already too long, and we shall not pursue the subject further. Our conclusion is that it has not been shown that appellant was fraudulently induced [166] to come into the jurisdiction, but that his appearance in Iowa was voluntary. The trial court so held, and the ruling is, therefore,

Affirmed.

In Townsend v. Smith, 47 Wis. 623, 3 N. W. 439, 32 Am. Rep. 793, wherein it appeared that the defendant had been inveigled into the jurisdiction by artifice and falsehood the court said: "The means by which the service of the summons was obtained, being fraudulent, were unlawful. The remedy which the law affords in such a case is to set aside the process. This remedy is not given upon the ground that, by reason of the fraud, the court did not get jurisdiction of the person of the defendant by the service, but upon the ground that the court will not exercise its jurisdiction in favor of the plaintiff who has obtained service of his summons by unlawful means. When that fact is made to appear—especially if the defendant has been guilty of no laches,—the court should vindicate the integrity of its process by setting aside the service and turning the plaintiff out of court as a punishment for his gross fraud." And in Saveland v. Connors, 121 Wis. 28, 98 N. W. 933, the court said: "The power and duty of the courts to refuse jurisdiction in such cases rest not so much on the rights of the defendant as upon a duty to themselves to preserve the purity of judicial proceedings."

The service of process will be set aside if the fraud is accomplished by an agent, or by someone acting in behalf of the real party in interest, as readily as if the fraudulent acts are those of the party personally. Union Sugar Refinery v. Mathiesson, 2 Cliff. 304, 24 Fed. Cas. No. 14,397; Frawley v. Pennsylvania Casualty Co. 124 Fed. 259; Hill v. Goodrich, 32 Conn. 588; Chubbuck v. Y. S. 38. Compare Ex p. Taylor, 29 R. I. 129, 69 Atl. 553. In Chubbuck v. Cleveland, supra, it appeared that the plaintiff made certain fraudulent representations to a third person with the expectation that they would be communicated to the defendant and cause him to come within the jurisdiction of the court. The defendant so acted on the representations and was served with process. The court held the service to be invalid.

APPLICATION OF RULE.

Generally.

In Dunlap v. Cody, 31 Ia. 260, 7 Am. Rep. 129, the court, in holding that fraud in obtaining jurisdiction of a party was a good defense to an action on the judgment procured thereby said: "The false statement was made to defendant by plaintiffs' attorney that [plaintiff] and others were about to erect an elevator in Hancock county, Illinois, to cost between thirty thousand dollars and forty thousand dollars; and the defendant, being a carpenter, was induced to go to Illinois to look at the site of the proposed structure. The truth, that the object in getting defendant into the state of Illinois, was to obtain jurisdiction of his person in an action against him, and avoid the bar of the statute of limitations of the state of Iowa, was suppressed. It cannot be supposed that if the real facts and purpose had been made known to defendant he would voluntarily have gone to Illinois, and subjected himself to an action upon this demand, long since barred by the statute of limitations of the state in which he resides. Counsel representing plaintiff in this court, and who, it is but justice to say, were not concerned in obtaining the judgment in Illinois, do not seriously controvert the position, that the mode of obtaining jurisdiction was fraudulent. They concede that it 'smells somewhat of fraud.' The only palliation which they are able to offer is the suggestion of a doubt whether it may not be considered a 'pious fraud' in which 'the end justifies the means.' We do not think that it is entitled even to that small measure of charity. An enlightened and just administration of the law, no less than sound public morals, condemns such practices, and demands that the client whose cupidity could sanction, and the attorney whose venality could execute, such a purpose, should alike be disgraced." So in Pilcher v. Graham, 9 Ohio Cir. Dec. 825, 18 Ohio Cir. Ct. 5, and again in Miami Powder Co. v. Griawold, 5 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 532, 6 Am. L. Rec. 464, it was held that where a defendant has been induced to come within the jurisdiction of the court for the purpose of adjusting a dispute between the parties, he cannot be legally served with process until a reasonable time to depart the jurisdiction has elapsed, after the final conclusion of the business on which he was invited to come. In Toof v. Foley, 87 Ia. 8, 54 N. W. 59, the court held that the evidence of fraud need not be conclusive but that it is sufficient that a conclusion that fraud was used to induce the defendant to come within the jurisdiction of the court for the purpose of serving him with process, is a fair finding from all the evidence. So in Heston v. Heston, 52 N. J. Eq. 91, 28 Atl. 8, the court held the service of process to be invalid, where the following facts appeared: The defendant was living in Pennsylvania with her father-in-law, and the petitioner, having filed his petition for divorce, wrote her asking her to meet him at a certain place in the city of Trenton. She came into the state and attended at the place designated by the petitioner in his letter. The petitioner did not meet her, as was implied in his letter that he would, but the sheriff was there in attendance and served a process of citation and copy of the petition on her. In Graves v. Graham, 43 N. Y. S. 510, affirmed 19 Misc. 618, 44 N. Y. S. 415, it appeared that the defendant voluntarily submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the court with the understanding that he should have a trial without a jury and on a day certain. The plaintiff refused to carry out the agreement, demanded a jury trial and the case was set for later day. A motion was made to vacate and set aside the order of arrest, which had been served on the defendant when he appeared. The court granted the motion and discharged the defendant. In Cavanagh v. Manhattan Transit Co. 133 Fed. 818, it appeared that the plaintiff had invited the secretary of the defendant company to come within the jurisdiction of the court for the purpose of examining certain machinery, and that as he was leaving, he was served with process by a deputy sheriff who had been waiting outside of the building. It appeared that the process was dated the same day on which the secretary had signified his intention of coming within the state. The court held that the evidence of fraud was sufficient to warrant the quashing of the service. However, in Union Sugar Refinery v. Mathieson, 2 Cliff. 304, 24 Fed. Cas. No. 14,397, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff or someone acting in his behalf had written letters and invited the defendant to come within the jurisdiction of the court for the purpose of adjusting the controversy, and there was no further proof, the court held that the evidence was not sufficient to set the service aside. In MacLain v. Parker, 88 Kan. 717, 129 Pac. 1140, it appeared that the plaintiff's attorney had informed the defendant that the suit in question was to be brought in Kansas. Depending on that statement, the defendant went to Missouri and a short time thereafter was served with a summons to answer the action in Missouri. The court held that the facts did not constitute a sufficient foundation for the claim that the defendant was inveigled into another jurisdiction. (Likewise) in Volz v. Tutt, 12 Ky. L. Rep. 506, service of process was held to be valid where the defendant came within the jurisdiction of the court on business of his own although the officer who served him had previously sent him a message stating that he had important business to transact with him. In Gilbert v. Burg, 91 Wis. 358, 64 N. W. 996, the court held the service of process to be valid where the evidence failed to establish the fact of a fraudulent contrivance, or that the presence of the defendant within the state was procured by the fraudulent contrivance. In Jaster v. Currie, 198 U. S. 144, 25

S. Ct. 614, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 988, reversing 69 Neb. 4, 94 N. W. 995, it was held that, where the defendant came into the jurisdiction of the court for the purpose of being present at the taking of a deposition and was served with process, the service was valid although it was shown that notice of the taking of the deposition was served on him for the express purpose of enticing him within the court's jurisdiction. And in MacKenzie v. MacKenzie, 238 Ill. 616, 87 N. E. 848, the court said: "It was also urged in defense of the contempt proceeding that the defendant came from Idaho to Chicago just before the attachment writ issued, pursuant to an agreement between his solicitor and the solicitor for appellee, for the purpose of negotiating with a view to ending the litigation between the parties hereto, and that having, by her solicitor, so induced him to come into the state, appellee had him arrested for contempt. The appellant failed to show that he was brought into the state by any fraud, artifice or trick for the purpose of enabling appellee to have him arrested in the contempt proceeding, and in that respect he has failed to bring himself within the rule laid down by the authorities upon which he relies. So far as appears, neither appellee nor her solicitor had any thought, at any time before appellant came into the state, of proceeding against him for contempt." In Case v. Smith, 152 Fed. 730, wherein it appeared that the defendant came within the jurisdiction of the court of his own volition and was served by the plaintiff the service was held to be valid although the plaintiff had arranged to be notified of his coming.

Service Procured by Abuse of Criminal Process.

Where criminal process is issued against a defendant not in good faith but solely for the purpose of getting him within the jurisdiction of the court and he is then served with civil process, the service is invalid. Barlow v. Hall, 2 Anstr. (Eng.) 461; Wells v. Gurney, 8 B. & C. 769, 15 E. C. L. 336; Loveridge v. Plaistow, 2 H. Bl. (Eng.) 29; Blair v. Turtle, 1 McCrary (U. S.) 372; McNab v. Bennett, 66 Ill. 157; Byler v. Jones, 79 Mo. 261; Christian v. Williams, 111 Mo. 429, 20 S. W. 96; Benninghoff v. Oswell, 37 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 235; Compton v. Wilder, 40 Ohio St. 130; Addicks v. Bush, 1 Phila. (Pa.) 19, 7 Leg. Int. 7. See also Underwood v. Fetter, 6 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 66; Com. v. Daniel, 4 Pa. L. J. Rep. 49, 6 Pa. L. J. 330. In Compton v. Wilder, supra, it appeared that the plaintiffs had procured a writ of extradition by which the defendant was taken from Pennsylvania into Ohio to answer a criminal charge. While thus in Ohio he was served with process in a civil action brought by the plaintiffs. In setting aside the service as illegal the court said: "To secure a service of summons, in a civil action like the one we are considering, is not one of the objects intended to be accomplished by this grant of power [extradition]. In a country like ours this power is useful and indispensable. It was intended, however, to subserve great public interests. When otherwise used it becomes an evil. The temptation to make it subservient to private interests is great. This weapon, intended alone to secure the punishment of crime, is frequently resorted to, to enforce the collection of private debts or to remove a citizen from his home into a foreign jurisdiction that he may there be served in a civil action. This growing evil has been seen and appreciated by the chief executives of many states, and to guard against it rules and regulations are being adopted, which may make the extradition of an alleged fugitive, in a proper case, extremely difficult. It has been recognized by both the executive and legislative branches of our government, as is shown by their former action. The judicial should be as swift in putting the seal of condemnation upon this abuse as have been the other branches of the government. The certain remedy to prevent its growth is, to deprive all persons who participate in the misuse of the power to extradite persons, alleged to be fugitives from justice, of the fruits resulting from such participation."

However, it has been held that where the party instituting a civil action is in no way connected with the criminal proceeding by which the defendant is brought within the jurisdiction, the service is valid. Nichols v. Goodheart, 5 Ill. App. 574; Lagrange's Case, 14 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y.) 333 (note). Thus in Nichols v. Goodheart, supra, the court said: "The law permits civil suits to be commenced and prosecuted against persons who may be brought unwillingly into this state, where the creditor has nothing to do, directly or indirectly, with bringing such debtor within the jurisdiction of the court."

Service Procured by Force.

The courts will set aside a service of process procured by force. Blair v. Turtle, 1 McCrary (U. S.) 372; State v. Simmons, 39 Kan. 362, 18 Pac. 177; Ziporkes v. Chmelniker, 15 N. Y. St. Rep. 215; Davison v. Baker, 24 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 39. See also Duringer v. Moschino, 93 Ind. 495; Reed v. Williams, 29 N. J. L. 385; Olson v. McConihe, 54 Misc. 48, 105 N. Y. S. 386; Mason v. Libbey, 1 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y.) 354; Ex p. Everts, 2 Disney (Ohio) 33. In Blair v. Turtle, supra, the defendants moved to quash the service of process on them on the ground that they "were forced from their own state, and were forcibly brought into this state, by the fraud and procurement of this plaintiff, for the purpose of forcing them within the jurisdiction of said court, so that a summons might then be served upon them, which was done accordingly." To this plea the plaintiffs demurred. The court held that the facts stated in the plea were sufficient to warrant the quashing of the service of process, and said in part: "That where a plaintiff in a suit brings by force a defendant within the jurisdiction of a court, or induces him by deceitful or fraudulent practices to come within the jurisdiction, for the purpose of having him served with process, the courts will interfere by quashing the summons or service thereof to prevent the fraudulent and improper use of the process. This is a proper case for the exercise of such authority." In State v. Simmons, 39 Kan. 262, 18 Pac. 177, it appeared that the defendants had been brought from one state to another by means of force and threats for the purpose of testifying in a criminal action, and while they were awaiting the trial of the case they were served with process in an action charging them with contempt of court for their previous refusal to obey a subpoena. The court said: "It would not be proper for the courts of this state to favor, or even to tolerate, breaches of the peace committed by their own officers in a sister state, by sustaining a service of judicial process procured only by such a breach of the peace. Indeed, it would not be proper for any court in any state to sustain a service of any judicial process, either civil or criminal, where the service of such process was obtained only by the infraction of some law, or in violation of some well-recognized rule of honesty or fair dealing, as by force or fraud. Such a service would not only be a special wrong against the individual upon whom the service was made, but it would also be a general wrong against society itself—a violation of those fundamental principles of mutual trust and confidence which lie at the very foundation of all organized society, and which are necessary in the very nature of things to hold society together." In Ziporkes v. Chmelniker, 15 N. Y. St. Rep. 215, the court, while holding that under the facts involved the service was legal, said: "If the defendant was forced by the officers who had this process for service to come with them into this state, and thus subject himself to its jurisdiction, which he would not otherwise have done, then clearly the whole of the proceedings must be set aside." Likewise in Reed v. Williams, 29 N. J. L. 385, wherein it appeared that the defendant had been induced by fraud to cross from New York to New Jersey and was there served with process, the court in granting the motion to quash the service said: "I can see but little difference in principle between the case, as presented, and the case of seizing a person on the New York side, and carrying him over by force, to be served with process on this side. Surely, we would resist this in behalf of our own citizens, if taken from us and subjected to the expense and inconvenience, if not the peril, of a strange and foreign jurisdiction, whether done by force or by gross fraud or deception; and common justice, as well as common courtesy to our neighbors, requires that we should do to them as we would have them do to us in such cases, and that we should not permit the power of our courts to be successfully invoked to aid in the practice of trickery, dishonesty, or oppression of any kind." In Ex p. Everts, 2 Disney (Ohio) 33, the court said: "The abuse claimed to have occurred must be clearly established, and must involve an act of force, fraud or wrong, on the part of him who has employed the process in a manner technically regular, or a clear violation of some right of the other party, by which an exemption from the process, either generally or under the circumstances, existed."

Service on Resident.

Where the person against whom process is issued is within the jurisdiction and the service is procured by fraud or force, it is generally held to be invalid. Birch v. Prodder, 1 B. & P. N. R. (Eng.) 135; Olson v. McConihe, 54 Misc. 48, 105 N. Y. S. 386; Mason v. Libbey, 1 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y.) 354; Bulkley v. Bulkley, 6 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 307; Davison v. Baker, 24 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 39; Bell v. Lawrence, 140 N. Y. S. 1106. Compare Martin v. Raffin, 2 Misc. 588, 23 Civ. Pro. 59, 21 N. Y. S. 1043; Atlantic, etc. Tel. Co. v. Baltimore, etc. R. Co. 46 Super. Ct. (N. Y.) 377. In Davison v. Baker, supra, wherein it appeared that a summons was served by thrusting it into the defendant's bosom accompanied by the remark "you have been too officious, and I will fix you," the court, in setting aside the service said: "I am satisfied the service was irregular, not to say void, having been made by force. It may be asked, what shall be done in case a party will not accept papers offered him with a view to their service upon him? Suppose he reject them and turn away, how is service to be effected? The answer is ready and plain. The officer will inform him of their nature and of his purpose to make service of them, and lay them down at any appropriate place in his presence. This would be good service, undoubtedly, in case the party to be served refuses to receive them. It cannot be that the officer or person seeking to make service of a summons, must seize the party to be served, and compel him to take it; nor can he justify himself for any personal violence in order to make service. Service may be effected, and in all cases should be, without personal violence or incivility, and in my judgment the dignity of the court, as well as the high privilege of personal immunity, which every individual has a right to insist upon, demand that this rule should be strictly adhered to." But in Martin v. Rafin, 2 Misc. 588, 23 Civ. Pro. 59, 21 N. Y. S. 1043, the court held that the mere laying of a summons on the shoulder of the defendant who was attempting to avoid service by hiding in the "shelter of his wife's petticoats" was not an assault and not a sufficient ground to set aside the service. In Mason v. Libbey, 1 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y.) 354, it appeared that the plaintiff had sued her mother, and having obtained an order and summons for the examination of the mother before trial and being possessed of a key to the mother's house, she went there, let herself in, and thus effected service of the order and summons to attend and be examined. The court said: "The plaintiff was not justified in entering her mother's house by unlocking the door without her mother's permission, to make the service in question. As against the service of civil process the law throws around the defendant the safeguard of protection to herself and her family. I cannot accept the plaintiff's statement that she carried the key to defendant's house by her permission. There had been long subsisting bitter and protracted litigation between the parties. If the plaintiff did once have the key by defendant's consent, the plaintiff well knew that the right to use it had been withdrawn by the changed relations of the parties, if not by actual words. This service must be set aside." In Olson v. McConihe, 54 Misc. 48, 105 N. Y. S. 386, it appeared that a process server gained admittance to the defendant's house by asking to see a servant therein. After gaining admission she rushed up-stairs, brushed past the butler and ran into the dining room, where the defendant was dining with her family and threw the summons and complaint, inclosed in an envelope, on the table. The court said: "It is uncontradicted that the person who deposes to the service of the summons herein was admitted at the servants' entrance to the house where defendant resided and asked to see one 'Kate,' presumably and apparently not this defendant. Such admission, under the circumstances, might not be said to carry the freedom of the house or to warrant forcible access to the dining-room upstairs for the purpose of service of process. Entry there and in the manner described was wrongful and the service improper." So in Bell v. Lawrence, 140 N.

Y. S. 1106, service of a summons was set aside on the ground of fraud where it appeared that the process server had gained admittance to the house of the defendant by falsely representing that he carried a letter to her from a codefendant in the same action. In Bulkley v. Bulkley, 6 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 307, it appeared that a summons in an action for divorce was served on the defendant by enclosing it in a sealed package and handing it to the defendant on board a boat just as she was leaving New York for California. It was represented to the defendant by her husband, who was an attorney, that the package contained a present for her mother and a letter for herself which was not to be opened until she arrived. The defendant opened the package when at sea and found the summons. She was unable to get back to New York until the judgment for divorce had been entered. On application to set the judgment aside the court said: "To tolerate, for one moment, an act so flagrant and wicked, to be consummated by one over whom the court can exercise its control, to pass unrebuked, does not comport with the idea of a pure and honest administration of justice. Such a reproach, while in the exercise of the power with which I have been invested, it shall not suffer at my hands. The affidavit of the service of the summons by the clerk of the plaintiff, was made in the city and county of New York. To a grand jury of that county I commit the consideration of that paper. The affidavit of the plaintiff, upon which he obtained the order of reference, in which he coolly states, 'that no copy of an answer to the complaint in this action has been received, nor has the defendant entered any appearance in the action, nor has she, or any one in her behalf, demanded a copy of the complaint, and deponent was personally present and saw the summons herein served on defendant,' was taken before the clerk of Montgomery county, to whose grand jury I recommend the proper attention. To the general term of the supreme court, in whose immediate district this attorney and counsellor conducts his chief practice, I call attention to this officer of the court. The service of the summons, and all subsequent proceedings in this action, including the judgment and decree of divorce, is set aside with costs." In Birch v. Prodger, 1 B. & P. N. R. (Eng.) 135, it appeared that an attachment had been issued against the defendant for the nonpayment of money to the plaintiff. The officer having the process to serve was unable to locate the defendant. The plaintiff met the defendant on the street and forcibly carried him to his lawyer's office where he was detained until the writ was served, and as he was leaving he was arrested by the officer. The court held the arrest to be illegal and discharged the defendant.

v.

PEOPLE'S ICE COMPANY.

Minnesota Supreme Court—October 30, 1914.

127 Minn. 252; 149 N. W. 286.

Criminal Law — Appeal — Effect of Paying Fine.

The defendant, a foreign corporation, indicted for a violation of the statute prohibiting an unlawful combination in restraint of trade, sought an opportunity to change its plea of not guilty to guilty and receive sentence. The sentence immediately imposed was a fine, which was at once paid. Six months thereafter, lacking a few days, this appeal was taken. Upon the state's motion to dismiss the appeal it is made to appear that appellant paid the fine voluntarily with the intention to abide by and comply with the sentence of the court, and hence the appeal should be dismissed.

[See note at end of this case.]

(Syllabus by court.)

Appeal from District Court, Dakota county: JOHNSON, Judge.

Criminal action. People's Ice Company convicted of violation of statute prohibiting unlawful combination in restraint of trade and appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. DISMISSED.

John F. Fitzpatrick for appellant.

Lyndon A. Smith and C. Louis Weeks for respondent.

[253] HOLT, J.—The state moves to dismiss the appeal for the reason that appellant, subsequent to the judgment and prior to the appeal, voluntarily paid the fine, the only penalty imposed by the judgment.

The appellant contends that it has the statutory right to appeal within six months after the judgment is pronounced; that the satisfaction of the judgment does not affect this right to appeal; that the payment of a fine cannot be held voluntary, since appellant had property subject to execution; and that, since the stay of execution on appeal in a criminal case is a matter of grace and not of right, the payment of the fine should not be held to be in any sense voluntary or an acquiescence in the sentence. There is much force in these contentions fortified by decisions holding that, even in the absence of statutory provisions, a litigant in a civil action, who pays a judgment rendered against him, may still prosecute his appeal and in case of reversal recover back the amount paid in satisfaction of the judgment. The analogy is strong between the right to appeal in a civil action, as affected by the payment of the judgment, and the one to appeal in a criminal case where the sentence has been carried out. [254] Johnson v. State, 172 Ala. 424, 55 So. 226, Ann. Cas. 1913E 296; People v. Marks, 64 Misc. 679, 120 N. Y. S. 1106; Barthelemy v. People, 2 Hill (N. Y.) 248, and the note to State v. Conkling, in 45 Am. St. 271. In Com. v. Fleckner, 167 Mass. 13, 44 N. E. 1053, it is said: "We should be slow to suppose that the legislature meant to take away the right to undo the disgrace and legal discredit of a conviction merely because a wrongly convicted person has paid his fine or served his term. . . . Of course the payment of the fine in accordance with the sentence was not a consent to the sentence but a payment under duress." The authorities which hold to the contrary proceed on the theory that, when the sentence is executed either by imprisonment or payment of the fine, there no longer exists a judgment from which to appeal. The suit is ended. To this effect may be cited: State v. Westfall, 37 Ia. 575; Com. v. Gipner, 118 Pa. St. 379, 12 Atl. 306; People v. Leavitt, 41 Mich. 470, 2 N. W. 812; Madsen v. Kenner, 4 Utah 3, 4 Pac. 992; Washington v. Cleland, 49 Ore. 12, 88 Pac. 305, 124 Am. St. Rep. 1013, and cases cited in note to Johnson v. State, 30 Ann. Cas. 300.

It is not necessary to determine which line of authorities should be followed, for we are persuaded that here appellant voluntarily paid the fine and fully acquiesced in the sentence. There can be no purpose to remove the stigma of conviction by this appeal, for appellant pleaded guilty to the offense charged. The appeal can involve nothing but the propriety of a fine or the amount thereof. The state shows that Mr. Wells, the president of the appellant, a foreign corporation, had been found guilty upon a trial under an indictment charging him, this appellant, and others with an unlawful combination in restraint of trade, an offense under section 8973, G. S. 1913. He had obtained a stay. While the stay was pending he and the attorneys for appellant sought the prosecuting attorney and expressed the desire to have the whole matter settled. To that end they prevailed upon the prosecuting attorney to arrange with the judge who tried the case to come to the county seat of Dakota county, the place of trial, and hold a special term for that purpose. This was done. Wells, or his attorneys, requested that the stay as to him be [255] vacated and sentence imposed. He was fined and paid the fine. He also, as president of appellant, withdrew appellant's plea of not guilty and entered a plea of guilty. The sentence was a fine of $2,000. At once Wells produced the money and paid the fine. This occurred on December 13, 1913. No dissent to the form of the sentence, or to the amount of the fine was then suggested. Thereafter nothing occurred to indicate that appellant was in any manner aggrieved by the sentence until June 11, 1914, when this appeal was taken. Appellant, in the meantime, acquiesced in the entry of judgment ousting it from doing business in the state, in an action brought by the attorney general, because of its acknowledged violation of the statute. We hold that the whole course of appellant in procuring a special session of court to be held so as to allow it to change its plea to guilty, its payment of the fine without the slightest suggestion that either a fine, or the amount thereof, was not proper, and the long delay in taking the appeal, tends to show that the payment was voluntary, to the end that the whole prosecution should be terminated and settled. The state and prosecuting authorities were led to believe and act on that understanding. And we fully believe that the president of appellant, when he entered the plea of guilty for it and immediately produced the $2,000 in cash and paid the fine imposed, did so with the full intention, acting for appellant, to abide by and satisfy the sentence of the court. This is more of a voluntary payment than the facts disclosed in De Graff v. Ramsey County, 46 Minn. 319, 48 N. W. 1135. This money was at once paid to the proper officers, presumably distributed to the proper funds, and has undoubtedly been used. This is and of itself may not be material, for we may well say that the sense of fairness is so well developed in the public conscience that the legislature would make provision to reimburse one who under legal compulsion has paid into the state treasury or to public funds money which in justice and right should not have been paid; but it is a circumstance to be considered in determining whether the payment of the fine imposed was voluntary, for appellant was represented by a capable officer, and able attorneys and knew that public authorities would receive, distribute and use the money for designated purposes.

The appeal should be and it is dismissed.

NOTE.

Payment of Fine in Criminal Case as Waiver of Right to Appeal.

The earlier cases passing on the question whether the payment of a fine in a criminal suit constitutes a waiver of the defendant's right to appeal are collected in the note to Johnson v. State, Ann. Cas. 1913E 300. The present note reviews the few recent cases discussing that point. As a general rule the voluntary payment of a fine by the defendant in a criminal action, operates as a final disposition of the case and precludes the defendant from prosecuting an appeal or proceeding further with an appeal already commenced. Rex v. Sing, 32 West. L. Rep. (Sask.) 649; Com. v. Konas, 57 Pa. Super. Ct. 629. And see the reported case. In Com. v. Conas, supra, the court said: "When a defendant is convicted in a summary proceeding before a magistrate, of an offense of which the magistrate had jurisdiction and is fined an amount within the limit authorized by the statute or ordinance creating the offense, and voluntarily pays the fine, that is an end of the case. Having voluntarily paid his fine he has satisfied the law, and is no longer in a position to raise any question as to the validity of the payment: Com. v. Gipner, 118 Pa. St. 379, 12 Atl. 306, Com. v. Yocum, 37 Pa. Super. Ct. 237. When the fine has been thus voluntarily paid any question as to the regularity of the proceedings becomes merely academic, and the state does not maintain her courts of record for the purpose of deciding questions of that character."

In Sibenaler v. State, 11 Okla. Crim. 504, 148 Pac. 678, it was held that a person who, after having been sentenced to serve a term of one year in the penitentiary and to pay a fine of one thousand dollars, accepted a pardon conditioned on his paying five hundred dollars in instalments, could not thereafter prosecute an appeal. But in Com. v. Barbono, 56 Pa. Super. Ct. 637, a defendant who after having been fined for the violation of a liquor regulation was unlawfully sentenced to jail was held not to be precluded by a payment of the fine from having his conviction reviewed by certiorari. The court said: "The act of 1911 provides that the fine or penalty shall 'be recovered, as debts are by law recovered, in an action to be instituted in the name of the commonwealth.' It confers no express authority upon the justice to summarily sentence the defendant to imprisonment in jail, in default of payment, and, therefore, payment of the fine and costs, in order to obtain release from such imprisonment, cannot be regarded as a voluntary act which precludes him from having the lawfulness and regularity of his conviction reviewed by certiorari." In State v. Chicago Great Western R. Co. 125 Minn. 332, 147 N. W. 109, it appeared that a defendant paid his fine under protest, having been refused a stay of proceeding for the purpose of perfecting his appeal. The court said: "The trial court, after hearing the evidence, adjudged defendant guilty of the charge and imposed a fine of $15. Though the record is not quite clear, it is apparent that defendant requested a stay of proceedings to enable it to perfect an appeal. This the court declined to grant, holding that under the statute creating that court, a stay of proceedings after conviction of a criminal charge is prohibited until the fine imposed has been paid. Defendant thereupon and under protest paid the fine, and thereafter perfected this appeal. We are all agreed that the learned court was in error in applying the provisions of the statute under which the court was organized, namely, section 5, chapter 48, p. 624, Sp. Laws 1887, for that statute, properly construed, applies only to prosecutions for municipal offenses, and not to violations of the state laws. But this is unimportant, since the majority hold that by reason of the refusal of the court to grant the stay of proceedings the payment was not voluntary within the rule holding that such a payment precludes the right of appeal from the judgment so paid." Substantially to the same effect see State v. Swikert, 65 Ore. 286, 132 Pac. 709.

SWEETSER ET AL.

FOX ET AL.

Utah Supreme Court—May 9, 1913.

43 Utah 40; 134 Pac. 599.

Appeal — Harmless Error — Striking Out Parties.

A judgment will not be reversed for technical error in striking out the names of certain plaintiffs where no prejudice results to defendant therefrom.

Partnership — Action — Continuation in Name of Survivors.

It was not error to strike out the names of two deceased partners as plaintiffs and permit the action to proceed to judgment under the names of the surviving partners.

Judgments — Time to Sue — When Statute Begins to Run.

Comp. Laws 1907, § 3490, provides that an action is pending from its commencement until final determination upon appeal, "or until the time for appeal has passed, unless the judgment is sooner satisfied;" section 3307 provides that an appeal from a judgment or order directing the payment of money does not stay execution, unless a written undertaking be given; and section 3320 provides for restitution in case judgment is reversed or modified on appeal after its enforcement. Held, that a judgment became final so as to start the eight-year limitation against an action thereon from the time it was rendered, where no appeal was taken, and not from expiration of the six months within which an appeal might have been taken; actions remaining pending after judgment only for the purpose of enforcing them or to institute proceedings to review.

[See note at end of this case.]

Action — When Deemed Pending.

An action is deemed to be pending at common law so long as a judgment remains unsatisfied.

Judgment — When Enforceable.

A judgment may be enforced either by execution or action, immediately after rendition, unless execution be stayed.

Action on Judgment — Effect of Right to Appeal from Judgment.

When the purpose of an action is merely to enforce a judgment, the plea of another action pending cannot be interposed in the action upon the judgment merely because the time to appeal has not passed; the only plea available being that the judgment has been suspended by supersedeas bond.

When Full Faith and Credit Attaches.

The full faith and credit clause of the federal Constitution applies as soon as a judgment is enforceable and not merely after the time to appeal has elapsed.

When Statute of Limitation Begins to Run.

Comp. Laws 1907, § 2874, requiring an action on a judgment to be commenced within eight years, means eight years from the time the cause of action has arisen.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A cause of action arises the moment an action may be maintained to enforce the legal right so that the statute of limitation then begins to run.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

For the purpose of its enforcement, a judgment is evidence of its own existence immediately on rendition and entry as provided by law.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from District Court, Salt Lake county: RITCHIE, Judge.

Action by George B. Sweetser et al., plaintiffs, against Jesse W. Fox, Jr. et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Burton & Johnson for appellants.

Dey & Hoppaugh for respondents.

[42] FRICK, J.—On the 29th day of December, 1897, all of the plaintiffs above named, as partners doing business as such, obtained judgment in the circuit Court of the United States in and for the district of Utah against all of the defendants above named. On the 12th day of June, 1906, an action in the name of all of the plaintiffs as partners was commenced on the judgment aforesaid against all of the defendants. Separate demurrers were filed by the defendants, which were overruled, and they then filed separate answers in which the only defense that is material here was that the action was barred by the provisions of Comp. Laws 1907, section 2874, which provides:

An action upon a judgment or decree of any court of the United States, or of any state or territory within the United States," must be commenced "within eight years." Plaintiffs replied that the defendant Christopherson was absent from the state of Utah for "more than one year after said cause of action had accrued and prior to the commencement of this action."

Nearly two years after this action was commenced all of the plaintiffs above named, except George D. Sweetser and J. Howard Sweetser, filed an application in which they set forth that at and prior to the time the judgment upon which this action is based was obtained all of the plaintiffs were copartners and were doing business as such, and that thereafter, and before this action was commenced, the said George D. Sweetser and J. Howard Sweetser died leaving the other four as the surviving members of the said copartnership, and further alleged that the four named are the sole owners of said judgment as surviving partners as aforesaid. Pursuant [43] to the foregoing application they asked that the names of the first two be stricken out and that the action proceed in the name of the four surviving partners as plaintiffs. The court granted the application and permitted the action to proceed in the name of the four surviving partners, who, the court found, were the real and only parties in interest. Notwithstanding that order, all of the names of the original plaintiffs are retained in the title of the action, even in this court.

The defendants insist that the district court erred in allowing the application aforesaid. Nothing is made to appear wherein the defendants are in any way prejudiced by striking out the two names as aforesaid. If it were assumed, therefore, that the court had committed technical error in striking out the names, yet, as there is no claim nor evidence of prejudice, the judgment cannot be reversed upon the ground just stated.

But we can see no reason whatever why, under the facts disclosed by this record, the district court was not justified in striking out the names of the two deceased partners as plaintiffs and in permitting the action to proceed to judgment in the names of the other surviving partners. This assignment, therefore, must be overruled.

Proceeding now to a consideration of the only serious question in the case, namely, the defense that the action is barred by our statute of limitations, we remark that the court found that the action in question was commenced 8 years and 165 days after the entry of the judgment upon which it is based, and that the defendant Christopherson was absent from the state of Utah during that time for "a period of not more than 164 days." The court, however, held that the action was not barred and entered judgment against all of the defendants for the full amount of the judgment, including interest. The defendants appeal and insist that the district court erred in holding that the action upon the judgment was not barred by the provisions of the statute we have referred to and in rendering judgment against them. Upon the other hand, plaintiffs contend that the action is not [44] barred because of what is contained in Comp. Laws 1907, section 3490, which provides:

"An action is deemed to be pending from the time of its commencement until its final determination upon appeal, or until the time for appeal has passed, unless the judgment is sooner satisfied."

That section has been in force in this state continuously since some time prior to 1888. It constituted section 3706 of Comp. Law 1888, and was thereafter carried into the Revised Statutes of 1898 as section 3490. The section is an exact copy of section 1049 of the California Code of Civil Procedure.

It is conceded that the judgment in question was not appealed and that no motion for a new trial was ever filed. In other words, it is conceded that the judgment was never assailed in any way by any one. Plaintiffs contend that notwithstanding that fact the judgment did not become final until the time for an appeal had passed, namely, until six months from the time of its entry, while the defendants insist that the judgment became a final and enforceable judgment immediately upon being rendered and entered as provided by law, and hence 8 years, plus 165 days, had elapsed when this action was commenced. The question that we must determine, therefore, is, When did the statute of limitations begin to run on the judgment in question?

Counsel for plaintiffs contend that the foregoing question is determined in their favor by the Supreme Court of California in the case of Feeney v. Hinckley, 134 Cal. 467, 66 Pac. 580, 86 Am. St. Rep. 290, and that in view that our statute (section 3490, supra) is a copy of the California statute upon which the California Supreme Court bases its decision in the case just referred to we should follow that decision. If the case just referred to is to be followed, then this opinion should end right here, since no distinction can be drawn between the principle involved in this case and in the California case referred to. The case of Feeney v. Hinckley, supra, was decided in November, 1901, many years after section 3490, supra, was in force in Utah. We are therefore [45] not confronted with a situation where a statute from another state is adopted after the same had been authoritatively construed and applied by the courts of the latter. Notwithstanding this fact, we were lothe to disagree with the conclusion reached by the Supreme Court of California and have done so only upon mature deliberation and after having carefully considered both the reasoning and authorities upon which the decision in Feeney v. Hinckley is said to be based. In our judgment the decision in that case is based upon what is assumed to be the law rather than upon what the law actually is.

The decision seems to be based upon the conception that because the statute (section 3490) provides that an action should be deemed pending until the appeal, if one is taken, be determined, or, if no appeal be taken, then until the time for an appeal has expired, for that reason a judgment is not to be deemed final for the purpose of setting in motion the statute of limitations until the time has elapsed within which an appeal can be taken, and that if it were held otherwise the judgment creditor would not have the full time given by the statute of limitations in which to bring an action upon a judgment. In arriving at such a conclusion, the California Supreme Court, we think, committed at least two errors. The first one consisted in assuming that section 3490 in some way greatly changed or affected the rule prevailing at common law with regard to when actions were deemed pending.

The rule in that regard in force at common law is well stated by the Court of Appeals of New York in the case of Wegman v. Childs, 41 N. Y. 159, where it is stated thus:

"An action is pending in a court, though judgment has been recovered therein, as long as such judgment remains unsatisfied."

To the same effect are Gates v. Newman, 18 Ind. App. 398, 46 N. E. 654; Ulshafer v. Stewart, 71 Pa. St. 174; Wright v. Nostrand, 94 N. Y. 45; Chapin v. James, 11 R. I. 89, 23 Am. Rep. 412; Ex p. Howland, 3 Okla. Crim. 142, 104 Pac. 927, Ann. Cas. 1912A 840; Day v. Holland, 15 Ore. 464, [46] 15 Pac. 855; Shirley v. Birch, 16 Ore. 13, 18 Pac. 344; 6 Words and Phrases, 5277.

Section 3490, supra, therefore, belongs to that class of statutes wherein it was sought to declare and make certain an existing rule of practice or procedure rather than to create a new one. Moreover, when other provisions of the Code, which have a bearing upon the subject, are kept in mind and are given proper force, it, in our judgment, is conclusive that neither in adopting the rule at common law nor by what is said in the statute was it intended to declare that, although actions be pending after judgment, they are necessarily pending for all purposes. In our judgment actions remain pending after judgment only for the purpose of enforcing them and to institute the proceeding provided by law to reverse or to modify them. For the purpose of enforcing the judgment, it is just as much final immediately after its rendition and entry in the court of original jurisdiction, unless it is expressly otherwise provided by some statute, as it is after an appeal is terminated. For the purpose of res judicata or estoppel this may, however, not be so. If this distinction be kept in mind, no difficulty will be encountered in applying the remedies incident to the enforcement of judgments.

It is certainly elementary law that a judgment may be enforced either by execution or by an action immediately after rendition, unless execution be stayed and the judgment suspended in accordance with law or some fixed rule of practice or procedure. The law in this respect is clearly stated by the author of Freeman on Judgments (4th ed.) sec. 432, in the following words:

"The right to bring an action upon a judgment at any time after its rendition, until it is barred by some statute of limitations, though the plaintiff retains the power to collect it, if he can, by execution, is almost universally conceded, and such concession has not, so far as we are aware, been attended by any such abuse of the privilege conceded as calls for legislative interposition."

The abuse here referred to is the one sometimes alluded to of bringing successive actions upon the same judgment. To the same effect is 2 Black on Judgments, sec. 958.

[47] The cases supporting the foregoing doctrine are very numerous. We shall refer to a few only, namely: Morse v. Pearl, 67 N. H. 317, 36 Atl. 255, 68 Am. St. Rep. 672; Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Lucas, 26 Wash. 417, 67 Pac. 252, 56 L.R.A. 812, 90 Am. St. Rep. 748 (see the editor's note to this case, page 755); Schuyler County Bank v. Bradbury, 56 Kan. 355, 43 Pac. 254; Snyder v. Hitchcock, 94 Mich. 313, 54 N. W. 43; Cain v. Williams, 16 Nev. 426; Gilmore v. H. W. Baker Co. 14 Wash. 52, 44 Pac. 101; Suydam v. Hoyt, 25 N. J. L. 230; Union Trust Co. v. Rochester, etc. R. Co. 29 Fed. 609-611; Johnson v. Foran, 59 Md. 460.

But, entirely apart from these authorities, our statute (Comp. Laws 1907, sec. 3307) clearly contemplates the enforcement of judgments given for the payment of money immediately after they are entered, since it is there provided that an appeal from a "judgment or order directing the payment of money does not stay the execution of the same unless a written undertaking be executed on the part of the appellant by two or more sureties to the effect," etc. Again, section 3320 provides for restitution in case a judgment is reversed or modified on appeal after its enforcement, and also affords protection to the purchaser under execution sales in such cases. It is idle, therefore, to contend that in this state the enforcement of judgments is or was intended to be held in abeyance by what is said in section 3490, since it manifestly was not intended that the provisions of that section are alone controlling simply because they in some respects are contrary to other statutory provisions relating to the enforcement of judgments. A judgment in this state is therefore not suspended or superseded unless and until that is accomplished in accordance with our statute relating to that subject.

In connection with the question just considered it must also be kept in mind that the courts are practically unanimous in holding that, where the purpose of the action is merely to enforce the judgment, a plea of another action pending cannot successfully be interposed in the [48] action commenced upon a judgment before the time for appeal has expired. The only plea that is of any avail in such an action is that the judgment has been suspended by the execution of a supersedeas bond as provided by law or some other statutory method. From among the numerous cases that might be cited in support of the foregoing doctrine, we refer to the following: Rogers v. Odell, 39 N. H. 417; Steers v. Shaw, 53 N. J. L. 358, 21 Atl. 940; Merritt v. Fowler, 76 Hun 424, 27 N. Y. S. 1047; Litchfield v. Brooklyn, 13 Misc. 693, 34 N. Y. S. 1090; Oneida County Bank v. Bonney, 101 N. Y. 173, 4 N. E. 332; North Muskegon v. Clark, 62 Fed. 694, 22 U. S. App. 522, 10 C. C. A. 591; Gordon v. Gilfoil, 99 U. S. 168, 25 U. S. (L. ed.) 383. Moreover, in all of the cases to which we have referred so far, where the question was raised, it is expressly held that the statute of limitations begins to run upon a judgment immediately after its rendition if under the local law it is then enforceable. We shall therefore not cite the cases upon that question again.

The full faith and credit clause of the federal Constitution also applies as soon as the judgment is enforceable and is not held in abeyance until the time for appeal has elapsed. How can any one doubt that the plaintiffs here could have maintained an action upon the judgment in question in the courts of this state or of any other state in the Union at any time after it was rendered in the United States Circuit Court? If any one entertains any doubt upon that question, a mere cursory reading of the numerous authorities upon that subject will at once dispel it.

Our statute provides that an action upon a judgment must be commenced within eight years. Eight years from what time? Clearly from the time a cause of action has arisen.

It is a rule of universal application that a cause or right of action arises the moment an action may be maintained to enforce it and that the statute of limitations is then set in motion. The test, therefore, is, Can an action be maintained upon the particular cause of action in question? [49] If it can, the statute begins to run. This test is not questioned in Feeney v. Hinckley, but it is actually invoked in that case. It is there held, however, that a cause of action does not arise upon a judgment until an appeal, if one is taken, is determined, or, if none is taken, until the time for an appeal has elapsed. That conclusion, as we have seen, is, however, contrary to the overwhelming weight of authority, and in our judgment is the second error into which the Supreme Court of California has fallen in the Feeney Case. That court, however, seeks to sustain its conclusion upon the ground that a judgment may not be considered final until the time for an appeal has elapsed. It has accordingly repeatedly been held in that state that a judgment roll may not be used as evidence for the purpose of establishing pleas of estoppel or res judicata pending an appeal during the time an appeal can be taken. The correctness of that doctrine may be conceded, and yet it in no way militates against the fact that a judgment may nevertheless be used as evidence for some purpose other than estoppel and res judicata. The reason why a judgment roll pending an appeal or during the time when one may be taken may not be used as evidence of an estoppel or res judicata of any particular fact or facts involved in the litigation which terminated in the judgment evidenced by the judgment roll is palpably obvious. So long as the judgment may be modified or reversed upon a direct proceeding on appeal or otherwise, the facts that were involved in the litigation cannot be said to be res judicata. That is, they are not finally fixed and determined, but are still subject to be changed or entirely overthrown. But this in no way affects the right of the judgment creditor to enforce his judgment either by execution or by another action. This right he had at common law and is continued in force by our statute. If the judgment debtor desires to prevent the immediate exercise of the right, he may appeal and supersede or suspend the judgment as provided by the statute. It is clear, therefore, that, although a judgment may not be used as evidence for all purposes, it may nevertheless [50] be used as evidence to prove its own existence. For the latter purpose the judgment may, and in the very nature of things must, be used as evidence, even in case of an appeal. If this were not so, no appeal could be prosecuted, since there could be no evidence to establish the judgment which is the subject of the appeal. At common law as well as under our statute a judgment may also be used as evidence of its own existence when it is sought to be enforced either upon execution or by bringing an action upon it. This is inevitable, and the Supreme Court of California has clearly demonstrated that such is the case.

In a much later case than Feeney v. Hinckley, namely, McKannay v. Horton, 151 Cal. 711, 91 Pac. 598, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 661, 121 Am. St. Rep. 146, that court enforced a judgment immediately after its rendition notwithstanding the objection made that such could not be done because the time for appeal in that case had not yet expired. It may well be asked; How was it possible for the Supreme Court of California to sustain the enforcement of the judgment of the lower court unless it regarded the same as final and enforceable and received it as evidence to prove its own existence? The judgment in that case at least was enforced, although an appeal was permissible at the time it was enforced. If, therefor, a judgment may be enforced before the time for an appeal has elapsed, it must be done upon the theory that it exists as a final and enforceable judgment and that its existence may be established by the production of the judgment roll. In other words, the judgment may thus be used as evidence to prove its own existence. It may be contended, however, that in the later California case the judgment was by a statute made enforceable forthwith. But such, as we have shown, is in legal effect also the case under our statute. There is no difference in principle between the right of immediate enforcement of a judgment and its actual enforcement. There is therefore no difference in principle between the later California case and the one at bar, or, for that matter, between the judgment in the California case [51] and any judgment entered in the courts of this state which is enforceable under our statute.

But it is further contended by the plaintiffs that this court is committed to the doctrine laid down in the case of Feeney v. Hinckley by the results reached in Howe v. Sears, 30 Utah 344, 84 Pac. 1107, and in Vance v. Heath, 42 Utah 148, 129 Pac. 365. There is absolutely nothing in Howe v. Sears that in any way supports the California doctrine. Indeed, if the facts in Howe v. Sears are kept in mind, the decision is at least negative authority in favor of the defendants. For example, if in that case this court had intended to follow the doctrine laid down in Feeney v. Hinckley, then no argument was required to show that the statute of limitations had not run in that case for the reason that confessedly the action would not have been barred for nearly, if not quite, six months after its commencement in any event. Nor is there anything said in the case of Vance v. Heath contrary to the conclusions reached here. Indeed, the latter case is in perfect harmony with our present conclusions. What is held in the Vance Case is that a judgment may not be used as evidence of estoppel or res judicata with regard to any particular fact or facts involved in the litigation pending an appeal or so long as the time for one has not expired. There is nothing said or intimated in that case that a judgment is not a final and enforceable judgment immediately after it is rendered, nor that it cannot be used as evidence to prove its own existence so long as it is not sought to use the judgment as evidence to establish an estoppel or res judicata.

There can be no doubt that for the purpose of enforcing it a judgment is evidence of its own existence immediately upon being rendered and entered as provided by law. Nor is there any doubt whatever that an action may be maintained upon such a judgment in any court of competent jurisdiction in any state in the Union, including the one in which it is rendered, just as soon as it is rendered and entered as aforesaid. The cause of action upon a [52] judgment, whether of a federal or a state court, therefore, arises as soon as the judgment has a legal existence, which is immediately upon its rendition in the court from which it emanates, or, if the law requires that it be entered in some book before it is enforceable, then from the time of such entry. In other words, a cause of action arises from the time a judgment is legally enforceable by execution or by action. In this state this may be done immediately after the judgment is or ought to have been entered. The statute of limitations is set in motion at that time, and unless an action is commenced within eight years thereafter the cause of action is barred. The fact that in this state a judgment may be enforced by execution during the full period of eight years in no way affects the question involved here. A party has the right to commence an action upon a judgment notwithstanding the fact that he can also enforce it by execution. Besides, he may desire to bring an action in a foreign state, and this he may do as soon as the judgment is called into existence in the manner authorized by law, unless there is some express statute to the contrary. The right to commence an action upon the judgment in question, therefore, expired eight years from and after the 30th day of December, 1897, or on December 30, 1905, unless the statute, for some legal reason, was suspended during that time. It is contended, and the court so found, that as against the defendant Christopherson it was suspended for a period of 164 days and no more. If it be assumed that under the evidence in this case plaintiffs were entitled to add the entire period of 164 days to be eight years against the defendant Christopher, yet, for the reasons hereinbefore stated, the action was not commenced in time even as against him.

In view of what has been said, therefore, the court erred in its conclusion of law and in entering judgment against the defendants. Under the undisputed evidence the action was not commenced until eight years and 165 days had elapsed, and therefore the right to maintain it was barred when the present action was commenced.

[53] The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause is remanded to the district court, with directions to grant a new trial. Costs to appellant.

In Gaumer v. Terrel, 65 Kan. 15, 68 Pac. 1071, it was held in the case of a foreign judgment that the statute did not start running until eighteen months after its rendition. And in Miller v. Rosebrook, 136 Ia. 158, 113 N. W. 771, it was held that the statute began to run against the judgment of a justice of the peace, transferred to the district court, not from its rendition but from the date of entry by the clerk of the district court. In Peoria County v. Gordon, 82 Ill. 435, the court said that the statute ran from the last day of the term of the circuit court at which the judgment was rendered. See also Johnson v. Hines, 61 Md. 122. In Salmon v. McLean, 116 N. C. 209, 21 S. E. 178, wherein it appeared that a judgment was vacated on rehearing by the same court and a subsequent judgment was granted, the court held that the statute ran from the date of the second judgment. And in Barnes v. Maring, 23 Ill. App. 68, it was held that a widow's award was a judgment, when allowed, and the statute commenced to run from the allowance thereof. In Brown v. Hanauer, 48 Ark. 277, 3 S. W. 27, it was held that a probate allowance was a judgment within the statute fixing the period of limitation at ten years and while the statute might not run while the estate was in course of administration, it would run from the time of the discharge of the administrator. In Borer v. Chapman, 119 U. S. 587, 7 S. Ct. 342, 30 U. S. (L. ed.) 532, the court said that the statute ran from the date of the order of the entry of a judgment nunc pro tunc and not from the day as of which the judgment was ordered to take effect.

In some jurisdictions limitations run from the rendition of a judgment only in case no execution is issued thereon. Wilcox v. Austin First Nat. Bank, 52 S. W. 560, affirmed 93 Tex. 322, 55 S. W. 317; Burns v. Skelton, 68 S. W. 528; Tourtlot v. Booker, 160 S. W. 293. See also Fessenden v. Barrett, 9 Tex. 475; Graves v. Hall, 13 Tex. 379; Wahrenberger v. Horan, 18 Tex. 57; Stevens v. Stone, 94 Tex. 415, 59 S. W. 1122, 60 S. W. 959, 86 Am. St. Rep. 861; Shields v. Stark, 51 S. W. 540; Dabney v. Shelton, 82 Va. 340, 4 S. E. 605. See also Herrington v. Harkins, 1 Rob. 591; Rowe v. Hardy, 97 Va. 674, 34 S. E. 625, 75 Am. St. Rep. 811; Livesay v. Dunn, 33 W. Va. 463, 10 S. E. 808; Fisher v. Hartley, 48 W. Va. 339, 37 S. E. 578, 86 Am. St. Rep. 39, 54 L.R.A. 215. See also Werdenbaugh v. Reid, 20 W. Va. 588. Compare Handy v. Smith, 30 W. Va. 195, 3 S. E. 604. In several of these jurisdictions it is said that since the issuance of execution suspends the right of action on the judgment the statutes does not begin to run until the execution is returned. Thatcher v. Lyons, 70 Vt. 438, 41 Atl. 423, 67 Am. St. Rep. 677; Davis v. Roller, 106 Va. 46, 55 S. E. 4, 117 Am. E. 625, 75 Am. St. Rep. 811.

In Texas by the terms of a statute an action on a judgment must be brought within a prescribed time after the issuance of the last execution thereon. Fessenden v. Barrett, 9 Tex. 475; Graves v. Hall, 13 Tex. 379; Stevens v. Stone, 59 S. W. 1122, 94 Tex. 415, 60 S. W. 959, 86 Am. St. Rep. 861. See also Shields v. Stark (Tex.) 51 S. W. 540; Wilcox v. Austin First Nat. Bank, 52 S. W. 560, affirmed 93 Tex. 322, 55 S. W. 317; Tourtelot v. Booker (Tex.) 160 S. W. 293.

In England the rule is that the statute commences to run after the right to receive money on the judgment shall have accrued to some person capable of giving a discharge for or release thereof. Hebblethwaite v. Peever [1892] 1 Q. B. 124; Jay v. Johnstone [1893] 1 Q. B. 25, 189. See also Watson v. Birch, 15 Sim. 523; Ex p. Tynte, 15 Ch. D. 125.

In California it is said that the statute of limitations begins to run against an action on a judgment from the time it is complete and final. Hills v. Sherwood, 33 Cal. 474, 479; Trenouth v. Farrington, 54 Cal. 273; Crim v. Kessing, 89 Cal. 478, 26 Pac. 1074, 23 Am. St. Rep. 491; Herrlich v. McDonald, 104 Cal. 551, 38 Pac. 360; Harrier v. Bassford, 145 Cal. 529, 78 Pac. 1038; Feeney v. Hinckley, 64 Pac. 408, reversed 134 Cal. 467, 66 Pac. 580, 86 Am. St. Rep. 290; Damon v. Webber, 111 Me. 473, 89 Atl. 734. See also Mason v. Cronise, 20 Cal. 211; Edwards v. Hellings, 103 Cal. 204, 37 Pac. 218; John Heinlen Co. v. Cadwell, 3 Cal. App. 80, 84 Pac. 443. Compare De Uprey v. De Uprey, 23 Cal. 352; Hobbs v. Duff, 23 Cal. 596; Simpson v. Simpson, 21 Cal. App. 150, 131 Pac. 99. While the decisions are in substantial agreement as to the running of the statute from the finality of the judgment, still there has been considerable conflict as to when a judgment is final. Thus in Herrlich v. McDonald, supra, the court held the judgment final from the entry thereof. And in Trenouth v. Farrington, supra, the court said: "The judgment here spoken of is a complete judgment, one that has been reduced to a tangible form—a record. In the case at bar it will be observed that the court did not itself enter judgment. It only ordered that judgment be entered. This was not in fact done until five days afterward, when for the first time the judgment became a matter of record, and a complete and final judgment. In our opinion it was from this date that the statute began to run." See to the same effect Crim v. Kessing, supra. However, in Feeney v. Hinckley, supra, the court held that the statute did not run from the entry of the judgment, but from one year thereafter if no appeal was taken. And in Harrier v. Bassford, supra, it was held that the statute started to run six months after entry. In De Uprey v. De Uprey, 23 Cal. 352, the court held that in the case of a judgment rendered, payable in instalments, the statute ran from the period fixed for payment of each installment as it became due.

Deficiency Judgment.

Against a deficiency judgment the statute of limitations begins to run from the time the amount of the deficiency is determined. Stoddard v. Van Bussum, 57 N. J. Eq. 34, 40 Atl. 29; Thompson v. Cheesman, 15 Utah 43, 48 Pac. 477; Howe v. Sears, 30 Utah 344, 84 Pac. 1107.

In Parratt v. Hartsuff, 75 Neb. 706, 106 N. W. 966, it was held that the statute commenced to run from the report of the sale. And in Bignold v. Carr, 24 Wash. 413, 64 Pac. 519, it was held that the statute ran from the entry of the deficiency judgment. However in Smith v. Pegg, 111 Mich. 232, 69 N. W. 488, the statute was held to run from the entry of the decree of foreclosure.

Judgment Revived by Scire Facias.

A revived judgment by scire facias constitutes a new cause of action and the statute of limitations starts to run from its rendition and not from the rendition of the original judgment. Digges v. Eliason, 4 Cranch (C. C.) 619, 7 Fed. Cas. No. 3,904; Mann v. Cooper, 2 App. Cas. (D. C.) 226; Thomas v. Lully (Cal.) 152 Pac. 53; Fagan v. Bently, 32 Ga. 534; Walsh v. Bosse, 16 Mo. App. 231. See also Morton v. Valentine, 15 La. Ann. 153; Mullikin v. Duvall, 7 Gill & J. (Md.) 355. Compare Marx v. Sanders, 98 Ala. 500, 11 So. 764.

v.

SHAFT.

North Carolina Supreme Court—May 20, 1914.

166 N. Car. 407; 81 S. E. 932.

Abortion — Admission of Evidence — Harmless Error.

Where, on a trial for procuring a pregnant woman to take a drug with intent to procure a miscarriage, the pregnancy of the woman is undisputed, evidence as to sexual intercourse on her part is immaterial and its admission is harmless.

Expert Evidence — Effect of Abortifacient — Basis for Testimony.

On a trial for procuring a pregnant woman to take a drug with intent to procure a miscarriage, where there is evidence that a capsule, some of which was administered, contained aloes, experts are properly permitted to testify as to the effect of such drug on pregnancy, when administered in large doses.

Criminal Law — Competency of Accomplice Testimony.

On a criminal trial, the testimony of an accomplice is competent.

Necessity of Corroboration.

A person may be convicted upon the unsupported testimony of an accomplice, though the jury should be cautious, in so convicting.

Victim of Abortion as Accomplice.

A pregnant woman, procured by defendant to take a drug with intent to procure a miscarriage, is not an accomplice in a legal sense.

[See note at end of this case.]

Abortion — Administering Harmless Drug.

Under Revisal 1905, § 3619, specifying the punishment for procuring a pregnant woman to take a drug with intent to procure a miscarriage, where a drug is furnished for the purpose of producing a miscarriage, it is immaterial that it is not noxious or capable of producing the intended effect.

[See 1 R. C. L. tit. Abortion, p. 73.]

Criminal Law — Abortion — Sentence not Excessive.

Under Revisal 1905, § 3618, providing that any person who shall administer or procure any woman pregnant or quick with child to take any drug with intent to destroy the child shall be imprisoned not less than one nor more than ten years, and fined at the court's discretion, and section 3619 providing that any person who shall administer or procure any pregnant woman to take any drug with intent to procure a miscarriage, or injure the woman, shall be imprisoned not less than one nor more than five years, and fined at the court's discretion, imprisonment for three years and a fine of $1,000 for procuring a pregnant woman to take a drug with intent to procure a miscarriage was not a cruel and unusual punishment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe county: CARTER, Judge.

Criminal action. Elizabeth Shaft convicted of violation of statute and appeals. AFFIRMED.

[408] This is an indictment for a violation of sections 3618 and 3619, Revisal.

The bill of indictment charged that the defendant "did unlawfully and wilfully and feloniously advise and procure a certain woman, called Annie Kraft, to take a certain noxious drug, the name of which is to the grand jurors unknown, with intent thereby to procure the miscarriage of her, the said Annie Kraft, she being at the time pregnant."

From the judgment sentencing the defendant to imprisonment in the State's Prison for three years, and to pay a fine of $1,000, she appealed.

R. S. McCall and Mark W. Brown for appellant.

Attorney-General Bickett and Assistant Attorney-General Calvert for appellee.

[409] BROWN, J.—The first and second assignments of error relate to the admission of testimony tending to prove sexual intercourse upon the part of the girl, Annie Kraft. This testimony was wholly immaterial, and certainly harmless as to the defendant.

There was no dispute as to the pregnancy of the girl, and the only question to be determined was whether or not the defendant had administered to her medicine for the purpose of procuring an abortion.

Exceptions 3, 4, 5, and 6 relate to the competency of certain witnesses to testify as experts, and to their qualifications as such. A previous witness had testified that the capsule offered in evidence, and some of which had been administered to the girl, contained aloes, and these witnesses as experts were permitted to testify as to the effect of this drug upon pregnancy, when administered in large doses.

We see no objection to the competency of this evidence.

Exceptions 7, 9, and 11 were taken to the sufficiency of the evidence to go to the jury, and seem to rest upon two grounds:

First. It seems to be contended by the defendant that a conviction cannot be had in such cases on the uncorroborated testimony of the woman, as she is said to be an accomplice in the alleged offense.

Assuming that the girl, Kraft, was an accomplice, the testimony of an accomplice is competent in this State, and a person may be convicted upon the unsupported testimony of an accomplice, though the jury should be cautious in so doing. While Annie Kraft may be, in one sense, an accomplice of the defendant, it is only in a moral and not in a legal sense.

In a note to 12 Ann. Cas. 1009, there is a full discussion of the cases showing that the victim of an abortion or attempted abortion, whether or not she consents thereto, is not in law an accomplice in the commission of the offense nor within the meaning of the statute providing that there shall be no conviction of a person upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice.

Second. A further contention of the defendant under these exceptions seems to be that the testimony does not show that the defendant advised and procured the prosecuting witness to take or did not administer to her a noxious drug.

[410] There is abundant evidence that the defendant, at the solicitation of Annie Kraft, gave her the capsules containing aloes for the purpose of producing a miscarriage. While there is evidence that the drug furnished her would produce such an effect when administered in very large doses, yet it is not necessary that the State should prove that aloes are a noxious drug and capable of producing the intended effect.

The language of the statute of the different States describing this offense varies, but they nearly all provide that whoever, with the intent to produce a miscarriage of any pregnant woman, unlawfully administers, or causes to be given to her, any drug of noxious substance whatever, with such intent, shall be guilty of the offense.

Under this statute it has been generally held that the offense may be committed by administering any substance with intent to produce an abortion, whether such substance be noxious or not, and whether it be capable of producing the intended effect or not.

There is a full discussion of this subject in the notes to Abrams v. Foshee, 66 Am. Dec. 82, where all of the authorities are collated.

The defendant excepts to the judgment of the court on the ground that it imposes a cruel and an unusual punishment, and relies upon the case of State v. Lee, 106 N. C. 250, 80 S. E. 977. That case is no authority in support of the defendant's contention. The statute in this case limits the punishment to not less than one year nor more than ten years, and a fine in the discretion of the court. The sentence in this case is within the limitation prescribed by law.

Upon the review of the whole record, we find

No error.

NOTE.

Woman Upon Whom Abortion Is Committed as Accomplice.

It is the intention of this note to review the recent cases discussing the question whether a woman on whom an abortion is committed is an accomplice. The earlier cases are discussed in the notes to Thompson v. U. S. 12 Ann. Cas. 1004, and Stone v. State, 98 Am. St. Rep. 145.

The rule has been affirmed, under various statutory definitions of the offense of abortion, that the victim of an abortion, whether or not she consents thereto, is not, in law, an accomplice in the commission of the offense. Gullatt v. State, 14 Ga. App. 53, 80 S. E. 340; State v. Stafford, 145 Ia. 285, 123 N. W. 167; Meno v. State, 117 Md. 435, 83 Atl. 759; Shaw v. State, 73 Tex. Crim. 337, 165 S. W. 930; Fondren v. State (Tex.) 169 S. W. 411; Gray v. State (Tex.) 178 S. W. 337. And see the reported case.

In the reported case it is held that while the woman is not strictly an accomplice she is, according to a moral point of view, implicated in the transaction, and it is proper for the jury to consider that circumstance and its bearing on her credibility as a witness. To the same effect is Meno v. State, 117 Md. 435, 83 Atl. 759, wherein the court said: "A woman on whom an abortion has been performed is regarded as a victim rather than an accomplice, and even if she is deemed an accomplice, she is competent as a witness for the prosecution of the accused, and her evidence does not require corroboration when it established satisfactory proof of guilt, though in all such cases the credibility of it is to be passed upon by the jury under proper caution from the court, as to the amount of credence to be placed in it."

In Greenwood v. State, 3 Okla. Crim. 247, 105 Pac. 371, the court said that while it was not unmindful of the rule that the defendant in a felony case could not be convicted on the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice, in the case at bar it was not necessary to determine whether a woman on whom an abortion had been committed was an accomplice.

SIMS ET AL.

EVERETT ET AL.

Arkansas Supreme Court—June 1, 1914.

113 Ark. 198; 168 S. W. 559.

Trial — Request by Both Parties for Direction of Verdict — Effect.

Where both parties requested peremptory instructions and the court directed verdict in favor of defendants, the case stands on appeal as if the jury, upon correct instructions, had returned a verdict in defendants' favor, and the sole question is that of the legal sufficiency of the evidence.

[See Ann. Cas. 1913C 1342.]

Bills and Notes — Right of Assignee to Sue — Consideration of Assignment.

Where there is a valid written assignment of a note, the assignee is authorized to sue, and the makers and sureties cannot question the consideration for the assignment.

Principal and Surety — Notice by Surety to Sue — Sufficiency.

Kirby's Dig. § 7921, declares that a surety may, by written notice, require the creditor to sue the principal debtor, and that if he fail to do so within 30 days after notice, the surety shall be exonerated. A surety upon a note verbally requested the creditor to sue before the maker became insolvent, but the creditor failed to sue, and the maker became insolvent. Held, that the surety was not discharged by the creditor's failure to comply with his verbal request.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Independence county: JEFFERY, Judge.

Action on promissory notes. Albert Sims et al., plaintiffs, and J. M. Everett, et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Samuel M. Casey for appellants.

Dene H. Coleman for appellees.

[200] McCULLOCH, C. J.—This is an action to recover from appellees, J. M. Everett and W. A. Halliburton, the amount of two negotiable promissory notes executed by them as sureties for J. T. Halliburton to O. B. Edmondson, now deceased. Edmondson, by written endorsement on the back of each of the notes, assigned the same to the Union Bank & Trust Company and the latter in turn assigned same to appellant, Albert Sims, who instituted this action; but subsequent to its institution said Union Bank & Trust Company, as the executor of Edmondson's estate (he having died), was joined as plaintiff.

The case originated before a justice of the peace, and there were no written pleadings; but the two appellees, as sureties, defended on the ground that they requested the payee of the note to sue, and that he failed to do so, and by reason thereof the principal had become insolvent so that his liability could not be enforced.

The only evidence tending to support that defense, if it be held to be a good defense, is that of witness Christopher, who stated that he heard a conversation between Edmondson and one of the sureties, in which the latter told Edmondson "to collect his money, that it was due and that he didn't want to have to pay it."

The only testimony which it is claimed tended to establish the solvency of the principal debtor at or about the time the request was made was that of a witness who stated that he heard a conversation between Edmondson and the principal debtor, in which the latter said that if required he would sell his wagon and team to pay the notes and that Edmondson told him that he didn't want him to do so, as the sureties on the notes were good.

[201] The court was requested by the parties on both sides of the controversy to give a peremptory instruction, and the court refused to grant appellant's request, but instructed the jury to return a verdict in favor of appellees, the defendants.

The case, therefore, stands here as if the jury had, upon correct instructions, returned a verdict in appellees' favor, and the sole question is that of the legal sufficiency of the evidence. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Mulkey, 100 Ark. 71, Ann. Cas. 1913C 1339, 139 S. W. 643.

There was testimony tending to qualify the interest of appellant Sims in the notes and to show that the original payee had an interest therein; but inasmuch as there was a valid assignment in writing he was authorized to sue, and appellees can not question the consideration upon which the assignment is based. Moreover, the executor of the original holder is made party, and that eliminates any question of the relative interests of the parties in the recovery.

The statutes of this State provide that "any person bound as surety for another in any bond, bill or note, . . . may, at any time after action hath accrued thereon, by notice in writing, require the person having such right of action forthwith to commence suit against the principal debtor," and that "if such suit be not commenced within thirty days after the service of such notice, and proceeded in with due diligence, in the ordinary course of law, to judgment and execution, such surety shall be exonerated from liability to the person notified." Kirby's Digest, §§ 7921, 7922.

It is not shown that the terms of the statute were complied with, but it is contended that noncompliance with the verbal request was sufficient to exonerate the sureties if the principal was solvent at the time the request was made and afterward became insolvent.

The trial court evidently based the decision upon that view of the law.

It is said that the law has been so declared in three of the decisions of this court. Hampstead v. Watkins, [202] 6 Ark. 317, 42 Am. Dec. 696; Thompson v. Robinson, 34 Ark. 44; King v. Haynes, 35 Ark. 463.

There are statements to that effect in the opinions in the two cases last cited, but in each case it was mere dictum, for the reason that the point was not involved and the court did not decide it.

The case of Hempstead v. Watkins, supra, was cited in each of those cases as supporting the statement; but the point was not decided in that case.

In the case last referred to notice had been given in the manner provided by statute, but had not been complied with, the suit brought within the time specified in the statute having been instituted by the plaintiff in the wrong capacity. After the expiration of the statutory time for complying with the notice another suit was instituted, and judgment was rendered against the principal and sureties; and subsequently the sureties filed a bill in the chancery court to restrain the enforcement of said judgment against them. The point of the case was whether or not the sureties had any remedy in a court of equity which was not barred by the judgment at law, and the court decided that the judgment at law did not bar the sureties of their equitable remedies and that the chancery court had jurisdiction to grant relief to the sureties against the enforcement of said judgment and following the decision of the New York court in the case of Pain v. Packard, 13 Johns. 174, 7 Am. Dec. 369, said that "the statute is but declaratory and an extension of an existing and an originally equitable remedy, and which has been adopted and converted by courts of law into a subject of legal cognizance."

In Thompson v. Robinson the surety requested the payee in the note to sue the principal debtor and attach the property of the principal, and, after judgment, instituted action in chancery to restrain the enforcement. The court held that no ground for relief was shown, for the reason that there appeared no ground for attachment of the property of the principal debtor. The court said that mere delay or neglect to sue, without notice, would [203] not discharge the surety, but that "if, after the debt was due, the surety, verbally, or in writing, request the creditor to sue the principal, who is then solvent, and the creditor fail to do so, and the principal afterward becomes insolvent, the surety is thereby discharged."

King v. Haynes was a suit in equity to enjoin the enforcement of a judgment against a surety on the ground that the creditor had extended the time of payment without his consent; but this court held that there had been no extension for a definite period upon a valid consideration and the surety was not discharged. Mr. Justice Eakin in the opinion of the court stated the rule announced in Hempstead v. Watkins, supra, but held that the proof was not sufficient to bring the case within that rule.

So, it will be seen that in each of those cases the announcement of that rule was dictum.

It is clearly against the great weight of authority, and we think it also inconsistent with other decisions of this court.

We have held that the statute on the subject is in derogation of the common law and of the contractual rights of the parties to such instrument and should be strictly construed. Cummins v. Garretson, 15 Ark. 132; Thompson v. Traller, 82 Ark. 247, 101 S. W. 174.

An examination of the authorities discloses the fact that there was no such rule at the common law and that in the absence of a statute the surety cannot compel the creditor to bring suit against the principal and is not discharged by the failure of the principal to do so.

Mr. Brandt calls attention to the few cases holding to the rule above announced, but says that it is contrary to the great weight of authority, and cites numerous cases in support of that statement. "The great majority of cases on the subject hold," he says, "in the absence of any statutory provision, that if after the debt is due the surety request the creditor to sue the principal, who is then solvent, and the creditor fails to do so, and the principal afterward becomes insolvent, the surety is not [204] thereby discharged. The ground upon which these decisions rest is, that the principal and surety are both equally bound to the creditor, who may have taken a surety in order that he might not have to sue the principal. If the surety desires a suit brought against the principal, he may himself pay the debt, and immediately sue the principal. The contrary doctrine is an innovation, and was unknown to the common law." 1 Brandt on Surety & Guaranty, § 265.

The doctrine seems to have originated with the case of Pain v. Packard, supra, decided by the New York Court of Errors in 1816. Chancellor Kent, in the case of King v. Baldwin, 2 Johns. Ch. 554, refused to follow the rule announced in Pain v. Packard, and on appeal the Court of Errors reversed his decision by a divided court, the deciding vote being cast by the Lieutenant Governor, who was a layman.

The New York courts, in later decisions, have recognized the rule announced in Pain v. Packard, but almost invariably have done so with protest against its correctness.

The case has been condemned by nearly all the courts which have had occasion to discuss the law on the subject.

Chief Justice Parker, speaking for the Massachusetts court in Frye v. Barker, 4 Pick. 382, said:

"We never have adopted the law stated to be settled by the New York case of Pain v. Packard, that a surety may discharge himself, if upon request the creditor does not sue the principal. . . . The cases cited of a discharge to the surety, where the principal may still be holden, are chiefly cases of obligation to perform some duty other than the payment of money, where the terms of the contract are changed by the obligee without the consent of the surety. . . . There seems to be no reason, in the case of money contracts, for discharging the surety because the promisee neglects to sue the principal, for the surety may pay the debt and then bring an action himself."

[205] In the case of Inkster v. Marshall, First Nat. Bank, 30 Mich. 143, Mr. Justice Christianity, speaking for the court, said:

"The case of Pain v. Packard, 13 Johns. 174, 7 Am. Dec. 369 (which has been followed in New York, not without some vigorous protest, and to some extent in some other States), was, we think, a clear departure from the common law; and we find nothing in the English decisions to warrant the qualifications of a surety's liabilities there recognized."

Many other decisions discuss the doctrine laid down in Pain v. Packard, and expressly decline to follow it, declaring it to be an innovation. Davis v. Huggins, 3 N. H. 231; Dane v. Corduan, 24 Cal. 157, 85 Am. Dec. 53; Langdon v. Markle, 48 Mo. 357; Hickok v. Farmers', etc. Bank, 35 Vt. 476; Jenkins v. Clarkson, 7 Ohio 72, pt. 1; Stout v. Ashton, 5 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 251; Nichols v. McDowell, 14 B. Mon. (Ky.) 6; Gage v. Mechanics' Nat. Bank, 79 Ill. 62; Huff v. Slife, 25 Neb. 448, 41 N. W. 289, 13 Am. St. Rep. 497.

Those cases hold, in effect, that, in the absence of statute, the surety has no right to require the creditor to proceed against the principal and that a failure to sue upon request does not discharge the surety.

In Stout v. Ashton, supra, where it was proved that the surety, who had requested the payee to sue the principal, insisted upon suit being brought, the court said:

"We cannot concur with the court below, by supposing the surety to be released by the mere laches, or neglect, of the obligee to bring suit. No case which has come under our notice goes that far. On the contrary, it is well settled that mere delay in bringing suit, by the obligee, though urged to do so by the surety, does not discharge the surety; and for a good reason. The surety has undertaken positively to pay the debt. If his obligee will not sue, and he is in danger, he can relieve himself by fulfilling his obligation; that is, by paying his debt, and taking the whip into his own hands, and pursuing his principal."

[206] In the other case cited above from the Kentucky Court of Appeals it was said:

"If he (referring to the surety) has an equitable right to require the creditor to sue and coerce the debt out of the principal, the extent of that right, and the manner in which he can avail himself of it, have been defined and prescribed by statute, and he cannot avail himself of it in any other mode."

In Ohio there is a statute on the subject similar to ours, and the Supreme Court of that State in the case above cited said:

"Since this statute was passed, the common law rule has not been in force in this State; and it is unnecessary to inquire what its provisions are, for it has given place to the statute, and is repealed by it, if any such rule existed as that which would discharge a surety who gave the creditor notice to sue the principal, by parol, if the creditor did not proceed accordingly. The statute of Ohio requires the notice to be in writing."

We are convinced, therefore, that the dicta contained in the three decisions referred to in the beginning are erroneous and should not be allowed to control in the decision of this case on the question presented. They are, therefore, disapproved, and the rule is announced that the statute on this subject controls, and unless complied with the surety is not discharged by mere inactivity on the part of the creditor or failure or refusal to sue the principal.

The question, whether or not the creditor may waive the form of the notice and accept verbal notice, is not raised in the present case, and it is left for decision in some case in which it is directly raised.

The judgment of the circuit court is therefore reversed and judgment will be entered here in favor of appellants for the amount of the notes sued on with interest. It is so ordered.

Necessity of Written Notice, 633.

General Sufficiency of Notice, 633.

Particular Allegations:

As to Suretyship, 634.

As to Commanding Suit, 634.

As to Persons to be Sued, 636.

Introductory.

The earlier cases considering the sufficiency of the form of a notice by a surety to the principal to sue the debtor, in order to release the surety from his liability, in the event of a failure to sue are collated in the notes to Edmondson v. Potts, 21 Ann. Cas. 1365 and Davenport v. State Banking Co. 115 Am. St. Rep. 68. The present note reviews the recent cases on that point.

Necessity of Written Notice.

As a general rule, a statute directing that the notice shall be in writing, is deemed to be mandatory. Timmons v. Butler, 138 Ga. 69, 74 S. E. 784; Farmer v. Butler, 138 Ga. 72, 74 S. E. 785; Johnson v. Longley, 142 Ga. 814, 83 S. E. 952. And see the reported case. In Johnson v. Longley, supra, it was contended by the surety, that, about May 1, he informed the creditor and the latter's attorney that he did not wish to give the written notice to sue the principal debtor, as provided by a statute, in order not to offend the principal debtor, but wished them to bring suit, which they agreed to do; that he would have given the written notice except for this promise; that they did not bring suit at the next July term of court, as could have been done, but delayed to do so until March, that, had suit been brought, a judgment could have been obtained at the October term of court; that the principal debtor was in possession of a sawmill and gristmill and cotton gin on a small lot; that the gin was burned in November, just after the superior court adjourned; that, had judgment been obtained at the October term the property could have been levied on and have been in the hands of the sheriff; and that the surety was informed that the gin was worth four or five hundred dollars. The court said: "By section 3546 of the Civil Code (1910), a surety is authorized, at any time after the debt is due, to give notice in writing to the creditor to proceed to collect the debt out of the principal; and if the creditor refuses or fails to commence an action for three months after such notice, if the principal is within the jurisdiction, it is declared that the surety shall be discharged; but no notice is a sufficient compliance with this section which does not state the county of the principal's residence. A notice in parol to sue, however urgent, will not be a compliance with the statute, so as to work a discharge of the surety." In Brooks v. Stevens (Tex.) 178 S. W. 30, it was said: "It is unnecessary to pass upon the second and third propositions under the first assignment to the effect that the surety, Richardson, orally, and before maturity of the note, insisted that the note be not again extended and that suit be filed on the note when it matured, and the insistence not acted on by Brooks, as the facts stated will not have the effect to release Richardson as surety from his liability. Under the Revised Civil Statutes of this state, art. 6320, any person bound as surety upon any contract, when the right of action has accrued, may require, by notice in writing, the creditor or obligee forthwith to institute suit upon such contract, and a failure to conform to the demand would release the surety. But there is neither pleading by appellee, nor fact found by the trial court to suggest such defense, but the defense made here is that Richardson was an endorser in its limited and restricted sense. However, the propositions of appellant correctly state the law. A verbal notice by the surety, not acted on by the creditor, will not release the surety from liability."

The reported case, is based on a statute providing that: "any person bound as surety for another in any bond, bill or note, . . . may, at any time after action hath accrued thereon, by notice in writing, require the person having such right of action forthwith to commence suit against the principal debtor" and that "if such suit be not commenced within thirty days after the service of such notice, and proceeded in with due diligence, in the ordinary course of law, to judgment and execution, such surety shall be exonerated from liability to the person notified." It is held that a verbal request by one of the sureties to sue the principal does not exonerate the sureties, as the right to such exoneration is dependent on compliance with the statute.

In Benge v. Eversole, 156 Ky. 131, 160 S. W. 911, the court, referring to a statute (Kentucky Statutes § 4668) said: "But in the case at bar the statute above quoted expressly requires that the notice shall not only be in writing, but that it must be served upon the creditor, in person."

General Sufficiency of Notice.

While the general rule is that a notice following the language of the statute is sufficient, it has also been held that a substantial as distinguished from a literal compliance with the requirements of the statute, is sufficient. Thus in W. P. Brown, etc. Lumber Co. v. Steele (Ala.) 70 So. 161, it appeared that the written notice was as follows: "I hereby notify C. M. Hunter to sue, that I will not stay on note for G. S. Mussetter any longer. (Signed) J. B. Steele." The court said: "While the notice is lacking in technical precision, we think it substantially conforms to the requirements of the statute. Code, sec. 5396."

*Particular Allegations.AS TO SURETYSHIP.

A notice given by the administrator of a deceased surety need not assert unequivocally the status of his intestate as a surety. Hammond v. McHargue, 170 Mo. App. 497, 156 S. W. 725, wherein the court said: "It has been decided that an administrator of a deceased surety may properly give notice to sue. . . . But conceding that to be the law, yet plaintiff insists that the notice was insufficient in that it fails to state definitely that Jesse George was a surety on the note, in that it used the expression: 'if Jesse George signed said note, he did so as surety,' etc. Plaintiff says, and so the law is, that the notice must be clear and explicit. . . . Notwithstanding the strict construction which like statutes are thus shown to have received, we think the notice in controversy is not made null by the expression 'if Jesse George signed said notes, he did so as surety,' etc. It is the administrator speaking through the notice, and being aware that he had no right or authority to make an admission binding the estate, he put the statement in the form which the law would have given it had he omitted the word 'if.'"

AS TO COMMANDING SUIT.

It is well settled that the notice should clearly command or direct the creditor to bring suit. Frye v. Eisenbieas, 56 Ind. App. 123, 104 N. E. 895; Benge v. Ebersole, 156 Ky. 131, 160 S. W. 911; Hammond v. McHargue, 170 Mo. App. 497, 156 S. W. 725; National Bank of Commerce v. Gilvin (Tex.) 152 S. W. 652; Naylor v. Anderson (Tex.) 178 S. W. 620. In the case first cited the following notice from the surety was held to be insufficient: "Elkhart, Ind., U. S. A., Oct. 5, 1908. First State Bank, City. Gentlemen—The writer having disposed of his holdings in the Valley Paper Company begs to advise you that you do not extend any further credit on the strength of his endorsement and on notes given by Valley Paper Company. These notes fall due on demand and I want you to enforce collection or consider my endorsement cancelled. Kindly acknowledge receipt of this notice and oblige. Your very truly, Cyrus E. Frye." The court said: "In our view of the case a determination of the first question raised by appellant's brief, viz., the sufficiency of such notice as a compliance with sec. 1267, supra, 'any person bound as surety upon any contract in writing for the payment of money or the performance of any act, when the right of action has accrued, may require, by notice in writing, the creditor or obligee forthwith to institute an action upon the contract,' will dispose of the appeal. This statute abridges the common law right of the creditor to indulge the principal debtor by delay, and the surety's right thereunder can be acquired only by proceeding according to the method wherein provided. It should be stated, however, in this connection, that 'the statute is remedial, and all that can be required of the surety to effectuate his discharge is to bring his act within the meaning of the statute.'

. . . Appellant in effect concedes that the statute in question should be construed as indicated, but insists that under such construction his notice is sufficient. In considering the effect to be given to the word 'forthwith' as used in the section, this court in McMillin v. Deardorff, 18 Ind. App. 428, 48 N. E. 233, said, "The word 'forthwith' adds something to the meaning of the words with which it is used in the statute. It is not enough, therefore simply to require the creditor, in the notice, 'to institute an action upon the contract,' but some form of words must be used which will be equivalent to the requirement 'forthwith to institute an action on the contract.'" . . . In Haskell v. Beers, 16 Ohio Dec. 368, in considering the sufficiency of a notice under a similar statute, the court said: 'It is not necessary that the notice contain the exact language of the statute. It is sufficient if the notice substantially complies with the requirements of the statute. But the notice must contain the following essentials, to wit: (1) It must be peremptory. It must "require" the (2) "Commencement of an action;" (3) "Forthwith;" (4) It must be unconditional, and (5) It must not be misleading, but should be easily understood. . . . The statute says "forthwith," and unless that term or some similar language, such as "at once" is used, to indicate that prompt action is demanded, or something in the notice shows it to be adversary, it is not sufficient.' The first sentence of the notice under consideration is not peremptory in tone but advisory only and relates to the bank's extension of credit generally to the 'Valley Paper Company' on the strength of appellant's endorsement. This sentence adds little if anything to the force or effect of the writing as a notice under the statute in question. The second sentence expresses a desire only that the bank enforce collection or consider appellant's endorsement, as canceled. This language indicates that the appellant labored under the mistaken idea that the bank might, at its option, on receipt of the notice either sue or cancel appellant's obligation as surety on such note, when, in fact, his release under statute could only result after the expiration of a reasonable time after the receipt of such notice within which the obligee might bring a suit, and as a result of the failure of the obligee without legal excuse to bring such suit within such time. . . . The language used indicates no demand or notice to bring suit forthwith, or at any time, but only a desire that collection be enforced or that appellant's endorsement be considered canceled. The notice in McMillin v. Deardoff, supra, reads: 'Jan. 31, 1896. Mr. —: Sue the note which I signed as surety for Rue, or I will not continue to be responsible as surety. A. B. McMillin.' This language is more emphatic than that in the notice under consideration. That case was decided in 1897, and has not been criticised or overruled and seems to be supported by the weight of authority in this and other jurisdictions." In Naylor v. Anderson (Tex.) 178 S. W. 620, it was said: "Articles 6329, 6330, Vernon's Sayles' Tex. Civ. Stat., provide that a surety by notice in writing may require the holder of a contract for the payment of money forthwith to file suit thereon, and a failure of such creditor to institute suit thereon, at the first terms of court convening thereafter, or at the second term, with a showing of good cause why suit was not filed at the first term, will discharge the surety. But the notice to the creditor contemplated by the statutes must be equivalent to an explicit and peremptory demand that suit be instituted forthwith. The letter which Anderson addressed to Homer Lee, as found by the court, did not constitute such notice."

In Benge v. Eversoll, 156 Ky. 131, 160 S. W. 911, it appeared that letters had been written by a surety to his principal, in which the surety suggested that the notes on which he was liable should be sent to some attorney for collection, as he could then, owing to his acquaintanceship with the debtor's affairs, consult with the attorney with respect to their collection, and that he was desirous of terminating his liability as surety before a certain date. One of the letters was misleading. The controlling statute (Kentucky Statutes, § 4668) read as follows: "A surety, co-obligor, or co-contractor, or one of several defendants to a judgment, may, by notice in writing served in person within the state on the creditor or plaintiff, or if the plaintiff be a nonresident or absent from the place of his residence for the period of thirty days consecutively, upon his agent or his attorney, require him to sue or issue execution, and if the creditor shall not sue to the next term thereafter at which he can obtain judgment, and in good faith prosecute the suit with reasonable diligence, such co-surety, co-obligor, co-contractor, or defendant, shall be discharged from all liability as such." It was held that the letters did not constitute sufficient notice to relieve the surety of his liability. The court said: "It is practically conceded in the argument, and we think it clear beyond question, that neither of the three letters written by Eversole constituted a sufficient notice under the statute to exonerate him as surety; and we do not think that his oral testimony as to the contents of the missing letter is any stronger, since he says he merely requested her to send the note to Rader, or some other attorney, for collection," and after reviewing the authorities as to the necessity of a command to sue in the notice, further stated: "It will be noticed, however, that in none of the letters in this record is there a peremptory direction to collect this note in that way. Each of the three letters is in answer to a letter from Miss Benge, and they are all merely advisory and solicitous, at most. And, in view of the fact that during this correspondence Eversole collected for himself more than four thousand dollars from Garrison, it is but natural that he should not have been so peremptory in his desire for Miss Benge to get her money as to require her to sue, since that might have interfered with his own arrangements. While it was competent for the plaintiff to introduce the three letters which she admitted she had received from Eversole, for the purpose of showing what notice had been given her, the court should have instructed the jury that they did not constitute a sufficient notice under the statute, and that the jury should disregard them in making their verdict." In National Bank of Commerce v. Gilvin (Tex.) 152 S. W. 652, the court, after holding that a statute (Revised Statutes, art. 3811) did not clothe a surety with power to require a creditor to proceed against the estate of an insane principal under guardianship at the hazard of discharging the surety by failing so to proceed, said: "We are of the opinion that if article 3811, Revised Statutes, can be applied to such case as this (and we think it has no application), the notice as shown by the evidence, as given by appellee to appellant, both in the guardianship and in the administration, was clearly insufficient to impose upon appellant any duty or action or active diligence, because such notice, in order to be effective, must be a full, explicit, and peremptory demand that suit be brought forthwith, with the further statement that the surety will not be bound any further if such is not done. The notice in question, after the administratrix had been appointed, was as follows: 'Amarillo, Texas, Nov. 17, 1908. Amarillo National Bank of Commerce, Mr. J. L. Smith, President, City. The note of J. T. McKinstry, on which I am surety, dated in December, 1906, for something over five hundred dollars. You will please file your claim with the probate court for payment. The estate of said J. T. McKinstry is now being represented in said court by Mrs. Ella E. McKinstry, as administratrix, and there is plenty of property or funds there to pay you. Please kindly see to this matter at once and oblige, Yours very truly, D. Gilvin.' The notice given during the pendency of the guardianship was similar and in substance like the above."

"Notice 'to collect' may be sufficient if the language used indicates that the collection must be made by suit if necessary. Stevens v. Chorn, 8 Ky. Opinions 680; Wier v. Dickers, 11 Ky. L. Rep. 523." Benge v. Eversole, 156 Ky. 131, 160 S. W. 911.

AS TO PERSONS TO BE SUED.

In W. P. Brown, etc. Lumber Co. v. Steele (Ala.) 70 So. 161, wherein it appeared that the payee of a note delivered it to a bank in escrow, to be delivered to the plaintiffs in part payment for land purchased of them, on their delivery of a satisfactory deed to the bank, it was held that the plaintiffs were not owners of the note in such a sense as entitled them to maintain a suit thereon, and that as the statutory notice should manifestly be given to the person who could sue at the time, it was properly given to the original payee. The court said: "A demand for suit on the note necessarily means against the makers of the note; and it was long since held that a notice to bring suit 'against the parties' to a note is a sufficient designation of the persons to be sued. . . . This meets the rule declared of Shehan v. Hampton, 8 Ala. 942, 946, that: 'When a statute requires an individual to be designated to another, there must be sufficient information given to enable the person to be ascertained with certainty.' Here there was but one note, and the payee knew who was the principal debtor, and who was the surety, and the exact nature of the demand could not be mistaken."

TAX LIEN COMPANY OF NEW YORK

v.

SCHULTZE ET AL.

New York Court of Appeals—November 10, 1914.

213 N. Y. 9; 106 N. E. 751.

Taxation — Valuation of Property — Effect of Easement.

When an easement is carved out of one property for the benefit of another, the market value of the servient estate is thereby lessened, and that of the dominant increased, practically by just the value of the easement, and the respective tenements should be assessed accordingly.

Easements — Extinguishment — Tax Sale.

The foreclosure of a tax lien and a sale of the premises pursuant to Greater New York Charter (Laws 1901, c. 466, §§ 1035-1039, as amended by Laws 1908, c. 490, and Laws 1911, c. 65) do not extinguish private easements of light, air, and access of adjoining owners over the land sold, which were excluded from an assessment on the land, since that would be a taking of property without due process of law.

[See note at end of this case.]

Taxes — Foreclosure — Necessary Parties.

In an action under Greater New York Charter (Laws 1901, c. 466, §§ 1035-1039, as amended by Laws 1908, c. 490, and Laws 1911, c. 65) to foreclose a tax lien, the owners of property adjoining the property described at the tax sale, including the easements over the property so described, are not necessary parties.

Res Judicata — Matters Concluded.

A judgment is conclusive between the parties and their privies upon all matters embraced within the issues in the action which were or might have been litigated therein, and it is immaterial whether issues are joined by an answer to the complaint or tendered by the plaintiff and left unanswered.

[See 15 Am. St. Rep. 142.]

Same.

Such rule applies as well to a judgment by default, when the facts stated warrant the relief sought, as to one rendered after contest.

Taxation — Tax Lien — Effect on Easement.

Prior easements of light, air, and access appurtenant to adjoining lands were not subject to a tax lien on the servient estate.

Res Judicata — Matters Concluded — Scope of Issues.

In an action Pursuant to Greater New York Charter (Laws 1901, c. 466, §§ 1035-1039, as amended by Laws 1908, c. 490, and Laws 1911, c. 65) to foreclose a tax lien, where the complaint alleged that owners of adjoining lands, not necessary parties defendant, but made parties defendant, had or might have, and the plaintiff believed that they had or might have, an interest in or claim upon the described premises by way of easement, etc., there is no issue as to whether such defendants had prior easements in the premises superior to the tax lien; and hence, as to such easements, they are not concluded by the judgment therein.

Taxation — Sale — Duty of Purchaser to Accept Encumbered Title.

Easements of light, air, and access in the premises sold on the foreclosure of a tax lien appurtenant to adjoining lands materially affected its value, and the purchaser was not bound to accept title thereto.

Tax Lien Co. v. Schultze, 161 N. Y. App. Div. 693, reversed.

Appeal from Appellate Division of Supreme Court, First Judicial Department.

Action to foreclose tax lien. Tax Lien Company of New York, plaintiff, and Catharine E. Schultze et al., defendants. Judgment rendered at Special Term of Supreme Court reversed by Appellate Division of Supreme Court. Wesley E. Barker appeals. REVERSED.

[10] The action was brought pursuant to sections 1035-1039 of the Greater New York charter (Laws of 1901, chapter 466, as amended by chapter 490 of the Laws of 1908 and chapter 65 of the Laws of 1911) to foreclose a tax lien upon premises described in the judgment as follows:

"Borough of the Bronx.

"New Description, Section 9.

"Block 2277, Lot 50.

"Location, East 132nd Street, between Willis Avenue and Brown place; assessed to unknown owner; on the land and tax map, City of New York, Borough of Bronx."

Upon the sale pursuant to the judgment the appellant Wesley E. Barker bid the sum of $5,000 therefor and the property was struck off to him. He signed the terms of sale and paid $500 on account thereof. He subsequently refused to complete his purchase for the alleged reason that the premises are affected by easements of light, air and access in favor of adjoining owners which are not cut off by the foreclosure of the tax lien, and which said liens were in no way referred to by the terms of sale. The plaintiff so far as appears from the record does not deny that there were easements of light, air and access in favor of adjoining owners, but alleges that all of the adjoining owners were made parties defendant in the action to foreclose the tax lien and that some of them appeared in the action and others defaulted after being duly served with process and that the judgment in the action provides "That each and all of the defendants in the action who have been served with a summons and all persons claiming under them or any of them after the filing of the notice of pendency of action be and they are hereby forever barred and foreclosed of all right, claim, lien, title, interest, easement and equity of redemption [11] in the premises affected by the said transfer of tax lien and each and every part thereof." The motions were made at the Special Term and were heard together, one by the plaintiff to compel the appellant Barker to complete his purchase, and one by the appellant Barker to be relieved from his purchase.

Edward Michling for appellant.

August Weymann for respondent.

CHASE, J.—When an easement is carved out of one property for the benefit of another the market value of the servient estate is thereby lessened, and that of the dominant increased practically by just the value of the easement; the respective tenements should therefore be assessed accordingly. (People v. Wells, 139 App. Div. 83, 87, 124 N. Y. S. 36, affirmed on opinion below, 200 N. Y. 518, 93 N. E. 1129, 1253. See Blenis v. Utica Knitting Co. 73 Misc. 61, 130 N. Y. S. 740, affirmed 149 App. Div. 936, 134 N. Y. S. 1126, affirmed 210 N. Y. 561, 104 N. E. 1127; Smith v. [12] New York, 68 N. Y. 552, 557; People v. Purdy, 143 App. Div. 389, 128 N. Y. S. 569; affirmed 202 N. Y. 550, 95 N. E. 1137; Matter of Hall, 116 App. Div. 729, 102 N. Y. S. 5, affirmed 189 N. Y. 552, 82 N. E. 1127.)

The assessment of the lot described in the judgment did not include the easements appurtenant to the adjoining real property. The assessment of the servient estate was subject to the easements included in the assessments of the dominant estate. As a necessary consequence it has been held that on the foreclosure of a tax lien and a sale of the premises pursuant to sections 1035-1039 of the Greater New York charter, private easements of light, air and access of adjoining owners over the land sold are not extinguished. If property rights which are excluded from an assessment are sold or extinguished by a tax sale, there would be a taking of property without due process of law. (Jackson v. Smith, 153 App. Div. 724, 138 N. Y. S. 654; affirmed on opinion below by decision handed down herewith, 213 N. Y. 630, 107 N. E. 1079.)

The owners of the property adjoining the property described at the tax sale including the easements over the property so described were not necessary parties to the action to foreclose the tax lien. They were made parties to the action and the question now arises whether the easements of those who made default in appearing in the action are cut off by the judgment taken against them by such default.

We are not in this case considering the propriety of making a person who claims in hostility to a tax lien a party defendant in an action to foreclose such lien. The question before the court is as to the effect of making a person claiming an interest superior to a tax lien a party in a case where the propriety of making such a person a party defendant is not in any way presented in the action.

It is a general rule that a judgment is conclusive between the parties and their privies upon all matters embraced within the issues in the action which were or might have been litigated therein. It is immaterial [13] whether issues are joined by an answer to the complaint or tendered by the plaintiff and left unanswered. The rule applies as well to a judgment by default when the facts stated warrant the relief sought as to one rendered after contest. (Goebel v. Iffla, 111 N. Y. 170, 18 N. E. 649.) Was the question whether the defendants had easements in the property described that are superior to the tax lien an issue in the action? The answer to the question should be determined from the judgment roll.

The judgment roll was referred to in the notices of motion, but it is not a part of the record. In one of the affidavits upon which the plaintiff's motion is founded it is stated that certain defendants were named as such to cut off possible easements or rights of way. The statement, we assume, is that of the affiant and not a quotation from the complaint.

It is in one of the affidavits stated that the complaint alleges "That all of the defendants have or may have and the plaintiff believes that such defendants have or may have an interest in or claim upon the real property hereinafter described by way of lien, mortgage, devise, dower right, purchase, easement, operation of law, inheritance from or marriage with any of the above named defendants or otherwise."

It is not disputed that the defendants were the owners of easements appurtenant to adjoining lands. Such easements were acquired prior to the tax lien and were not subject to it.

If a plaintiff in any foreclosure action chooses to make a person who claims that he holds a lien upon or interest in the property sought to be foreclosed that is prior and superior to the claim of the plaintiff, a party defendant, either for the purpose of determining the amount of the claim and paying it from the proceeds of sale or of having the same declared to be subject and subordinate to his lien, such claim should be clearly stated in the complaint.

When a plaintiff so clearly states his claim in a complaint [14] the defendant must appear in the action and present his claim by appropriate pleading or pleadings, and if necessary by proof or suffer the ordinary consequences of a default.

If the plaintiff's claim is not so clearly stated in the complaint, but some general allegations are used therein to the effect that a claim is made by the defendant "as subsequent purchaser or encumbrancer or otherwise," it will not bar the defendant of rights that are superior and paramount to that of the plaintiff if he default therein. (Lewis v. Smith, 9 N. Y. 502, 61 Am. Dec. 706; Merchants' Bank v. Thomson, 55 N. Y. 7; Emigrant Industrial Sav. Bank v. Goldman, 75

N. Y. 127; Goebel v. Iffla, supra; Nelson v. Brown, 144 N. Y. 384, 39 N. E. 355; Anderson v. McNeely, 120 App. Div. 676, 105 N. Y. S. 278; Fern v. Osterhout, 11 App. Div. 319, 42 N. Y. S. 450; Barker v. Burton, 67 Barb. (N. Y.) 458.)

Applying the rule stated to this case, it does not appear from the record that there was anything in the complaint to show the defendants that the plaintiff disputed or sought to bar their prior and superior easement of light, air and access over the property which it sought to sell in the action.

As the question of the defendants' having prior and superior easements to the tax lien was not tendered as an issue in the foreclosure action, the defendants are not bound by the judgment therein.

The easements over the real property bid off by the appellant at the foreclosure sale materially affected its value and he was not tendered a title to such real property that he was bound to accept.

The order of the Appellate Division should be reversed and that of the Special Term affirmed, with costs in both courts.

NOTE.

Sale of Land for Taxes as Extinguishing Private Easement.

The more prevalent rule seems to be that a sale of land for taxes does not extinguish a private easement to which the land is subject. Harris v. Curtis, 139 App. Div. 393, 124 N. Y. S. 263; Jackson v. Smith, 153 App. Div. 724, 138 N. Y. S. 654, affirmed 213 N. Y. 630, 107 N. E. 1079; Stansell v. American Radiator Co. 163 Mich. 528, 128 N. W. 789, 17 Detroit Leg. N. 970; Blenis v. Utica Knitting Co. 73 Misc. 61, 130 N. Y. S. 740, affirmed 149 App. Div. 936, 136 N. Y. S. 1126, affirmed 210 N. Y. 561, 104 N. E. 1127, motion for reargument denied, 210 N. Y. 614, 104 N. E. 1127; Essery v. Bell, 18 Ont. L. Rep. 76, 13 Ont. W. Rep. 396. And see the reported case.

"It would be an extraordinary state of the law if, by the sale of the servient lot, the title to the easement could be extinguished, and that without any notice to the person who uses it, or any opportunity given for him to exonerate the land by the payment of taxes, with right of resort in cases where he is not the proper person to pay." Essery v. Bell, supra. In Blenis v. Utica Knitting Co. supra, the court, in discussing the effect of a statute providing that the purchaser at a tax sale obtains an absolute title free from all incumbrances, said: "The statutes relating to tax sales in the county of Oneida, which provide that the purchaser at such sales obtains an absolute title free from all incumbrances, cannot, in my opinion, go further than to invest the purchaser with the title that the owner of the property had, free from liens by the way of incumbrances placed thereon. In other words, it cannot divest a party, situated as the plaintiff is here, from a property right, such as a servitude or easement lawfully acquired prior to the levying of the tax under which the sale was made; and this, especially, when he was not made a party to the proceeding. Indeed, to so divest him would, in my opinion, infringe his constitutional rights, in that it would deprive him of property rights without due process of law. . . . The claim that the tax deeds of both the conveyed and unconveyed lots in block 2, other than those of the plaintiff and defendant, destroyed the easement or servitude imposed upon them, I think cannot be maintained by authority. The purchasers at the tax sales, the county in the one case and Frank H. Clark in the other, could acquire no better title than their immediate grantors or Mathews had or could give; nor, indeed, could Mathews' assignee, by allowing the property to go to tax sale and by subsequent purchase by him, enlarge his title. All such purchasers took title burdened as the premises were; for, if they did not have actual notice of the situation (of which it must be said the assignee did have), they had constructive notice, as the recording acts clearly apply. . . . The prior deeds of Mathews and the map made by him and delivered to his assignee and on file prior to the time of the tax sales were all sufficient notice to purchasers of the servitude or easement in question. To say that the alleyway could thus be destroyed would be to say, with nearly equal propriety, that Mathews avenue to its center could also be destroyed, as conveyances of these lots carried the title to the center of the avenue." In Harris v. Curtis, 139 App. Div. 393, 124 N. Y. S. 263, it appeared that a right to draw water for the purpose of power was reserved in the conveyance of a mill property. It was held that the fact that the purchasers at a foreclosure sale of the mill property permitted the land to be sold for the nonpayment of taxes did not relieve the land of the easement or destroy the servitude which the original grantor had placed on it. In Essery v. Bell, 18 Ont. L. Rep. 76, 13 Ont. W. Rep. 395, it appeared that the purchaser of land subject to an easement and which was sold for taxes was the mortgagee of the land. The court, in holding that the sale did not extinguish the easement, said: "In this case . . . the purchaser appears to have been the mortgagee of the servient tenement, over whose soil the easement ran, and whose duty it was to pay the taxes. It would be a piece of strategy not to be encouraged if he let the taxes go into arrear and bought for the purpose of extinguishing the easement subject to which he acquired his mortgage." In Stensell v. American Radiator Co. 163 Mich. 528, 128 N. W. 789, 17 Detroit Leg. N. 970, it appeared that the owner of the servient land was also the owner of a part of the dominant lands. The servient land was sold for taxes and was bought in the name of a third person for the benefit of the owner who also secured a tax lease for ninety-nine years. It was held that the acquisition of the title through the tax sale and tax lease was a mere discharge of the owner's duty and did not destroy the easement of the other dominant owners.

In some jurisdictions the rule is followed that a valid sale of land for taxes extinguishes a private easement to which the land is subject on the ground that the purchaser at a tax sale is clothed with a new and complete title in the land. Hill v. Williams, 104 Md. 595, 65 Atl. 413; Hanson v. Carr, 66 Wash. 81, 118 Pac. 927. In the case first cited, it was said: "Assuming that the strip of ground 12 feet 6 inches wide which runs back from Pennsylvania avenue a depth of 87 feet to a four-foot alley in the rear of the three lots owned by Mrs. Hill under the Slingluff deed is an alleyway; can it be assessed for purposes of taxation? It is not a public street or alley. It was designed for the use of the occupants of the three lots conveyed by the Slingluff deed to Mrs. Hill, and the only interest or estate acquired by the grantee under that deed in that strip of ground was a right of way from Pennsylvania avenue to the four-foot alley in the rear of her three lots. As the fee-simple title remained in the Slingluff estate, the land was properly assessed to that estate. . . . The antecedent creation of a private easement in this strip of land could not, under any known legal principle, exempt it from taxation. It therefore continued to be taxable after the creation of the easement just as it had been before, and, if the taxes were not paid it was liable to be sold, even though by such a sale the easement would be destroyed, because the purchaser at a tax sale, when the proceedings were regular, is clothed with a new and complete title in the land, under an independent grant from the sovereign authority, which bars or extinguishes all titles and incumbrances of private persons, and all equities arising out of them." In Hanson v. Carr, 66 Wash. 81, 118 Pac. 927, it was said: "The tax lien is paramount to all other liens or claims. When foreclosure of such lien is made and real estate is sold thereunder, the fee passes to the purchaser, and all grants made by the owner of the fee must, of course, fall with the foreclosure. . . . This must be the rule. Otherwise the owner of real estate may grant an easement . . . and surrender possession of the real estate to such grantee, and, upon foreclosure of the tax lien by the state, the purchaser would acquire only the fee, subject to the easement . . . which would destroy the priority of the tax lien. . . . No doubt the defendants, prior to the foreclosure proceedings, might have had the land upon which their easement was located segregated, and a pro tanto reduction of the tax, under Rem. & Bal. Code, § 9258. Coolidge v. Pierce County, 28 Wash. 95, 68 Pac. 391. But having neglected that remedy, it is too late to say that the easement did not go with the land to the purchaser at the tax sale."

In Smith v. Griffin, 14 Colo. 429, 23 Pac. 905, it appeared that the owner of a tract of land subdivided it into lots and left an alleyway in the rear of the lots. No statutory dedication to the city for public purposes of this strip was made, and it was not conveyed by deed in the sale of the lots. It was held that a sale of the strip of land for taxes barred the right of the original owner to maintain a suit brought on the ground that the closing of the alley by the purchaser under the tax sale constituted a nuisance which he was entitled to have abated.

MELLIS, PIRIE AND COMPANY.

Minnesota Supreme Court—November 27, 1914.

127 Minn. 393; 149 N. W. 663.

Corporations — Proof of Value of Assets.

1. Where the assets of a corporation are shown to include various items of property, a witness should not give an opinion as to the aggregate value, until he has shown qualification to estimate the value of the several items.

[See Ann. Cas. 1915C 64, as to evidence of value of stock.]

Trover — Conversion of Corporate Stock — Measure of Damages.

While the par value of stock is presumptively the measure of damages for its conversion, if it appears that the corporation has been in existence but a short time, that there have been no sales of stock, and that the assets are depleted, an instruction that the damages are to be determined by the amount which a person wishing to buy the stock would expect to pay is not error.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from District Court, Hennepin county: WAITE, Judge.

Action for conversion of stock. Herbert Hawkins, plaintiff, and Mellis, Pirie and Company, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

H. W. Volk for appellant.

Edwin S. Slater for respondent.

[393] HOLT, J.—The action is against the corporation for the conversion of 220 shares of its capital stock, issued to plaintiff and fully paid for. The corporation denied the conversion and counterclaimed for [394] $1,000, the price of 100 additional shares issued to plaintiff but not paid for. The defendant recovered a verdict for $71.15. Plaintiff appeals from the order denying a new trial.

The verdict must be based upon the conclusion that defendant had converted 220 shares of the 320 belonging to plaintiff and also that he had not paid for the 100 shares not converted. The first proposition is of course in accord with plaintiff's contention and of the latter he does not complain. The errors assigned relate wholly to the ascertainment of the damages for the shares converted; and include a ruling touching the admissibility of evidence bearing upon value, an instruction to guide the jury in the determination thereof, and their estimate of the value or damages.

Only one ruling on the reception of evidence is questioned. Plaintiff, who had been the secretary of the corporation from its inception until about a month prior to the alleged conversion, when on the witness stand, was asked this question in regard to the assets: "Now, kindly state what was the value in dollars and cents as near as you can state, on November 22, 1910?" An objection that no foundation was laid was interposed and sustained. The court then reminded counsel that the witness would not be permitted to give a blanket value before he had first shown some qualification to testify as to the value of the various items composing the assets. Thereupon appellant's counsel said "I will excuse him from answering more at present, and try to get the matter in better shape." No further attempt was made to elicit estimates of the value of the assets from the witness. It is clear that no reversible error is found in the ruling of the court.

The substance of the part of the charge upon which error is predicated stated: That in case the conversion was proven the measure of the damages would be the actual value of the stock converted; that ordinarily that would be the measure, but it appeared that the stock had no market value since it was not listed, quoted or offered for sale; that evidence had been introduced tending to show the condition of the business of the company; that the par value of the stock was to be considered by the jury, but was not to be taken, as contended by plaintiff, to be the measure of recovery in the [395] absence of absolute proof by defendant that it was not worth that amount. The court then continued: "I am of the opinion that the par value of the stock is one of the things to be considered by you, and in doing so you should take into account the financial condition of the company, the nature of the business and all other things which will enable you to form an opinion as to the actual value of the stock. I am aware of the fact that when I say value of the stock I am using an ambiguous term, because we have to have some kind of yard stick to measure the value, as the ordinary standard does not apply in this case. I know of no better rule for you to adopt, if you get that far in the case, than to ascertain and determine from the evidence what a person who wanted to buy stock in this corporation would reasonably expect to pay for this block of 220 shares." There were no instructions requested, and no corrections or modifications asked when the case was submitted to the jury. As the evidence stood we believe the substance of the charge pertinent and proper. It is true that the par value of the shares of corporate stock may be taken as the actual value in the absence of other evidence bearing on the question. Thompson, Corporations, § 3496; Harris's Appeal (Pa.) 12 Atl. 743; Brinkerhoff-Farris Trust, etc. Co. v. Home Lumber Co. 118 Mo. 447, 24 S. W. 129; Moffitt v. Hereford, 132 Mo. 513, 34 S. W. 252. In the case at bar it was shown that after the corporation had been in operation a little over a year its original capital of $10,000 had dwindled to $6,846.69 in book assets. This is adequate reason for saying that the par value was not presumptively the actual value of the stock. In Uncle Sam Oil Co. v. Forrester, 79 Kan. 611, 100 Pac. 512, it was held that, where in an action for conversion the complaint alleged the value to be less than par, the introduction of the share certificate of stock showing its par value, was not sufficient evidence to permit a recovery for the damages alleged. The rule given by the court that the jury was "to ascertain and determine from the evidence what a person who wanted to buy stock in this corporation would reasonably expect to pay for this block of 220 shares," may not have furnished a great deal of assistance. But in view of the evidence we are not prepared to say it was misleading. When stock in a corporation [396] has not figured in the markets, and there have been no sales or dealings therein, its actual value must be determined at the fair price which a person who desires to buy would be willing to pay, taking into consideration the original capital, how far there has been profit or loss in the business carried on, the assets and liabilities, the future prospects, and everything that goes to affect the value of the shares of stock. It is also claimed that the verdict is perverse, or demonstrably wrong. The record is very meager as to the nature of the business undertaken by this corporation. It would seem, however, that three or four men formed the corporation presumably to examine, audit or open books of account. They agreed upon the salary each was to draw. Some real estate was held, but whether this was in part payment for stock or a side issue in the business does not appear; also furniture and fittings were acquired; and some loans made or credits given. There is no evidence as to the actual value of these items, save the value as carried on the corporation books on March 31, 1911, at which time there was cash on hand or in bank of $5,327.57. The books also show that during less than a year while plaintiff was connected with defendant, there was an impairment of the capital of more than $2,000 and, as stated above, five months later an impairment of more than $3,000. No dividend was ever declared, but the salaries of the officers were speedily depleting the capital. We have looked in vain for any earnings from the business carried on. Under these circumstances we are not prepared to hold that the verdict of the jury, fixing the value of the 220 shares of stock converted at $71 less than the price plaintiff agreed to pay for the 100 shares, is not fairly supported by the evidence.

Order affirmed.

NOTE.

Measure of Damages for Conversion of Shares of Stock.

The measure damages for the conversion of shares of stock is the fair value of the stock at the time of the conversion. Goodall v. Clarke, 21 Ont. L. R. 614, 18 Ann. Cas. 608 (appeals dismissed 23 Ont. L. Rep. 57, 18 Ont. W. Rep. 185, and 44 Can. Supp. Ct. 284). The reported case holds that the value of corporate stock for the purpose of awarding damages for its conversion, where it has no market value, must be determined by considering the fair price at which a purchaser would buy the stock in view of the original capital of the company, its assets and liabilities, its profit and loss account, its future prospects, and all other factors which tend to affect the value of the shares. The recent case of Hetrick v. Smith, 67 Wash. 664, 122 Pac. 363, supports, to a certain extent, the doctrine of the reported case. It appeared therein that a trustee had wrongfully converted to his own use the stock of a company as well as its business, goods, fixtures and earnings. In an action by the beneficiary, who was also the manager of the company, for converting the stock it was held that as the shares had no market value their value for the purpose of assessing damages should be ascertained by showing the value of the property and business of the corporation at the date of the conversion and deducting therefrom its liabilities at that time. It was further held in that case, that as the trustee had notified the beneficiary not to collect the accounts receivable they should be figured at their face value, and that an inventory of the merchandise on hand made by two witnesses at a time near the date of the conversion should be accepted to establish its value where the cestui que trust herself offered no evidence as to its worth. In Central Trust Co. v. West India Imp. Co. 144 App. Div. 560, 129 N. Y. S. 730, it appeared that securities consisting of corporate stocks and bonds which had no market value had been sold at auction by a trust company with which they had been pledged. In an action for their value by a person who proved his prior equitable right to the securities, the court said: "Under those circumstances, the court will seek, by such evidence as is available, to ascertain, as nearly as possible the amount of damages which plaintiff has suffered, and will not halt 'because the situation is novel, and the ordinary methods proving values are not available, but will resort to some practical means that will be just to both parties.' . . . On March 1, 1898, the defendant Trust Company undertook to deal with the securities pledged to it, all of which were covered by plaintiff's prior mortgage, by selling them at auction for the sum of two hundred thousand dollars, thereby substituting that sum for the securities themselves. This sum must be taken as representing the value of the securities on the day of the sale, and the defendant surely can have no just cause of complaint if it be now held chargeable with the price received for the securities at a sale conducted by its order, at a time selected by itself. It is of no moment that the securities were sold in a single lot so that it cannot be determined how much was bid for the stock, how much for the second mortgage bonds, and how much for the chance of procuring first mortgage bonds. All of these securities were subject to plaintiff's prior lien, and the manner of their sale was of defendant's own choosing. Nor does it affect the price bid as an evidence of value that the securities were bid in by McDonald, who was liable upon the notes intended to be secured by the pledge of the securities to defendant Trust Company, or that notes were turned in, instead of cash, for a portion of the purchase price. All this was with defendant's assent, which by so assenting applied to the payment of the notes the securities which it had been warned were claimed by plaintiff. The case is precisely the same as if the defendant Trust Company had sold the securities for cash and had turned that cash over to the holders of the notes. As the plaintiff had the right at all times to possession of the securities, that right at once attached to the proceeds, when the defendant Trust Company had consummated the conversion of the securities by selling them. It then became a trustee's debt for the benefit of plaintiff, if the latter ultimately succeeded, as it has done, in establishing its preferential right to the securities. From that moment the plaintiff became entitled, at the very least, to the price realized. Upon the undisputed evidence in the case, therefore, it becomes possible to estimate the plaintiff's damages at the sum of two hundred thousand dollars, with interest from March 1, 1898."

It has been held that the measure of damages for the conversion of shares of stock is the market value on the day of the conversion, that is, the time when the owner, being entitled to the immediate possession of the stock, demands it and his demand is refused. Grimes v. Barndollar, 58 Colo. 421, 148 Pac. 256; Burns v. Shoemaker, 172 Ill. App. 290; Robinson Min. Co. v. Riepe, 37 Nev. 27, 138 Pac. 910. See also Hetrick v. Smith, 67 Wash. 664, 122 Pac. 363. Under this rule the owner of the shares is entitled to an additional amount equal to any dividends paid on the converted stocks up to the date of his demand for them. Grimes v. Barndollar, 58 Colo. 421, 148 Pac. 256. And he is also entitled to interest on the entire amount from the date of the conversion to the time of the verdict. Grimes v. Barndollar, 58 Colo. 421, 148 Pac. 256; Burns v. Shoemaker, 172 Ill. App. 290; Robinson Min. Co. v. Riepe, 37 Nev. 27, 138 Pac. 910.

Where corporate stocks have been converted by a malicious wrongdoer the owner may recover an amount equal to the highest prices reached by the stocks to the time of trial, provided it appears that the owner has brought his action promptly after the conversion and that he has pressed the suit with reasonable celerity, and also that the stocks made their top prices during the time when the action was being so pressed. Kavanaugh v. McIntyre, 74 Misc. 222, 133 N. Y.

S. 879, judgment affirmed 151 App. Div. 910, 135 N. Y. S. 1120. In that case it was also held that, under such circumstances, the owner was not entitled to interest.

In California the measure of damages for the conversion of shares of stock is regulated by statute which declares as follows: "The detriment caused by the wrongful conversion of personal property is presumed to be: First. The value of the property at the time of the conversion, with the interest from that time, or, where the action has been prosecuted with reasonable diligence, the highest market value of the property at any time between the conversion and the verdict, without interest, at the option of the injured party." See Myers v. Chittyna Exploration Co. 20 Cal. App. 418, 129 Pac. 469; Potts v. Paxton (Cal.) 153 Pac. 957.

In Shewalter v. Wood (Mo.) 183 S. W. 1127, it was held that where the certificate of a share of stock which was alleged to have been converted was not indorsed, and there was no proof that the owner thereof had lost the share which it represented and had not therefore been deprived of his status as a shareholder, he should recover nothing beyond what it would cost him to procure a substituted certificate. In that case it was said obiter that where shares of stock have been converted the measure of damages, in the absence of proof to the contrary, is the face value of the stock. The same statement is made in the reported case.

v.

HARTSFIELD.

Arkansas Supreme Court—June 1, 1914.

113 Ark. 253; 168 S. W. 140.

Public Officers — Vacancy — Death before Commencement of Term.

Where an officer elected to succeed himself dies before the commencement of his second term, a vacancy is thereby created for the first term, but not in the second term, and one duly appointed and qualified to fill the vacancy in the first term holds during the unexpired term of the deceased officer and until his successor has been elected or appointed and qualified as provided by law.

[See 17 Ann. Cas. 86.]

"Otherwise" — Meaning of Term.

Under Sp. Laws 1911, p. 1026, providing that, when any vacancy in the office of road overseer shall occur from any cause whatever or upon failure to elect by a tie vote or otherwise, the county court or judge thereof in vacation shall appoint an overseer for such district or to fill such vacancy, where a road overseer elected to succeed himself died before the commencement of his second term, the county judge, upon his failure to qualify for the second term, had power to appoint an overseer, since the phrase "or otherwise" should be given its broadest and most comprehensive meaning, "in a different manner, in any other way," it being the intention of the legislature to authorize the county judge to appoint where there is no election or where the person elected for any reason fails to qualify.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Sebastian county, Greenwood District: Hox, Judge.

Action to try title to office. Virgil Townsley, plaintiff, and W. A. Hartsfield, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. AFFIRMED.

[253] At the general election in 1910, Frank Irvin was elected road overseer of Center Township in the Greenwood District of Sebastian County, Arkansas. The statute provides that his term of office shall be the same as that for township and county officers. See Act No. 177, Acts 1905, approved April 18, 1905. Irvin entered upon the discharge of his duties as such road overseer, and continued in said office until his death, some time in October, 1912. At the general election held in 1912, he was again elected to the office of road overseer. He died before his first term expired, and on the 29th day of October, 1912, the county judge of Sebastian County appointed Virgil Townsley to fill the vacancy caused by his death. In November, 1912, a new county judge having come into office, W. A. Hartsfield was appointed road overseer for said township; and the latter qualified and entered upon the discharge of the duties of said office. This is a proceeding by Virgil Townsley against W. A. Hartsfield to [254] try the title to said office. The decision of the lower court was in favor of Hartsfield, and Townsley has appealed.

Jesse A. Harp for appellant.
Pryor & Miles for appellee.

[255] HART, J. (after stating the facts).—

It will be noted from the statement of facts that Irvin died while he was serving his first term, and before his new term had commenced. The general rule is that if the deceased was himself the incumbent of the office and was elected to succeed himself, a vacancy is created in the first term by his death; but, by the weight of authority, at the commencement of the second term, no new vacancy arises, and the appointee for the balance of the first term holds over until the election and qualification of his successor. State v. Speidel, 62 Ohio St. 156, 56 N. E. 871; State v. Elliott, 13 Utah 471, 45 Pac. 346. See, also, People v. Lord, 9 Mich. 227. That is to say, when one who is holding an office, and who has been elected to succeed himself, dies before entering upon the new term, a vacancy is thereby created in the term in which he was serving, but not in the new term for which he has been elected, and upon which he has not entered. Therefore, the one who is duly appointed and qualified to fill the vacancy thus created will hold the office for and during the unexpired term of the predecessor and until his successor has been elected or appointed and qualified in the manner provided by law.

It is not disputed by counsel for Hartsfield that Townsley's appointment was valid, but it is claimed that his term ended when Hartsfield was appointed in November, pursuant to the act of 1911, which provides for the filling of vacancies that may occur in the office of road overseer, and which, so far as relates to the question at issue in this appeal, is as follows:

"That when any vacancy in the office of road overseer shall occur from any cause whatever, or upon failure to elect by a tie vote or otherwise, the county court or judge thereof in vacation shall appoint an overseer for such district or fill such vacancy, as the case may be, whose term of service shall expire at the time designated for all county and township offices to expire. Such judge [256] shall make or cause to be made a true record of appointment."

The office of road overseer was created by statute, and it may be filled by election or by appointment, just as the statute may prescribe. It is manifest from the clause of the act just quoted that when Irvin died, the vacancy caused by his death should be filled by the county court. The section likewise provides that upon the failure to elect by a tie vote or otherwise, the county court, or judge thereof in vacation, shall appoint, etc. The words "or otherwise," in law, when used as a general phrase following an enumeration of particulars, are commonly interpreted in a restricted sense as referring to such other matters as are kindred to the classes before mentioned. Century Dictionary. The author says the phrase "or otherwise," when following an enumeration, should receive an ejusdem generis interpretation. Otherwise is also defined by Century Dictionary, the Standard Dictionary and by Webster, as meaning, "In a different manner; in any other way." We think the phrase "or otherwise" in the act under consideration was intended to be used in its broadest and most comprehensive sense. The phrase "or otherwise" is not used in the statute as a general phrase following an enumeration of particulars; but it follows the words "upon failure to elect by tie vote," and is placed in juxtaposition to these words. When the whole clause "upon failure to elect by tie vote or otherwise," is considered together with reference to the purpose and object of the act, it is evident that the Legislature intended to give the county judge the power to appoint where no one was elected or where the person elected failed for any reason to qualify when the time for entering upon the new term arrived. In short, we think the Legislature meant by the clause under consideration to give the county judge the power to appoint where there was no election or where the person elected for any reason failed to qualify. The county judge, pursuant to this section, exercised his power to appoint, and when he did so, the person appointed had a right to the office, and [257] having qualified and entered upon the discharge of the duties of the office of road overseer, he was the lawful incumbent of that office. It follows that the judgment of the lower court must be affirmed.

NOTE.

Legal Meaning of "Otherwise."

Generally, 644.

With Other Words:

Limitation to Things Ejusdem Generis.
645.

Construction According to Intent, 649.

Generally.

"Otherwise" is always a relative word, meaning, in general, different from that to which it relates. Black v. Delaware, etc. Canal Co. 22 N. J. Eq. 400; People v. Feitner, 71 App. Div. 479, 75 N. Y. S. 738; Philadelphia v. Fidelity, etc. Co. of Maryland, 46 Pa. Super. Ct. 313. In the case first cited it appeared that by an act of the legislature the United Railroad and Canal Companies of New Jersey were authorized "to consolidate their respective capital stocks; or to consolidate with any other railroad or canal company or companies, in this state or otherwise, with which they are or may be identified in interest, or whose works shall form with their own connected or continuous lines; or to make such other arrangements for connection or consolidation of business with any such company or companies, by agreement, contract, lease, or otherwise, as to the directors of said United Companies shall seem expedient." It was contended that the act did not authorize the consolidation or connection of business with any railroad of another state. The court said: "The question depends upon the meaning and effect of the word otherwise." "This is certainly an inapt word to designate companies out of the state, by being placed in opposition to the words 'in this state.' It is inapt, because its proper use is to express difference of means or manner, and not of place. The word is used here in a way that admits of no change of place in the sentence, even if such change can ever be permitted. 'Companies in this state' are one subject of the provision; the word 'or' plainly denotes that some subject is to be indicated. If the word elsewhere or otherwise had been used, it would have appropriately expressed the meaning intended.

It means companies different from or other than companies in this state." In Thompson v. Highland Park, 187 Ill. 265, 58 N. E. 328, the court said: "'Otherwise' is defined by the Standard Dictionary as meaning 'in a different manner;' 'in another way;' 'differently;' 'in other respects.' By Webster, 'in a different manner;' 'in different respects;' and by the Century Dictionary, 'in a different manner or way;' 'differently;' 'in other respects.'"

In People v. Greenwall, 115 N. Y. 520, 22 N. E. 180, it was held that the word "otherwise" was not used in the sense of "another." That case involved the construction of a statute providing that the killing of a human being "without design to effect death, by a person engaged in the commission of or in an attempt to commit a felony, either upon or affecting the person killed or otherwise," was murder in the first degree. It was contended that the words "or otherwise" meant "or another" and that murder in the first degree was not charged by an indictment alleging that the defendant killed the deceased "while engaged in the commission of or attempt to commit a felony either upon or affecting him or some other person." The court said: "We think it is entirely clear that it was intended to make the killing of any human being, while engaged in the commission of any felony, murder in the first degree, whether the felony was committed upon or affected any person or concerned property only." See also People v. Miles, 143 N. Y. 383, 38 N. E. 456. In Galveston County v. Gorham, 49 Tex. 279, it was held that the word "otherwise" meant "by like means." In that case an occupation tax law was discussed and the court said that a traveling agent or drummer was within a provision relating to persons who sold goods by sample, card, "or otherwise." See also Fleming v. Rome, 130 Ga. 383, 61 S. E. 5. In Contra Costa Water Co. v. Breed, 139

Cal. 432, 73 Pac. 189, the court construed an article of the state constitution imposing on a municipality the duty to establish the rates to be charged for water, and declaring that "any person or company collecting water rates 'otherwise than as so established' shall forfeit its franchises and water-works." The court said that the language of the provision was "obviously susceptible of the construction that it refers to a case where the rates had been established by the governing body, and that the word 'otherwise' is to be given one of its usual meanings,—namely, 'contrarily,'—in violation of the established rates." See also Lynch v. Murphy, 110 Mo. 163, 24 S. W. 774. But in King v. De Coursey, 8 Colo. 463, 9 Pac. 31, the court said: "The form of the answer, that defendant was not indebted to the plaintiff as alleged in the complaint, 'or otherwise,' must be considered as a denial that the defendant was in any manner indebted to the plaintiff on account of the subject-matter of the complaint, whether in the precise form as stated or not." In Territory v. Albright, 12 N. M. 293, 78 Pac. 204, it was said: "We do not hesitate to say that wherever the word otherwise is used, following specific terms, that no authority can be found that will give it its broad significance when used by itself, but that they restrict it to the meaning of the specific words and terms preceding it." And in Bosworth v. Smith, 9 R. I. 67, the court said: "Indeed, . . . we deem it doubtful if the phrase, 'whether barred by the statute of limitations or otherwise,' covers anything except the statute of limitations. The phrase may mean, as in the discussion of the case it has been considered to mean, whether barred by the statute of limitations or barred otherwise, and it may mean whether barred or otherwise, (that is, whether barred or not barred) by the statute of limitations. If the phrase had been 'whether outlawed or otherwise,' it would have been taken to mean whether outlawed or not outlawed."

Wisconsin.—McCaffrey v. Shields, 54 Wis. 645, 12 N. W. 54; State v. Wood County, 72 Wis. 637, 40 N. W. 381.

In Com. v. Rice, 9 Metc. (Mass.) 253, it was held that a by-law of a city relating to the vending of farm articles "with cart, wagon, sleigh or otherwise," included a box. The court said: "The purpose of the by-law was, to prohibit the use of a part of the market as a stand for the sale of provisions, with a receptacle capable of holding and displaying such provisions. Cart, wagon and sleigh, are specified, but it is cart, wagon or sleigh, with the horse removed, and used only for the time being as such receptacle. We believe that the species of sleigh commonly used for carrying provisions to market is usually called a lumber-box. Now the point of likeness to be regarded is, not the capacity of being moved by a horse, but the capacity of being used to hold and display provisions for sale. A box, therefore, of suitable dimensions to hold and display provisions for sale, is an article ejusdem generis within the clause of the by-law. The same rule, we think, would apply to a bench, stall or table, used for the like purpose." See to the same effect U. S. v. Sheldon, 2 Wheat. 119, 4 U. S. (L. ed.) 199.

In Rawlinson v. Wells, 13 Can. L. T. 120, an order was made by consent consolidating two actions and referring all matters in question to arbitration. It contained a provision that if a party disputed the correctness or validity of the award "by reason of evidence improperly received or rejected or otherwise," he might appeal. The defendant served notice of appeal after the award specifying grounds which did not refer to the reception or rejection of evidence or to the evidence at all. The court said: "But the word 'otherwise' in the clause of the order defining the right of appeal was to be given an ejusdem generis interpretation, as meaning 'by reason of any other improper evidence,' and, therefore, the appeal as framed in the notice could not be entertained."

In Nesbitt v. Drew, 17 Ala. 379, wherein it appeared that a contract for the hiring of slaves provided that the owner should deduct for time lost "by sickness or otherwise" the court said: "We must . . . understand by the term 'otherwise' in this contract, time lost by the death of the slaves, or by their disability to render service arising from any cause unmixed with the fault of the parties to the contract."

In State v. Fuller, 40 N. J. L. 330, the court said: "In construing the words, 'for the purposes of their road, or otherwise,' in that clause, reference must be had to the object and purpose of the act, and to the artificial character and limited capacity of the persons to be affected by it. In contemplation of the legislature, the property to be occupied, used or owned by these persons for the purposes of the road or otherwise, is only such as may be necessary or convenient for their legitimate purposes, to accomplish the end which the legislature had in view at the time of the enactment of the charter."

Under an act for the protection of the owners of bottles whose name, mark or device was "branded, stamped, engraved, etched, blown, impressed or otherwise produced" on them, it has been held that a conviction of a violation of the act by using a lithographic label of another who was engaged in the bottling business could not stand, as a label was not a cut or stamp on the bottle and did not come within the expression "or otherwise produced." People v. Elfenbein, 85 Hun 434, 20 N. Y. S. 384.

It has been held that a provision in an accident policy that "this insurance does not cover injuries resulting from poison or anything accidentally or otherwise taken, administered, absorbed, or inhaled," did not relieve the company from liability where death was caused by the accidental inhalation of illuminating gas while the insured was asleep. Lowenstein v. Fidelity, etc. Co. of New York, 88 Fed. 474. The court said that "the addition of the words 'or otherwise' cannot by any technical or natural construction qualify the act of inhaling. 'Or otherwise,' in law, when used as a general phrase following an enumeration of particulars, is commonly interpreted in a restricted sense, as referring to such other matters as are kindred to the clause before mentioned." . . . It is to be read in connection with the preceding word, 'accidental,' and means an injury of a kindred character, and would cover an intentional taking as well as an accidental taking."

In Riley v. Hartford L. etc. Ins. Co. 25 Fed. 315, it was held that a life insurance policy with a provision that it would be void if the insured died by "self destruction, felonious or otherwise" included all cases of voluntary self destruction, whether the insured was sane or not. See also Penfold v. Universal L. Ins. Co. 85 N. Y. 317, 38 Am. Rep. 660.

A rule of a fire insurance company rendering void a policy in case of alienation "by sale or otherwise" is not applicable to a conveyance by way of mortgage while possession remains in the mortgagor and no entry for foreclosure has been made. Jackson v. Massachusetts Mut. F. Ins. Co. 23 Pick. (Mass.) 418, 34 Am. Dec. 69. In Roberts v. Jackson, 4 Yerg. (Tenn.) 308, under an act providing that "real estate actually purchased or otherwise acquired, by any intestate, are to descend to the father, if living, but if dead, then to the mother of such intestate and her heirs," the court held that the words "otherwise acquired" did not include lands descended from either parent. See to the same effect Hoover v. Gregory, 10 Yerg. (Tenn.) 451; Towls v. Rains, 2 Heisk. (Tenn.) 357.

Construing a statute providing that "if any person shall, by the exhibition of any false sample, or by means of any false representation or device or by collusion with any officer of the revenue, or otherwise," knowingly effect an entry of goods, etc., at less than the true weight, etc., such person shall be fined, etc., the court said in U. S. v. Bettilini, 1 Woods 654, 24 Fed. Cas. No. 14,587: "The words, 'or otherwise,' must be interpreted to mean, or by any other fraudulent means whatsoever, or they mean nothing and are mere surplusage."

In Wallace v. Jones, 83 App. Div. 152, 82 N. Y. S. 449, the court said: "If Mr. Jones presented his own fraudulent or illegal bills, that does not establish that an audit thereof by the board of which he was a member was 'by collusion or otherwise.' The word 'otherwise,' as used in the statute, 'by collusion or otherwise, contracting,' etc., is to be interpreted by the rule of ejusdem generis. . . . It does not mean any audit, but an audit due to some sinister or improper motive and in violation of the public trust." See to the same effect Foeller v. Voight, 5 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 349, 5 Am. L. Rec. 1.

In Smith v. Minneapolis Library Board, 58 Minn. 108, 59 N. W. 979, the court said that the right of a Library Board to take personal property in some other way than by gift, grant, purchase, devise, or bequest "is evident from the words 'or otherwise,' which are added to those mentioned."

In Loring v. Proctor, 26 Me. 18, the court said of a disposition of a cause "by nonsuit default or otherwise," that the word otherwise "must necessarily have reference to a disposition of the cause equivalent to what would be effected by a nonsuit or default."

In Myers v. Seaberger, 45 Ohio St. 232, 12 N. E. 796, it appeared that a statute provided as follows: "Every person of full age and sound mind is required to list for taxation "all moneys invested, loaned, or otherwise, controlled by him, as agent or attorney, or on account of any other person or persons." The court said: "The phrase 'or otherwise controlled by him,' must be construed to mean, in a manner similar to the loaning and investing of money."

In a case wherein the issue was as to the interpretation of the words "arising otherwise" in a statute providing for the certifying of the name of a candidate, to be placed on a ballot, by a campaign committee in case of a vacancy, the court said: "We construe this language by applying the general rule that, where there are general words following particular and specific words, the former must be confined to things of the same nature and kind as the latter. In other words, applying the doctrine of eiusdem generis, the expression . . . refers only to vacancies of a like nature to those which may occur through the death; removal, or resignation of a candidate,—such, for illustration, as insanity, conviction of a felony, etc." State v. Scott, 87 Minn. 313, 91 N. W. 1101.

In McCaffrey v. Shields, 54 Wis. 645, 12 N. W. 54, it was held that a statute providing for the care of a nonresident pauper, who should be "taken sick, lame, or otherwise disabled," meant bodily or mental disability to procure a livelihood. In Forrester v. Butte, etc. Consol. Copper, etc. Min. Co. 21 Mont. 544, 55 Pac. 229, 353, it was held that a provision of the compiled statutes that officers of a mining corporation "shall not have power to sell, lease, mortgage or otherwise dispose of the whole or any part of the mining ground, quartz mills, smelters, concentrators or reduction works of such corporation, unless they shall have first called a meeting of the stockholders of such corporation in the manner prescribed in section 468 of said article . . . for the purpose of submitting to the stockholders of such corporation the proposition so to sell, lease or mortgage or otherwise dispose of the property of such corporation or some portion thereof," operated as a restriction of corporate power and did not authorize two-thirds of the stockholders of a prosperous corporation to sell all of its property if any other stockholder protested. See also Conley v. State, 85 Ga. 348, 11 S. E. 659.

In a case wherein it appeared that Congress granted to the state for the use of schools the sixteenth section of every township in the state which had not been sold "or otherwise disposed of," It was held that an imperfect title which had been rejected by the board of commissioners did not come within the expression "otherwise disposed of." Ham v. Missouri, 18 How. 126, 15 U. S. (L. ed.) 334, wherein the court said: "The language and plain import of the 6th section of the act of the 3d of March, 1820, confer a clear and positive and unconditional donation of the sixteenth section in every township; and, when these have been sold or otherwise disposed of, other and equivalent lands are granted. Sale, necessarily signifying a legal sale by a competent authority, is a disposition, final and irrevocable, of the land. The phrase 'or otherwise disposed of' must signify some disposition of the property equally efficient, and equally incompatible with any right in the state, present or potential, as deducible from the act of 1820, and the ordinance of the same year." See also Roberson v. State, 100 Ala. 37, 14 So. 554; People v. State Land Office Com'r, 23 Mich. 270; Robberson v. State, 3 Tex. App. 502.

In Crusoe v. Bugby, W. Bl. (Eng.) 766, 3 Wis. C. Pl. 234, the court said that "otherwise do or put away" signified any other mode of getting rid of the premises entirely and could not be confined to the making of an underlease.

In Chesapeake, etc. R. Co. v. Hanmer (Ky.) 66 S. W. 375, it appeared that the appellee was injured when a passenger on a train which fell through a trestle. It was alleged that he was "thereby severely injured, cut and bruised upon his body, arms, and legs, two of his ribs were broken, and he was otherwise greatly hurt and wounded." Approving the action of the lower court in overruling the appellant's motion to make the petition more specific as to how he was "otherwise hurt" the court said: "The words 'and otherwise greatly hurt and wounded,' when coupled with such specific allegations, may be treated as surplusage, and consequently ignored."

In a case wherein it appeared that an owner under a contract took all risks of loss, etc., "in loading, unloading, conveyance, and otherwise" it was held that the railroad company was not exempted from a loss when the bottom of the carriage gave way. Hawkins v. Great Western R. Co. 17 Mich. 57, 97 Am. Dec. 179. Wherein the court said: "While there is in one clause of the contract an exception of every default, the fair inference is, that this language was used as referring to defaults in the particulars specified in the previous articles, viz.: 'Loading, unloading, conveyance, and otherwise,' and in matters of a like kind. The rule is usually applicable, that where no intention to the contrary appears, general words used after specific terms are to be confined to things eiusdem generis with the things previously specified."

In Lewis v. Smith, 9 N. Y. 502, 61 Am. Dec. 706, it appeared that a husband gave a mortgage in which his wife was not made a party.

It was held that a decree of foreclosure, in an action instituted after his death in which the widow was a defendant, as having an interest in the property "as subsequent purchasers or incumbrancers, or otherwise" did not bar her right of dower. The court said: "The word otherwise, according to the rule of construction adopted in all analogous cases, means in some other like capacity, and does not embrace a claim like that which is set up in this case."

In People v. Feitner, 71 App. Div. 479, 75 N. Y. S. 738, the court held that the phrase "or otherwise" should receive an ejusdem generis interpretation. Jenks, J., said: "Section 1, . . . relates to the original assessment and provides for the discharge thereof by partial payment, and as to such act, when done, it provides: 'No further proceedings shall ever be had to levy or collect any sum on account of the expense of such improvement against such property by instalment or otherwise.' . . . I think . . . that we appreciate this expression if we read therein the legislative intent that so far as any assessment existed against such property by virtue of the assessment proceedings of 1891, and the subsequent statutes applicable thereto, provided the owner took advantage of the reduction of such assessment and paid in her one-third, such payment canceled such assessment, and that it could not be collected either in instalments, . . . or in any other manner. The collection by instalments plainly refers to the original assessment, to which alone this section relates, and the additional words 'or otherwise' are to be limited as relating to such assessment."

In State v. West, 106 La. 274, 30 So. 848, it was held that an attempt to rob by violently snatching away property from the hands of another, was included within a statute which read as follows: "Whoever shall be found guilty of attempting to rob, from the person of another, money or other property by cutting or tearing the clothes, thrusting the hand into the pockets, or otherwise, though he do not succeed in such attempted robbery, shall, on conviction, be 'punished as set forth in the statute.'" The court said: "The manner of the attempt was as wrongful and as much against common right as if he had made the attempt by cutting or tearing the clothes or thrusting the hand in the pocket of the one he was attempting to rob, using the words of the statute. The 'snatching' is denounced as having been forcible and violent. The law is directed against the taking of property from the person of another against the person's will. The intent of the word 'otherwise' as used evidently was to include all similar acts to those denounced, resorted to in the attempt to 'rob.'" It has been held that an omnibus conductor was not within the purview of a statute enumerating certain classes of persons as follows: "Laborer, servant in husbandry, journeyman, artificer, handicraftsman, miner, or otherwise engaged in manual labor." Morgan v. London General Omnibus Co. 13 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 832, 53 L. J. Q. B. 352. See to the same effect Cook v. North Metropolitan Tramways Co. 18 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 684.

CONSTRUCTION ACCORDING TO INTENT.

Where the intent so requires, the word "otherwise" may be construed without reference to the ejusdem generis rule, and may be given such a scope as the context seems to require.

In Meagher v. Meagher, 34 Ont. Rep. 33, 22 Dominion L. Rep. 733, 8 O. W. N. 357, it appeared that a clause in a will stated that the trust was "to hold . . . for my said daughters Mary Ann Meagher and Margaret Ellen Meagher for themselves and to make such disposition thereof from time to time among my children or otherwise as my said daughters decide to make, they my said daughters in the meantime to have all the rents and profits therefrom." The court said: "If the clause had ended with the names of the daughters, it would of course be clear that they took the whole beneficial interest in the property, and the words which follow may mean either that the two daughters, individually and not as trustees, are to make the disposition, or that the trustees are to make it in accordance with the directions of the two daughters as individuals and not as trustees. The daughters are to have the property for themselves and to make such disposition of it from time to time among the children of the testator or otherwise as they may decide to make; and the former is, I think, the meaning of this provision; but it is immaterial which of these two views is the correct one, for in either case the disposition is to be made in accordance with the directions of the two daughters."

In Lowther v. Dentinck, L. R. 19 Eq. (Eng.) 167, the court in construing a will said: "It seems to me that the words 'or otherwise for his benefit' are evidently put in for the purpose of not confining the trustees to preferment or advancement; and therefore, so far from finding any context which restricts the words, I think the context shows that the words could not mean something of the same kind. I must decide the case upon the words as they stand uncontrolled by any context." See to the same effect Whelen's Appeal, 70 Pa. St. 410; Pope v. Mathews, 18 S. C. 444.

It has been held that a provision of a statute for the filling of any vacancy in the office of poor director "whether such vacancy occur by the expiration of the term of office, or otherwise," did not abrogate a provision of an earlier statute for the election of such officers by the people. Com. v. Dickert, 195 Pa. St. 234, 45 Atl. 1058, wherein the court said: "Looking at the words of the supplement, we find that the vacancies to be filled may occur by expiration of the term of office or otherwise. According to the original act, the vacancies would occur 'by death, resignation or otherwise.' The word 'otherwise' in the supplement is broad enough to cover vacancies by death and resignation. It also covers vacancies by removal of the incumbent from the district and by failure of a director elect to assume the duties of his office. But how can there be a vacancy caused by the expiration of the term? We know of only one way and that is, the failure of the electors of any particular district to elect a poor director at a proper time."

In Monck v. Hilton, 2 Ex. D. (Eng.) 268, 46 L. J. M. C. 163, the court had under consideration a statute providing that "every person pretending or professing to tell fortunes, or using any subtle craft, means, or device by palmistry or otherwise to deceive and impose on any of His Majesty's subjects" should be punished as a rogue and vagabond. The plaintiff pretending to have supernatural faculties in obtaining from the dead manifestations of power, noises, raps, etc. was convicted under the statute. Sustaining the conviction the court said that the means used by the plaintiff came within the words "by palmistry or otherwise." In Pittsburgh, etc. St. L. R. Co. v. Mahoney, 148 Ind. 196, 46 N. E. 917, 47 N. E. 464, 62 Am. St. Rep. 503, 40 L.R.A. 101, it appeared that an employee of an express company had released the company from all liability on account of his injury or death from negligence "or otherwise." It was held the release precluded an action against a railroad for his death caused by being caught between two cars as he was passing between them in the course of his employment. The court said: "The word 'otherwise,' as it is twice employed in Romick's contract, must be deemed to include some liability not expressly mentioned or such as might arise out of the relations of the parties and within the general scope of his service and connection with them. Giving the word such force, it would reach liabilities beyond those expressly mentioned, and beyond those claims for damages, injuries, or death arising from the ordinary hazards of the service, for such claims present no liability. It would include 'all the risks involved,' ordinary, as well as extraordinary; and it would include the assumption by the express company in favor of the appellant."

In State v. Kelly, 32 Ohio St. 421, a statute providing that a county treasurer should be liable in an action on his bond "if he receives any further money out of the treasury for fees, clerk hire, or otherwise," the court said: "We conceive that these words 'or otherwise' mean something. They comprehend every case of getting money out of the treasury other than that which the preceding section had provided should be the legitimate one."

It has been held that a provision in a private improvement act that nothing therein contained should affect any right which the corporation might have under the Municipal Corporation Acts, or otherwise independently of this act," extended to all acts. Taylor v. Oldham, 4 Ch. D. (Eng.) 395.

In Swift v. Swift, 1 De G. F. & J. (Eng.) 160, 29 L. J. Ch. 121, it was held that a gift of real estate to hold "forever or otherwise, according to the several and respective natures and tenures thereof" included leaseholds for years.

In Shelford v. Louth, etc. R. Co. 4 Ex. D. (Eng.) 319, it was held that satisfying the court of any matter "by affidavit or otherwise" meant "by affidavit or by any other sufficient means."

In Wilson v. Chicago Sanitary Dist. 133 Ill. 443, 27 N. E. 203, it appeared that an article of the constitution provided as follows: "The General Assembly may vest the corporate authorities of cities, towns and villages with power to make local improvements by special assessment, or by special taxation of contiguous property, or otherwise." The court said: "It is most probable that the words 'or otherwise' were used to exclude the possibility of misapprehension that because only cities, towns and villages could be authorized to make local improvements 'by special assessment,' or by special taxation of contiguous property, they could not be authorized to make them by general taxation." In Morant v. Taylor, 1 Ex. D. (Eng.) 188, the court said that the words of a statute, "order for the payment of money or otherwise" included orders of every kind which a justice of the peace had authority to make.

In a case wherein the issue was as to who should under the provisions of a will bear the cost of some drainage work on a leasehold house the word "otherwise" was given a comprehensive interpretation. In re Crawley, 28 Ch. D. (Eng.) 431. Pearson, J., said: "It seems to me, . . . that when the testator has said that all that his wife is to receive is the rent that remains after paying 'all ordinary outgoing for ground rent, repairs, taxes, expenses of insurance, or otherwise' at all events, the word 'otherwise' is sufficient to cover this if the word 'taxes' is not sufficient, but looking to the form of the original lease of this house, I must come to the conclusion that the deduction will include whatever has been paid under that lease; and, under all these circumstances, though with some difficulty, I come to the conclusion that the tenant for life ought to bear these expenses."

Under a statute providing that a debt due to a member of a company, in such capacity, "by way of dividends, profits, or otherwise" should be postponed to debts of the creditors of the company it has been held that a director's unpaid fees came within this provision. In re Leicester Club, etc. Co. 30 Ch. D. (Eng.) 629.

In Downing v. Marshall, 23 N. Y. 366, 80 Am. Dec. 290, it was held that authority to take "by direct purchase or otherwise" was authority to take by devise.

In Fellowes v. Clay, 4 Q. B. 313, 45 E. C. L. 313, the court said: "With respect to exemption or discharge, it speaks not of them generally, but, 'by composition real or otherwise,' that is, by some other means then known to the law, as by the lands having been abbey lands and held discharged. The word 'otherwise' cannot surely be construed to introduce an entirely new ground of exemption wholly unknown to the law; but the only legitimate meaning of the words must be that exemption from or discharge of tithes on any legal ground shall be sustained and deemed good and valid and indefeasible upon evidence of nonpayment for a certain length of time, instead of the length of time formerly required. Still the claim must be such as the law recognizes when shown to have been acted on for the specified length of time; that is, it must be shown to have reference to composition real or some known legal ground of exemption or discharge."

In Paulin v. Windsor, 36 Nova Scotia 446, it appeared that a testator directed his executors to pay to a town twenty thousand dollars to assist in building and maintaining a hospital as soon as a corresponding sum "should be procured by the corporation, by a tax on the citizens, or from private donations, or otherwise, to be added to the said bequest." It was held that the words "or otherwise" in the will covered the obtaining of the sum from the Province. The court said: "The obvious design of the testator was to benefit his native town by assisting to found an hospital, and I can find nothing in the clause to indicate that he made it conditional on the balance being raised or procured out of the pockets of the citizens of Windsor only. There would only be two ways of accomplishing that, viz., by private donations, or by taxation. These are both specified in the clause, and then the words 'or otherwise' added. . . . It is plain that the testator, so far from limiting the sources from which the money might be procured, by the language used, extended the right or privilege of getting the additional money in other ways than those partially specified."

Construing a statute providing that if any person or persons, except taverners, "by agent or otherwise," should keep any house, etc., they should be guilty of an offense, it has been said that the word "otherwise" was not incautiously introduced in the statute and was necessary to carry out the intent of the legislature. Rawson v. State, 19 Conn. 299. It was urged in that case that the word had no meaning but the court said: "No man can read this statute without learning from its entire perusal, that the controlling purpose of the legislature was, to suppress tippling-houses, under whatever pretence or name established; and thus to prevent the facilities to intemperate and ruinous dram-drinking. To reject the word otherwise, from the law, and thus to legalize the evil which it was the object of the statute to prevent, if perpetrated in person, and not by agent, would be, not only absurd, but it would involve a judicial repeal of an important part of the law itself."

In Fuller v. Aylesworth, 75 Fed. 701, 43 U. S. App. 657, 21 C. C. A. 505, it appeared that by a rule of the supreme court a superseas bond, conditioned that the plaintiff in error or appellant should prosecute his writ or appeal to effect, was required. Where the judgment or decree was for the recovery of money "not otherwise secured," it was stipulated that the indemnity must be for the whole amount of the judgment or decree, including just damages for delays, costs and interest. It was held that "otherwise secured" meant "otherwise than by mere force of the judgment." The court said: "The meaning of 'otherwise secured' is sufficiently explained by that language in the rule which points out the instances in which a bond for the payment of a judgment is not required. They are all cases in which the court has, by reason of a lien on property secured to plaintiff otherwise than by the judgment or by reason of actual custody of property liable to satisfy the claim asserted, the means of making the claim of the plaintiff by subjecting specific property."

In Thayer v. Wendell, 1 Gall. 37, 23 Fed. Cas. No. 13,873, Story, J., said that an executor's covenant, contained in a deed of conveyance of land of his testator, given in his capacity as executor "but not otherwise" was not binding on him personally even though it might not be binding on the estate of the testator.

Construing a statute providing that "the action and proceedings as to the mode of proving claims, and otherwise, shall be conducted as actions and proceedings for the settlement of the estates of deceased persons are now required to be conducted, so far as the same are applicable," the court said in Marbury v. Kentucky Union Land Co. 62

Fed. 335, 22 U. S. App. 267, 10 C. C. A. 393, that they did "not think it a strained construction to hold that the general words 'or otherwise' . . . include 'mode of distribution.'"

In New York State Loan, etc. Co. v. Helmer, 77 N. Y. 64, wherein it appeared that the charter of a trust company authorized it to grant, bargain, sell, etc. all kinds of property, or to hold the same in trust, "or otherwise" and to advance moneys, etc., on property, the court held that the charter did not confer banking powers or authorize it to discount commercial paper.

In Collector v. Hubbard, 12 Wall. 1, 20 U. S. (L. ed.) 272, it was held that an Internal Revenue Act, requiring a stockholder in a company to return as income all profits accruing to him therefrom whether the same were "divided or otherwise" embraced not only dividends but profits not divided.

It has been held that the words "by assignment or otherwise" were intended "to embrace and cover every and all means and manner of success or devolution, in addition to that by assignment." Carpenter v. Romer, etc. Steamboat Co. 48 App. Div. 363, 63 N. Y. S. 274.

In West Chicago St. R. Co. v. Morrison, etc. Co. 160 Ill. 288, 43 N. E. 393, it was said of a provision of a lease allowing the landlord a certain time for the repairing of machinery injured "through accident or otherwise:" "The expression 'through accident or otherwise,' is broad enough to include wear and tear, breakage from inherent defects, or even simple negligence or the torts of others. But these provisions did not contemplate a wilful trespass by the landlord and destruction of property and business."

In State v. Shade, 115 N. C. 759, 20 S. E. 537, it was held that a statute relating to assaults committed in a secret manner "by waylaying or otherwise" included every assault committed in a secret manner. The court said: "If it may be said to be the general rule that the word 'otherwise' following an enumeration should be interpreted by supplying after it the words 'ejusdem generis,' this statute, like the famous section 9 of 27 Henry VIII. constitutes a very clear exception, because it is not indefinite, but must be construed as meaning 'otherwise in a secret manner.'" See to the same effect State v. Jennings, 104 N. C. 774, 10 S. E. 249.

In Skinner v. Shew [1893] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 413, the issue was as to the interpretation of a section of an act which read as follows: "Where any person claiming to be the patentee of any invention, by circulars, advertisements or otherwise threatens any other person with any legal proceedings." The court said that the words "or otherwise" were to be read as prohibiting any threats whatever of legal proceedings unless the person making them commenced and prosecuted an action for infringement of his patent. See also Driffield, etc. Pure Linseed Cake Co. v. Waterloo Mills Cake, etc. Co. 31 Ch. D. (Eng.) 638.

In Carpenter v. Mitchell, 54 Ill. 126, the court said: "This provision contemplates the acquisition of property in different modes by married women, and a fair interpretation of the language employed embraces a purchase by her. It names the acquisition by descent and devise, and instead of limiting it to that mode, enlarges the power by recognizing other unenumerated modes, by the expression, 'or otherwise,' which is broad enough to embrace a purchase." See to the same effect Haight v. McVeagh, 69 Ill. 624.

In Territory v. Gutierrez, 12 N. M. 254, 78 Pac. 139, it was held that the words "or otherwise" used in an act providing for the filling of a vacancy in any county office should be given a comprehensive interpretation. The court said: "The language of this act discloses that the legislature intended the word 'otherwise' to refer to vacancies occasioned otherwise than by death and resignation. Any other view would seem to make it absolutely meaningless, and this we cannot believe the legislature intended." See to the same effect State v. Moores, 58 Neb. 285, 78 N. W. 529; Atty.-Gen. v. Taggart, 66 N. H. 362, 29 Atl. 1027, 25 L.R.A. 613; Territory v. Albright, 12 N. M. 293, 78 Pac. 204.

It has been said: "The language of the constitution is that the title or substance of the act to be amended must appear in the amending act, either in its caption or otherwise. The term 'otherwise' can only mean the preamble or body of the act, as contradistinguished from the title or caption." See to the same effect Ransome v. State, 91 Tenn. 716, 20 S. W. 310; State v. Runnels, 92 Tenn. 320, 21 S. W. 665; State v. Yardley, 95 Tenn. 546, 32 S. W. 481, 34 L.R.A. 656; Shelton v. State, 96 Tenn. 521, 32 S. W. 967.

In Thompson v. Highland Park, 187 Ill. 265, 58 N. E. 328, wherein it appeared that an ordinance provided "for the grading, draining, paving and otherwise improving" of an avenue, it was held that the provision authorized the making of parkways in the center thereof. The court said: "The phrase 'otherwise improving' is a broad and comprehensive phrase, sufficient to include almost any improvement of the street. . . . And is not rendered uncertain by reason of the caption failing to state that its purpose was, in part, to provide for a parkway." See also Scott v. Marshall, 110 Mo. App. 178, 85 S. W. 98.

W. T. SMITH LUMBER COMPANY

v.

JERNIGAN ET AL

Alabama Supreme Court—January 22, 1914.

185 Ala. 125; 64 So. 300.

Timber — Definition.

The word "timber" has a well-defined meaning and includes such trees as are suitable for building and allied purposes but does not include fruit trees.

Usage — Local Significance of Word.

Complainant conveyed certain land to defendant's predecessors in title by deed, reserving all timber suitable for sawlogs, 12 inches and over in diameter three feet above ground. Held that, while the word "timber suitable for sawlogs," standing alone, included any and every sort of sawlog, without reference to the character of the wood, yet, the contract having been made 20 years before, defendants were entitled to show that, according to the custom of the locality when the deed was made, "sawlogs" had a well-defined local meaning which was limited to pine logs.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

When the usage of a locality in which an instrument is executed has given certain words therein a peculiar signification, the parties to the instrument will be presumed to have used the words in their peculiar local sense.

[See note at end of this case.]

Equity — Jurisdiction — Title to Property.

Where defendants are in adverse possession of certain standing timber claimed by complainant, complainant's right to the timber should be determined in an action at law.

Appeal from Chancery Court, Butler county: GARDNER, Judge.

Action for injunction. W. T. Smith Lumber Company, plaintiff, and J. T. Jernigan et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Lane & Lane for appellant.

Powell & Hamilton for appellees.

[126] DE GRAFFENIED, J.—On the 11th of June, 1896, the appellant executed and delivered, to those through whom the appellees claim the land upon which the timber hereinafter referred to is situated, a deed conveying said land. In the deed there is the following clause: "The W. T. Smith Lumber Company reserves all the timber suitable for sawlogs that is and will be 12 inches and over in diameter three feet above the ground, or at the top of the stump, at the time said timber is cut, together with the rights of way for carts, drays, trams, [127] tramways, and railroads on and through the above-described lands, also the right to use dead pine to generate steam for its locomotive engines; said timber to be removed at the option of the W. T. Smith Lumber Company, its successors or assigns."

It seems that the W. T. Smith Lumber Company has cut and removed all pine timber suitable for sawlogs, 12 inches and up, etc., from the premises, and the bill of complaint in this case was filed for the purpose of testing, in a court of equity, the right of the said Lumber Company, against the wishes of the appellees, who own the land, to go upon the land and remove therefrom the poplar, white oak, gum, etc., trees, which are 12 inches and up, from the said land.

In the first place the appellees claim that they are in the adverse possession of said trees, denying that the appellant has any claim upon them, and that therefore appellant must pursue its remedy of ejectment for said trees; and in the second place appellees maintain that by the above reservation the appellant only reserved title to the pine trees on the said lands. Appellees maintain that, at the time of the execution and delivery of the said deed, the word "sawlogs" had, in Butler county, where the lands are situated, a well-defined meaning; that the word "sawlogs" meant, at that time, "pine logs," and only "pine logs;" that no other kind of trees had, in that section of the state, up to that time, been used or known as "sawlogs;" and that, since the execution and delivery of the conveyance, the parties in interest had so construed the said words because since that time the appellant had paid the owners of the land for all trees taken from the land except the pine trees. Appellees say that the appellant, at the time it executed the said conveyance, was the owner of a large saw-mill plant situated at Chapman, Ala., and that said [128] mill was engaged exclusively in the manufacture of pine trees into lumber, and that, up to that time, there had never been in that section of Alabama a mill which manufactured any other sort of trees into lumber, and that, at the present time, said mill is manufacturing only pine trees into lumber.

1. The word "timber" has a well-defined meaning and includes such trees as are suitable for building and allied purposes.—Gulf Yellow Pine Lumber Co. v. Monk, 159 Ala. 318, 49 So. 248. The word, however, does not include fruit trees.—Bullen v. Denning, 5 B. & C. 842, 847, 12 E. C. L. 383, 386; 8 Words and Phrases, p. 6973.

2. Standing alone and unexplained, we would unhesitatingly say that the words "timber suitable for sawlogs" meant any sort of sawlogs, whether of oak, chestnut, hickory, poplar, or ash. This deed was made, however, nearly 20 years ago, and it may be that in the section in which this timber was situated the word "sawlogs" had at that time a well-understood local meaning, and that this local meaning was well understood by the parties when the deed was made and delivered. The written reservation in the deed is but the memorial of the contract, the thing upon which the minds of the parties met, and, of course, the thing which they agreed to was the contract between them. If "sawlogs," then had a restricted meaning and the parties used that word in that restricted meaning, the fact that, since that time, the meaning of that word has been broadened does not broaden the rights of appellant. As an illustration: Many years ago it was the universal custom for cotton to be picked from the fields and placed in baskets. These baskets were used by the laborers to carry the cotton from the field to the cotton house. These baskets were made from a particular character of white oak. The words "basket timber" then had, in [129] the cotton sections of the state, a particular local meaning. They meant white oak suitable for making cotton baskets. If a man then sold to a maker of cotton baskets all his "basket timber," his plain meaning would have been to sell that part of his white oak timber which was suitable for making cotton baskets, and only that timber.

In this case the contention is that, when the reservation in the deed was made, the word "sawlogs" had, in the section of Alabama in which the lands in question were situated, a local, well-defined meaning, and that these words meant pine trees or logs suitable to be manufactured into lumber. If this is true, we see no reason why appellees have not the right, by evidence, to show it. In making this proof, the construction which the parties themselves have placed upon the contract may be shown.—Kaul v. Weed, 203 Pa. St. 586, 63 Atl. 489.

"When the usage of the locality in which the instrument is executed has given certain words therein a peculiar signification," the parties to the instrument will be presumed to have used such words in their peculiar local sense.—17 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 12, subd. 3, and authorities there cited.

3. In this case the appellees are in possession of the land upon which the trees which appellant claims title to are situated. The appellees deny that the trees belong to appellant, and assert that they themselves own the trees. In other words, appellees are in the adverse possession of the trees claimed by appellant. The appellant can test its right and title to the trees in an action at law.—Inglis v. Freeman, 137 Ala. 298, 34 So. 394.

It is therefore evident that the chancellor was correct in holding that the title to the trees should be tested in [130] an action at law, where the disputed questions of fact can be settled by a jury. The decree of the court below is therefore affirmed.

Affirmed.

Admissibility of Evidence of Peculiar Signification of Word in Locality Where Instrument Was Executed.

General Rule.

Although the words used by the parties to a contract or other instrument are usually to be construed in their ordinary sense, nevertheless, where they appear to be ambiguous or uncertain in that a technical, special or local sense has been established in that locality by custom or trade, evidence of the peculiar meaning thus acquired is admissible, not for the purpose of adding to, altering or contradicting the language of the instrument, but for the purpose of expounding the language so used, so that the court may interpret it according to the intent of the parties.

"The meaning of terms at the place where the parties use them, or to which they look as the seat of the contract may also control their interpretation. It is proper, therefore, to receive evidence of the particular sense which any word of the contract has acquired by usage in any special locality. . . . The reason for resorting to such testimony is that, in the hurry of trade and the multitude of contracts, brevity and condensation are absolutely essential. Words to the layman of meaningless or of limited force have, in the minds of those familiar with them, a comprehensive and intelligent definition. Accordingly, it has been settled that parties engaged in a particular trade, and who use a mercantile term having a fixed meaning in the trade, are conclusively bound to use it in that sense. They can no more be heard to say that they did not know the meaning or did not use it in that sense than a party in ordinary cases can escape a contract by saying that he did not understand the effect of the words used. Where two in a particular trade deal with each other in the language of their trade, they are presumed to speak the mercantile meaning of words of that trade." Long v. J. K. Armsby Co. 43 Mo. App. 253. In Eaton v. Smith, 20 Pick. (Mass.) 150, the court said: "The court are of opinion, that when a new and unusual word is used in a contract, or when a word is used in a technical or peculiar sense, as applicable to any trade or branch of business, or to any particular class of people, it is proper to receive evidence of usage, to explain and illustrate it, and that evidence is to be considered by the jury; and the province of the court will then be, to instruct the jury what will be the legal effect of the contract or instrument, as they shall find the meaning of the word, modified or explained by the usage. But when no new word is used, or when an old word, having an established place in the language, is not apparently used in any new, technical or peculiar sense, it is the province of the court to put a construction upon the written contracts and agreements of parties, according to the established use of language, as applied to the subject matter, and modified by the whole instrument, or by existing circumstances. This was the course adopted on the present trial. The defendants offered evidence of usage which was resisted by the plaintiff, and although at first received, was ultimately rejected, as the plaintiff desired that it might be. Had the verdict been the other way, and had the defendants excepted, it would have presented a different question. But the plaintiff objected to the admission of evidence aliunde, evidence of peculiar usage, and the objection was sustained. There being then no evidence of usage or other evidence aliunde, to affect the ordinary meaning of the contract and agreement of the parties, the court are of opinion that it was the duty and province of the court to put a construction upon this contract, and that there was nothing to leave to the jury, in regard to the meaning and effect of the written agreement. On the other part of the case, the court instructed the jury that they were not to regard the evidence as to the meaning of the word 'operate,' but were to take it in its common and established meaning, and that it did include selling the growing timber, as well as cutting and sending it to market at the owner's expense. This is the direction alleged to be wrong, and the plaintiff contends that in its true meaning and acceptance, it intended only, cutting timber or clearing the land, or performing other labor or making other improvements thereon at the owner's expense. This question is not without difficulty, especially to be decided as the plaintiff contends that it must be, not in reference to any local usage of Maine, but as it must have been understood by the plaintiff residing here in Massachusetts, and according to its known use, as a part of the English language. On the whole, and in view of all the circumstances, the court are of opinion that the direction was right." In Steyer v. Dwyer, 81 Ia. 20, which was an action to restrain the defendant from carrying on the business of stone cutting, in violation of his agreement, the court said: "The terms of every written instrument are to be understood in their plain, ordinary and popular sense. . . . This rule, however, is subject to the exception that parol evidence is admissible for the purpose of showing that, in the place where the contract is made the words employed have, by known and established usage, acquired a signification different from the general and popular sense. And parties, in making their contracts, are supposed to refer to this usage, just as they are presumed to employ words in their usual and ordinary signification. . . . The record does not contain the evidence upon which the court below acted. It was competent for the plaintiff to prove that, where this contract was made, the word town had, by known and general usage, acquired a local and peculiar signification extending it beyond the mere idea of a collection of houses. This court will not presume, as against the judgment of the court below, that such evidence was not introduced."

Application of Rule.

In Thompson v. Sloan, 23 Wend. (N. Y.) 71, 35 Am. Dec. 546, in holding that evidence of the meaning of "Canada money" in which a note was payable, was admissible, the court said: "In the case at bar, extrinsic evidence of the kind offered by the defendants was, I think, admissible to prove that Canada money meant in general, mercantile understanding at Buffalo and in its vicinity, Canadian bank bills, and not specie, whether we regard the words used in the note as prima facie importing current Canadian coin, or as ambiguous on their face; in other words leaving it doubtful whether they mean current Canadian coin or bank notes."

In Pilmer v. Branch of State Bank, 16 Ia. 321, it appeared that a draft in suit was payable "in currency." The court said: "What 'currency' means in a note or bill is not very clear without some reference to the circulating medium at the time, or without knowing what meaning is attached to the word generally, by those who use it, or rather without knowing what specific idea the word is used to express. . . . The word currency is, as we have seen, far from having a settled, fixed and precise meaning. And, even if it had such a meaning in general, it might acquire in certain localities, or among certain classes, a different signification. Suppose, in consequences of a depreciation in the issue of banks generally, the word 'currency' is set apart by general popular use, to indicate these issues, and to distinguish them from coin. If under these circumstances, the parties make a contract, and use the word currency in its local or popular sense, will the court close its eyes to the situation of the parties, and enforce the contract in a different sense from that which was intended?"

In Corey v. Struve, 16 Cal. App. 310, 116 Pac. 975, construing a lease of a farm for the growing of beets, the court said: "Assuming that the provision as to the reservation of 'one-fourth of the crop of beets' introduces an element of uncertainty, it is entirely eliminated by the due consideration of the agreement to farm said beet lands in accordance with the customs and directions of the Spreckels Sugar Company or its field superintendent. It is manifest that there is a distinction between 'customs' and 'directions.' They are familiar terms, and it is not necessary to define them. One of the customs, or, in other words, the common practice of the Spreckels Company was to leave the beet tops upon the ground to be plowed under as a fertilizer. The evidence shows this without conflict. In fact, the said James Struve testified that he knew 'that in this valley the Spreckels Sugar Company required the beet tops to be left on the land.' If this custom is to be considered a part of the 'farming,' it would seem to follow that defendants had promised to thus leave the tops."

In Studdy v. Sanders, 5 B. & C. 628, 12 E. C. L. 336, 108 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 234, it was held that parol evidence was admissible to explain the meaning of the term "cider" in Devonshire.

In Wood v. Allen, 111 Ia. 97, 82 N. W. 451, in construing the term "dry goods" in a contract of sale, it was held that evidence of the local meaning was admissible. The court said: "At the trial defendant offered witnesses to prove what the term 'dry goods' meant to merchants and business men in the community where the stock was located. He proposed to prove that 'dry goods' meant shelf goods, bolt goods, dress goods, calicoes, and flannels;—in other words, all piece goods, —and that notions, clothing, hats, and caps were not included in that term, according to the ordinary usages of the community. Objections to these questions were sustained, on the ground that answers thereto would tend to contradict and vary the terms of a written contract, and that it was for the court to determine from the language of the contract what was and what was not included in the terms used by the parties. These rulings were manifestly erroneous. In the construction of mercantile contracts, parol evidence is admissible to show that terms used therein have acquired, by the custom of the locality or by the usage of trade, a peculiar significance; and this is true, although the terms used do not in themselves appear to be ambiguous. Such evidence does not contradict the terms of the contract, but simply applies them to the subject matter."

In Page v. Cole, 120 Mass. 37, the court said: "The evidence offered by the plaintiff was competent to show that in stipulating to convey 'the right and good will' of supplying twenty-six full eight-quart cans of custom situated as above,' the defendant undertook to sell, and the plaintiff supposed he was buying, the good will of a business in which the customers at the time of the sale, 'situated as aforesaid,' (that is to say, included in the milk route in question) were in the habit of taking milk to the extent of twenty-six cans of eight quarts each. If he succeeded in proving the alleged usage, he might well claim that the defendant had not delivered and pointed out what he had undertaken to sell and had been paid for."

In Phoenix Iron Co. v. Samuel, 13 W. N. C. (Pa.) 50, it was said: "It is undoubtedly true as a general rule, that a written contract must be construed by the court. Sometimes, however, the meaning and sense in which a certain expression therein is used may be submitted to the jury. Here the language was: 'Shipment early spring,' and 'time of shipment early spring of the year.' No month by name was mentioned. The contract was made in London. The old rails were to be shipped from Europe. The object is to arrive at the understanding of the parties to the contract. Presumably, they understood it as it is understood at the place where made and where the vendors were to perform their part of the agreement. This view tends to prove the assent of both minds and give effect to the joint understanding of the parties. It follows that evidence of the meaning of the word 'spring' as there understood was properly received."

Parol evidence has been held to be admissible to show that by custom of the place "noon" meant 12 o'clock midday "standard time" and not 12 o'clock midday "sun time." Rochester German Ins. Co. v. Peaslee-Gaulbert Co. 120 Ky. 752, 9 Ann. Cas. 324, 87 S. W. 1115, 89 S. W. 3, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 364, 27 Ky. L. Rep. 1155.

In Taylor v. Union Sawmill Co. 105 Ark. 518; 152 S. W. 150, construing a deed granting the right to cut and remove "white oak timber," it was held that parol evidence was admissible to show that in the locality where the timber was situated, the term had a popular and well understood meaning and did not include overcup, cow oak and post oak.

In Dauss v. Martin Stove Co. 113 Ark. 325, 168 S. W. 553, holding that evidence was admissible to show that a deed conveying "all the oak timber suitable to make staves and stave bolts," did not convey red oak timber as being unsuitable, the court said: "According to a preponderance of the testimony, it was not thought or understood in that community at the time the timber deed was executed that red oak timber was suitable for making staves and stave bolts. Moreover, the undisputed testimony shows that the plaintiff and the agent of the defendant who bought the timber for it both understood that red oak timber was not suitable for making staves and stave bolts and that only white oak timber and its species was suitable for that purpose."

In Snoqualmi Realty Co. v. Moynihan, 179 Mo. 629, 78 S. W. 1014, holding that evidence as to the meaning of the phrase "San Domingo mahogany" as used in a building contract, was admissible, the court said: "Such evidence is received on the theory that the parties knew of the usage or custom and contracted in reference to it, and in such cases the evidence does not add to or contradict the language used, but simply interprets and explains its meaning." Applying this rule to the facts in the case at bar, there is no room left for doubt that the term San Domingo mahogany, when used in specifications, in St. Louis, is a trade term and that it does not mean mahogany that was grown on the island of San Domingo, but means a good figured mahogany, equal in density to that known as San Domingo mahogany."

In Rastetter v. Reynolds, 160 Ind. 133, 66 N. E. 612, it appeared that a custom had grown up among those who sawed elm strips and those who purchased the same that the dimensions of the strips were to be taken at the time of sawing; and that orders therefor were given with the understanding that the same would be saved in the green to the size as ordered, and with the knowledge that such strips would shrink after they were dried. The court said: "It is perfectly well settled that when parties enter into a contract with reference to a particular business or trade they are presumed to have contracted with reference to any usages of that business or trade, and their contracts are to be interpreted consistently with such usage. Peculiar expressions are to be given that meaning which they have acquired in such business by common usage, unless, by the express terms of the contract, the usage is excluded, or is inconsistent with the contract." In Hinote v. Brigman, 44 Fla. 589, 33 So. 303, wherein it appeared that the plaintiffs agreed to "square three thousand pine saw logs" at the rate of two cents per cubic foot, the court said: "The term 'saw logs' seems by the evidence adduced to have a well understood meaning among those habitually dealing in that commodity, and 'saw logs,' designed, as provided by this contract, to be converted into 'squared' timbers, seems also by the evidence to be understood among lumber dealers as calling for a log that will square out at least eighteen cubic feet to the log, though upon this latter point there was conflict in the evidence, some of the witnesses contending that a saw log designed for squared timber to be merchantable must contain at least twenty-five cubic feet. The rule in such cases is that where words or phrases used in a contract have acquired a definite meaning generally or by local usage, or when used in reference to certain things, or commodities, have acquired a definite meaning among those dealing with such things or commodities, and the language used in the writing is such that the court does not understand it, oral testimony is admissible to explain the meaning of such words or phrases."

In Oallahán v. Stanley, 57 Cal. 476, wherein it was held that evidence was admissible to prove that, by the custom of the locality, the word "stubble," used in the agreement in suit included and designated whatever was left on the ground after the harvest time, the court said: "If there was an existing usage among farmers as to the meaning of the word 'stubble,' when this contract was made, it must be inferred that the contracting parties, being farmers, contracted with reference to it, and that they used the word in the broader meaning which was given to it by that usage, and not in the ordinary or popular sense. Evidence of such usage and meaning was, therefore, admissible to define and explain the peculiar or local meaning of the word as it was used in the contract, and the court below should have overruled the objection to the offer made by the plaintiff."

In Chicago Portland Cement Co. v. Hoffman, 168 Ill. App. 71, it was held that a contract for the sale of cement of "standard quality" was controlled by the meaning attached by local usage to those words. . . . The court said: "Defendant in error had been using cement in construction work for years, and admits that the words standard quality have a certain and definite meaning among cement men, and that the words had been used in many contracts by him for the purchase of cement. He did not undertake to dispute the evidence of plaintiff in error's witnesses as to its meaning. We think, therefore, no evidence should have been considered by the court as to oral statements made previous to the signing of the contract. When parties adopt a contract containing trade words of well-known meaning to them, they should not be heard to say that there was an oral agreement that they were intended to mean an entirely different thing from their trade use."

In Smith v. Wilson, 3 B. & Ad. 728, 23 E. C. L. 769; 1 L. J. K. B. 194, it was held that parol evidence was admissible to show that by the custom of the place where the lease of a rabbit warren was made, the term "thousand" as used therein and as applied to rabbits, meant twelve hundred, not a thousand.

In Newell v. Nicholson, 17 Mont. 389, 43 Pac. 180, the court applied a statute (Code Civil Procedure §§ 632, 633), providing as follows: "For the proper construction of an instrument, the circumstances under which it was made, including the situation of the subject of the instrument and of the parties to it, may also be shown; so that the judge be placed in the position of those whose language he is to interpret. The terms of a writing are presumed to have been used in their primary and general acceptation, but evidence is, nevertheless, admissible that they have a local, technical, or otherwise peculiar signification, and were so used and understood in the particular instance, in which case the agreement must be construed accordingly." Holding that evidence of the meaning of the phrases "Don't sell; we to exchange any goods that don't sell; credit for same," "Sales guaranteed" was properly admitted, the court said: "By the authority of the sections of the Code of Civil Procedure above quoted, the court took evidence to show that the words had a technical or peculiar signification, and were so used and understood in the particular instance before the court. There was also a conflict in the testimony of the mercantile gentlemen who testified as to the meaning of these words, but there was ample evidence introduced showing that the words meant that, if the goods were not sold, or if they proved to be, as one witness said, not good sellers, the defendant might return them and have credit for their value."

In Parks v. O'Connor, 70 Tex. 377, 8 S. W. 104, referring to the admission of testimony that by the custom of the country, in the term "yearlings," cattle from ten to fifteen months old were included, provided their average age was one year, the court said: "In the admission of the evidence we think there was no error. It is apparent that it would be impracticable for any one to deliver, on a day certain, a thousand or more cattle, each one of which should be precisely twelve months old, and that therefore, in a contract of this character, the term yearlings cannot be literally applied. Some deviation must be allowed from the literal import of the word, and, if the limits are not prescribed in the contract itself, the custom of the country and trade, when such custom exists, may be appropriately resorted to in order to define its meaning. Such a custom is reasonable and is usual in most branches of commerce. The objections to the testimony were, first, because the word was not ambiguous; second, 'because parol evidence of custom was not admissible to vary a written contract,' and third, 'because proof of such custom as was alleged in the petition would add the word "average" to the written contract.' These objections were not well taken. The court's charge upon this subject was in accordance with the views we have expressed, and, in our opinion, was not erroneous."

In contracts to lay brick at so much "a thousand," it has been held that evidence is admissible to show what the custom in the business and locality is, and that it means the estimation by the measurement of the walls, in a uniform rule, based on the average size of the brick, with additions for extra work and wastage, and deducting for opening, etc. Brunold v. Glasser, 25 Misc. 285, 53 N. Y. S. 1021; Long v. Davidson, 101 N. C. 170, 7 S. E. 758; Lowe v. Lehman, 15 Ohio St. 179. Likewise, in the purchase of shingles, it has been held that evidence may be adduced showing that, in the purchase of shingles by the thousand, packs of shingles of certain dimensions are regarded as a certain, fixed and definite number, regardless of the quantity numerically. Bragg v. Bletz, 7 D. C. 105; Soutier v. Kellerman, 18 Mo. 509. And in Walls v. Bailey, 49 N. Y. 464, 10 Am. Rep. 407, wherein the question was as to the manner of estimating the number of square yards of plastering, it was held that evidence of usage was admissible. The court said: "Every legal contract is to be interpreted in accordance with the intention of the parties making it. And usage . . . when it is reasonable, uniform, well settled not in opposition to fixed rules of law, not in contradiction of the express terms of the contract, is deemed to form a part of the contract, and to enter into the intention of the parties. . . . Parties are held to contract in reference to the law of the state in which they reside. For all men, being bound to know the law, are presumed beyond dispute, to contract in reference to it. And so they are presumed to contract in reference to the usage of the particular place or trade in, or as to which they enter into agreement . . . when it is so far established and so far known to the parties that it must be supposed that their contract was made in reference to it. . . . Evidence of usage is received, as is any other parol evidence, when a written contract is under consideration. It is to apply the written contract to the subject-matter, to explain expressions used in a particular sense, by particular persons, as to particular subjects, to give effect to language in a contract, as it was understood by those who made use of it." To the same effect see Ford v. Tirrell, 9 Gray (Mass.) 401, 69 Am. Dec. 297.

Where a word is employed which has no definite and specific general meaning, its local meaning may be proved. Thus in reference to the term "season," when employed to limit the time in which grain should be shipped, the court said in Myers v. Walker, 24 Ill. 133: "Meaning of terms of art, of science, technical phrases and words of local meaning, may, undoubtedly, when employed in an agreement, be proved by extrinsic evidence; and, by so doing, the rule is not violated which prohibits the introduction of evidence to alter, vary or explain an agreement, or that a written contract cannot exist partly in parol and partly in writing. By receiving such evidence, the court does no more than when it refers to a lexicon to ascertain the meaning of a word. This has no tendency to vary the contract, but is the only means of ascertaining the intention of the parties when they entered into the agreement, and when this can be ascertained, it must govern. When local terms or phrases are employed where they are in use, the presumption is, that the parties understood their meaning, and employed them according to their local signification. And to give effect to the agreement, the court must know the sense in which they were employed. The word 'season,' as employed in this agreement, must have had reference to the period within which it was customary to purchase corn at that point, on the Illinois River, and the presumption is, that the meaning of the term was well known and understood, in the locality in which the contract was entered into, by the parties. The court below, therefore, committed no error in receiving evidence to show the local meaning of this term."

Limitation of Rule.

Evidence showing that by local usage a term possesses a special commercial sense is inadmissible where both parties to the contract in which the term is employed are not of the same trade or kind of business. In such a case, there is no presumption that both parties contract with reference to the local usage and make it a part of their agreement. Long v. J. K. Armsby Co. 43 Mo. App. 253; Walls v. Bailey, 49 N. Y. 464, 10 Am. Rep. 407.

Likewise, in Cook v. Loew, 34 Misc. 276, 69 N. Y. S. 614, wherein it appeared that insurance was placed on lumber, etc., "in yard," which, by common and current acceptance, was "an inclosure within which any work or business is carried on," the court said: "The agreement was entered into in this city, with the meaning ordinarily attaching to such expression, for the fair import of the words and the intention of the parties as expressed in the terms of their agreement must guide our construction. To hold that 'yard' is a clearing in a forest, and was so used and understood by the parties to this contract, is apparently not discoverable from the agreement itself. It would seem that this brief expression, to the common understanding, and when used in connection with an insurance against fire, conveys quite unmistakably the meaning expressed, within the intention of the contracting parties. But the plaintiffs contend that the expression has other and more comprehensive meaning in the locality where the property destroyed was situated, and, with the introduction of extrinsic evidence, urge that there it may and does mean a clearing in a forest. 'It would seem, however, that upon principle, for a party to be bound by a local usage, . . . he must be shown to have knowledge or notice of its existence. . . . Usage is engrafted upon a contract or invoked to give it a meaning, on the assumption that the parties contracted in reference to it; that is to say, that it was their intention that it should be a part of their contract wherever their contract in that regard was silent or obscure. But could intention run in that way unless there was knowledge of the way to guide it? No usage is admissible to influence the construction of a contract unless it appears that it be so well settled, so uniformly acted upon, and so long continued, as to raise a fair presumption that it was known to both contracting parties, and that they contracted in reference thereto. There must be some proof that the contract had reference to it, or proof arising out of the position of the parties, their knowledge of the course of business, or other circumstance from which it may be inferred or presumed that they had reference to it.'

In Smith v. Clayton, 29 N. J. L. 357, the court, holding that evidence of the meaning of the word "grain" as used in a lease, was inadmissible, said: "As to the remaining question, whether evidence was properly received to show the meaning of the word grain, what has already been said would render a decision on this point unnecessary, if it had not been certified to this court. The word is not a technical term, the signification of which is only known to those of the trade. In such a case parol evidence is admitted of necessity for the same reason that an interpreter must be employed to translate a paper written in an unknown tongue, and it has always been admitted. . . . An usage may be shown by parol evidence, and some of the cases go so far as to permit evidence that an English word, not a term of art or peculiar to a particular trade or occupation, has a peculiar provincial signification different from its natural meaning, as that a dozen means thirteen. The evidence was not offered for any such purpose. It was to show the meaning of a common English word, in common use among all classes, as understood by all classes in common conversation. If the evidence was competent, the effect of its reception would have been to draw to the jury the settlement of the question of law. Such a doctrine would, in almost every case, take the question of law from the court and give it to the jury. The evidence was incompetent, and should not have been received."

v.

SWEET ET AL.

Iowa Supreme Court—December 13, 1913.

163 Iowa 683; 144 N. W. 615.

Death by Wrongful Act — Proximate Cause of Death — Antecedent Disease.

Where plaintiff's intestate died of traumatic pneumonia, caused by being struck by a falling cornice of defendant's building, the fact that deceased was predisposed to disease will not excuse defendant from liability for negligence.

[See Ann. Cas. 1912A 965.]

Negligence — Res Ipsa Loquitur.

Where a pedestrian is struck by a falling cornice, the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur places upon the owner of the building the burden of establishing his freedom from negligence.

[See Ann. Cas. 1914D 908; 113 Am. St. Rep. 987.]

Instructions — Requests Covered by General Charge.

The refusal of instructions fully covered by those given is not error.

Death by Wrongful Act — Measure of Damages.

The measure of damages for wrongful death is the value of decedent's life to his estate, had he not perished.

[See 12 Am. St. Rep. 375; 8 R. C. L. tit. Death, p. 822.]

Evidence of Domestic Relations of Deceased.

In an action for wrongful death, evidence of the number of children of deceased is admissible, just as the fact of his marriage, to show an incentive to thrift and accumulation.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

In an action for wrongful death, where the court admitted evidence of the number and ages of decedent's children, an instruction that the amount of damages could not be increased by reason of decedent's having left children, and that the evidence was admitted only upon the question of incentive to industry, is not contradictory or misleading.

[See note at end of this case.]

Proof of Ill Health — Inability to Obtain Insurance.

In an action for wrongful death, evidence that deceased could not obtain life insurance because of his health is admissible as a circumstance bearing on the value of his life, though not of great importance.

Harmless Error — Exclusion of Evidence.

In an action for wrongful death, the erroneous exclusion of evidence that deceased could not obtain life insurance is harmless.

Death by Wrongful Act — Evidence — Complaints of Suffering.

In an action for wrongful death, while the administrator is not entitled to recover for deceased's conscious suffering, evidence of complaints made by deceased of pain and suffering soon after the injury is admissible as bearing on the extent and location of his injuries.

Damages Not Excessive.

An award of $8,000 in favor of the administrator of a deceased boiler maker, who was earning from $56 to $108 per month at the time defendant's negligence caused his death, is not excessive, even though he was not a man of robust health; it appearing that he was not incapacitated at the time of the fatality.

[See Ann. Cas. 1915C 449.]

Appeal from District Court, Benton county: BRADSHAW, Judge.

Action for death by wrongful act. Edna E. Nicoll, plaintiff, and Emma R. Sweet, administratrix, et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Dawley & Wheeler and Tom H. Milner for appellants.

D. L. Johnson and O. W. E. Snyder for appellee.

[684] WEAVER, C. J.—McNulty was injured by the falling of a cornice into the public street from a building owned by Sweet. Eight days after the accident, McNulty died of pneumonia, which plaintiff alleges was caused by the injuries so received, and the claim of damages is based upon that theory.

It is strongly contended upon the part of the appellant that the record shows no evidence from which this fact could be found in favor of plaintiff. It is true that the testimony tends to show that McNulty was not in robust health at the time of his injury, that he had recently suffered from bronchitis and had some indications of weakness of the lungs; but the [685] fact of ill health or physical weakness, if established or conceded, is by no means inconsistent with plaintiff's theory that the pneumonia which was the immediate cause of death was the direct result of the blow received from the falling brick. Indeed, such weakened condition, if it existed, may have rendered the deceased an easier victim of the fatal disease; yet if there was evidence for the jury that pneumonia was the direct result of the injury, and such injury was fairly chargeable to the negligence of Sweet, the state of the deceased's health would in no manner affect the right of action on the part of his administratrix, though it may have bearing on the amount of the recovery. That there was evidence to go to the jury on both questions is scarcely open to doubt. On the matter of the alleged negligence, the fall of the cornice doubtless presented a case for applying the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, to say nothing of other evidence bearing upon the situation. Concerning the relation of cause and effect between the injury received and the disease of which the intestate died, it may be said that the medical testimony on the part of plaintiff tended to show that the pneumonia was of traumatic origin; that is, pneumonia, the inciting cause of which was some physical violence or bodily injury. It is also shown that, from such an injury as the deceased suffered, pneumonia is likely to follow as a natural consequence. No other injury or efficient cause for the disease is suggested, and the question thus presented is one of fact and not of law. Brownfield v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 107 Ia. 264, 77 N. W. 1038; Lehmann v. Minneapolis, etc. R. Co. 153 Ia. 124, 133 N. W. 327.

The jury was fairly and correctly instructed upon this proposition. The defendant's request for an instruction that the burden was upon the plaintiff to show that the injuries to McNulty did cause pneumonia, and if she failed in this respect she could not recover, stated a correct legal proposition, but it was fully covered and stated in the instructions which the court gave upon its own motion.

[686] The principal debatable question upon this appeal is the following: The surviving wife of McNulty, testifying as a witness, was permitted to say, over the objection of defendant, that the deceased left a family consisting of a wife and four children ranging from one to ten years of age. Referring to this feature of the evidence, the court told the jury that, if they found the plaintiff entitled to recover, the amount of damage to be assessed in favor of the estate of the deceased "is not to be increased by reason of his having children which he left surviving him; evidence of his children and the number thereof being admitted by the court as having bearing upon the question of inducement or incentive to habits of industry in case the deceased had lived."

Error is assigned upon the admission of the testimony and upon the instruction to which we have referred. It is to be admitted that authority is to be found for the position of the appellant, and cases are not wanting in which recoveries in actions for damages sustained by reason of the death of a person have been set aside because of admission of proof that the deceased left wife and children surviving him. It is a matter, however, on which the precedents are not in harmony, and a majority of this court, after quite careful deliberation, is of the opinion that the better reason is with the rule holding the evidence competent. Practically the only objection of any plausibility to its admission is that its tendency is to excite the sympathies of the jurors and induce undue liberality in the assessment of damages. But, as is well known to all persons who have observed the course of litigation in matters of this kind, it is utterly futile to hope to keep the fact from the knowledge of the jury. More often than otherwise the widow and children are in the courtroom. If not, the facts concerning the victim of a fatal accident, his family, and their circumstances are public property, upon every tongue; they are mentioned in public print, talked about on the street corners and places where men meet and [637] congregate; they crop out incidentally in the court room; and, even though the evidence be rigidly excluded on the trial, no juror enters upon the consideration of his verdict in ignorance of the actual situation in this respect. Even as a mere matter of protection of the interests of the defendant, it is at least an open question whether it is not better that the testimony of all these conditions surrounding the deceased at the time of his injury should be admitted under the sanction of an oath and its bearing and effect regulated and controlled by appropriate instructions. If it be said that a juror's sympathies may control his actions even to the extent of disregarding the court's instructions, that suggestion, if sound, is no less applicable where the influencing fact comes to the juror's knowledge from sources other than the testimony, or by absorption from the atmosphere in which the case has been tried. But the average jury is not made up of weaklings. Its members as a rule have an intelligent conception of their duties and obligations.

It is correct to say, as does the appellant, that the only true measure of recovery for the death of an individual is the value of his life to his estate, had he not come to such untimely end. It is hardly too much to say that this rule is vague, uncertain, and speculative, if not conjectural, but it is the best which judicial wisdom and experience have yet been able to formulate. No evidence is possible of the time which deceased would have lived but for the injury complained of. Had he avoided this injury, death may have met him the next day, week, or year in some other form. In business he might have become a phenomenal success and accumulated millions, or he might have lived to old age and died a pauper. From being a man of good habits and prudence and industry, he might have become a spendthrift or a tramp, or if a man of dissolute habits he might have reformed into an efficient and prosperous citizen. But the demands of justice will not tolerate the idea that human life may be extinguished by the tort of another without the wrongdoer being held to answer [638] therefor in damages, and the rule we have stated is the one which has been devised for this purpose. The principle which underlies it is of unquestionable soundness, but the difficulty which besets its practical application is in the fact that it calls for an estimate or conclusion which must be arrived at by a balancing of mere probabilities and possibilities which we deduce by way of inference from the age, character, habits, condition, education, employment, surroundings, and apparent capacity of the deceased. Fairness to the beneficiaries of the estate on the one hand and of the defendant on the other require that the jury be put in possession of all the facts having the slightest legitimate bearing upon this intricate problem. It is concededly the law of this state that in such case the plaintiff may show that the deceased was a married man. Wheelan v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 85 Ia. 178, 52 N. W. 119. This is said to be competent because "it may fairly be assumed that a married man will be more frugal and industrious and hence will accumulate a larger estate than a single man." Beems v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 58 Ia. 158, 12 N. W. 222.

In Donaldson v. Mississippi, etc. R. Co. 18 Ia. 290, 87 Am. Dec. 391, the question presented in the case now before us was raised in the following manner. The action like the one at bar was brought by the administrator to recover damages for the death of his intestate. Plaintiff offered testimony showing the family of the deceased and their respective ages, as well as his occupation, earnings, and accumulations. The defendant objected thereto on the ground that the inquiries were improper, immaterial, and not the correct method for the ascertainment of the damages. The trial court instructed the jury that, if plaintiff was found entitled to recover, he would be entitled to recover such damages as the estate of deceased had suffered by reason of his death, and nothing should be allowed on account of his pain and suffering before death or for the grief and distress of the family or for their loss of his society. Passing upon the defendant's assignment of error in this respect, this court then said: "When a jury is thus guarded [689] against the allowance of damages for improper causes, it would seem that no prejudice would result if the jury should be fully advised of the exact situation of the deceased, his occupation, annual earnings, age, health, habits, family, and estate. Many of these, and possibly other facts, may have just influence in determining the pecuniary damage to the estate. We would not be understood, however, as determining that evidence as to the number and ages of his children is strictly proper." It would seem from this quotation that, while the statement of facts and argument indulged in by the court indicated its view that the testimony was admissible, yet, as in any event its admission was not prejudicial, the question whether it was technically or "strictly proper" was left undecided.

In the later case of Beems v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 58 Ia. 150, 12 N. W. 222, three members of the court held to the view that such evidence was inadmissible, while the other two, Beck and Rothrock, JJ., reached the opposite conclusion. Somewhat singularly the Donaldson case was not referred to and was apparently overlooked. Indeed, there was no discussion of authorities except a brief mention of Simonson v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 49 Ia. 87, where it was held generally that the jury was entitled to know all the circumstances surrounding the deceased affecting his capacity and disposition for earning a living. Since that time the Beems case has been cited in a criminal case (State v. Rutledge, 135 Ia. 581, 113 N. W. 461) and a bastardy case (State v. Wangler, 151 Ia. 555, 132 N. W. 22), but under circumstances so foreign to those with which we are now dealing that they cannot be said to be in point. As applied to the question before us, we think it must be said that the authority of that precedent has not only been discredited but abandoned.

Bearing upon that proposition, let us first notice that in Hunt v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 26 Ia. 363, Simonson v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 49 Ia. 87, and Moore v. Central R. Co. 47 Ia. 692, we held it competent for the plaintiff in a personal injury case [690] to prove that the injured person was a poor man and had a family dependent upon him for support. In the Simonson case it was said: "The jury was entitled to see the deceased as he was viewed with reference to his prospective capacity and disposition for earning and saving money. No data could be given them for a computation. Taking deceased as he was shown to them, it was for them to say, from their knowledge of business life and all its contingencies, . . . what was the pecuniary injury sustained . . . with reference to his prospective estate." In this connection it is further said that either party might have shown his habits in regard to the use of intoxicating liquor "and in regard to anything else which affected his prospective savings and earnings."

In Stafford v. Oskaloosa, 64 Ia. 253, 20 N. W. 174, the question was again raised, and, after citing approvingly the Hunt, Moore, and Simonson cases, the court proceeds to notice the Beems case as follows: "But in the subsequent case of Beems v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 58 Ia. 150, 12 N. W. 222, it was held by a majority of the court that evidence of the number of the intestate's family, though offered simply as a circumstance tending to stimulate his industry and economy, was incompetent. The majority of the court, as now constituted, are now content to adhere to the holding in Hunt v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. and Moore v. Central R. Co. and the grounds on which the holding is placed."

In the later case of Fish v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 96 Ia. 707, 65 N. W. 995, where question was raised upon the competency of evidence showing accumulations of the deceased, reliance was placed by the defendant upon the Beems case, where the majority seems to class proof of this character with proof of the family relations of the deceased and holds both incompetent. Upon this objection the court again remarks: "All that can be said of that case is that it denies the right of showing accumulations with a view to enhance damages because of it, but the case recognizes the right to show that deceased was dependent on his earnings, and had no money, as a probable inducement [691] to industry. . . . It is not intended by what is said in this opinion to commit this court, as now organized, to an approval or disapproval of the rule of Beems v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. should the question therein as to such evidence hereinafter arise."

In Lowe v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 89 Ia. 420, 56 N. W. 519, evidence was admitted apparently without question that the deceased was married, left no estate, and that his earnings had been applied to the support of his wife and family; and the court in its opinion cites these facts as circumstances to be considered in estimating the value of his life to his estate.

In Wheeler v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 85 Ia. 167, 52 N. W. 119, the court cites the Beems case in support of the proposition that, in finding the value of the life of a man to his estate, evidence of his age, habits, health, means, business, and his married or single estate is admissible.

In Dufree v. Wabash R. Co. 155 Ia. 544, 136 N. W. 605, the plaintiff having shown the wages earned by the deceased, it was developed on cross-examination that he was saving none of his earnings and had no property. On redirect examination plaintiff was permitted to show that deceased was supporting a wife and three children. The defendant assigned error upon this ruling and cited Beems v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. in support of its position. The authority of that precedent was not discussed by the court, for we held that the evidence was admissible in any event as an explanation of the fact that deceased was not making any savings. It is difficult, however, to understand upon what theory the explanation would be material or pertinent if the rule of the Beems case is sound or if the fact itself has no legitimate bearing on the question of the value of the life of the deceased to his estate.

It is evident from the foregoing that this court has never directly or distinctly reaffirmed Beems v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. so far as it relates to this question but, on the contrary, has shown a distinct disinclination to do so, and that taking our cases along this line as a whole, and the reasoning upon [692] which they have been decided, they may fairly be said to affirm the competency of the evidence admitted by the trial court.

For reasons already suggested, most of the adjudicated cases from other states are not specially helpful in this discussion, but there are some in which principles quite analogous to those we here approve have been applied. For example, in Perry v. Lansing, 17 Hun (N. Y.) 34, it was held proper to admit such evidence on the theory that it was proper for the jury to be advised in a general way of the situation and condition in life of the party injured. In Missouri, contrary perhaps to the general trend of cases in that state, it was held admissible to show the existence of wife and family, not as in itself a ground of damage, but to inform the jury of the person's condition and situation in life. Winters v. Hannibal, etc. R. Co. 39 Mo. 468.

The state of Alabama has a statute which its courts have so interpreted that, if it appear that the deceased consumed his wages in support of his family and was making no accumulations, the measure of recovery is limited to the loss so occasioned, but, if he was making any savings, then the administrator may recover, as in this state, the entire present value of the estate which the deceased would probably have accumulated had he lived. Alabama Mineral R. Co. v. Jones, 114 Ala. 519, 21 So. 507, 62 Am. St. Rep. 121, and cases there cited. Applying this statute, the court in the cited case says:

"As a circumstance aiding the solution of this question, it was competent to show how many and what dependents there were and their ages."

The Nebraska statute is unlike our own in that the right of action is given for injury to the support of dependant relatives, but the reasoning of that court upon the competency of evidence tending to show the extent of such loss is very applicable in cases like the one at bar. There, in an action by a father for the death of a son, the court says that the fact of the existence of a mother and other children was entirely [693] admissible, "not as a direct ground for the jury's action, but as showing what the deceased was doing and likely to do to make his life pecuniarily valuable to plaintiff." If such fact is evidence of what the deceased was doing or likely to do to make his life of pecuniary value to the parent, it is no less competent to show the pecuniary value of his life to his estate, where the right of recovery is for its benefit.

It is held in Wisconsin that in an action by the widow of the deceased or for her benefit, although she is entitled to recover only for the pecuniary damage resulting to herself, she may prove the number and ages of her children. Hamann v. Milwaukee Bridge Co. 136 Wis. 39, 116 N. W. 864.

It is to be said also that the precedents from other states relied upon by the appellant holding it incompetent to show the fact that the deceased left a family of children are equally unanimous in holding it improper to show that he was a married man or otherwise show to the jury the facts as to his domestic or family relations. Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Collinsworth, 45 Fla. 403, 33 So. 513; Stockton v. Frey, 4 Gill (Md.) 406, 45 Am. Dec. 138; Baltimore, etc. R. Co. v. Camp, 81 Fed. 808, 54 U. S. App. 110, 26 C. C. A. 626; Sesler v. Rolfe Coal, etc. Co. 51 W. Va. 327, 41 S. E. 216. The majority opinion in the Beems case departs from this rule so far as relates to the married condition of the deceased, and we have committed ourselves to the same view in several cases, as already noted.

But it is scarcely possible to conceive of any good reason for admitting proof that defendant had a wife, which does not equally apply to the fact that he had children. In the Beems case both majority and minority justified the admission of the former upon the sufficient ground that "from observation and experience it may fairly be assumed that a married man will be more frugal and industrious and hence will accumulate a larger estate than a single man;" but, having said this, the opinion proceeds with palpable disregard of the logic of the situation and of its own concession to hold it improper to show the existence of children and state as a [694] reason therefor that "observation and experience do not teach that one's income is likely to increase in the same ratio as the number of his children." It would have been scarcely less pertinent to have said that observation and experience do not show that, other things being equal, a married man lives longer than a single man. It is sufficient answer to either to say that no one contends otherwise, and the quip with which the competency of the testimony is there turned aside does not partake of the character of argument. If it be true (and it stands admitted in this court) that proof that deceased was a married man is of some probative force in estimating the probable value of his life to his estate because the responsibilities of wedlock tend to stimulate him to industry, prudence, and economy, shall the court shut its eyes to the equally patent fact that a child or children in the family, whether one or many, has an equal, if not greater, influence in the same direction? It may be said that the dependent members of a man's household may be so numerous as to exhaust his earnings and decrease rather than increase the likelihood of his accumulating estate. This is true, and in such case the defense is in no position to complain of the admission of the testimony. The writer has been unable to find that any court in any other jurisdiction has drawn any distinction between the admissibility of proof that the deceased in such cases was a married man and proof that he left children.

We have already called attention to the peculiar difficulties surrounding the presentation and trial of these cases and to the fact that, when all is said, the issue goes to the jury for what we have called a balancing of the probabilities and possibilities of the extent of that financial success, if any, which would have attended the life of the deceased, had his career not been prematurely arrested by the negligence complained of. We think that no impartial arbitrator, to whom that question might be submitted, would fail to inquire and ascertain, so far as practicable, not only what the deceased had already done or accomplished and the facts as to [695] his age, health, capacity, and earning powers, but also as to his exact situation in life and the surroundings and influences, if any, which, according to common knowledge and observation, tend to the development of industry and thrift. It is to be remembered that actions of this nature were unknown to the common law. The right thereto is a creature of statute, and investigation will show that the provisions made in the different states are of such varying character that decisions thereunder afford few precedents of much value except in the jurisdictions where they have been announced. As the action is not of common law origin and the injury to be compensated for involves investigation into matters not before made the subject of judicial inquiry, it is not surprising that the rules of evidence therein should become involved in apparent confusion, though it is to be said that, when we consider the different statutes of the various states, the confusion is perhaps more apparent than real, a situation to which the compilers and annotators of decisions have not always given due attention. The construction and administration of our own statute is of course a matter for our own courts; and, notwithstanding there has been some uncertainty of expression with reference to the proper limitations upon the introduction of evidence, we think we are fairly committed to principles and rules recognizing the materiality and competency of testimony such as we have now under consideration. We also think them fully sustained by sound reasoning and the teachings of human experience. The assignment of error upon the admission of this testimony is therefore overruled.

It is next said that the court's instruction to the jury that the amount of plaintiff's damage, if any, was not to be increased by reason of the deceased having left children, and that evidence concerning the children had been admitted only as bearing upon the question of inducement or incentive to industry in the deceased, is contradictory and misleading. We find nothing in the [696] instruction of which appellant can complain. The attempt of the court to limit the effect of the testimony was favorable to the defense. It said to the jury in effect that the mere fact that the deceased had children who survived him was not in itself a ground for the recovery of damages, but that if the plaintiff was found otherwise entitled to recover it might be considered for what it was worth as bearing upon deceased's incentives to industry. If we are correct in holding the testimony admissible at all, then the limitation tended to restrict rather than to enlarge the plaintiff's right of recovery, and defendant has suffered no prejudice. Whether such restriction was called for under the record we need not decide.

Error is assigned upon the ruling of the court striking out testimony of a statement by the deceased that he could not obtain life insurance because of his health. We think the testimony should not have been stricken because it was a circumstance, though one of slight importance, bearing upon his condition of health, and consequently upon his expectancy of life and ability to labor; but these circumstances and conditions were quite fully inquired into, and we think the exclusion of this particular item was not a prejudicial error.

The same may be said of one or two other similar rulings. There was no error in admitting complaints made by the deceased of pain and suffering soon after his injury. It is true the administrator was not entitled to recover for the pain and suffering sustained by the deceased, and the jury were so instructed, but the rule which admits the complaints of the injured person as bearing upon the nature, extent, and location of his injuries is quite elementary. Hamilton v. Mendota Coal, etc. Co. 120 Ia. 149, 94 N. W. 282; 7 Ency. Evidence, 386.

The complaint that the damages allowed ($8,000) are excessive cannot be sustained. The deceased was still a young [697] man, with an expectancy of life of thirty-six years. He was a boiler maker earning from $56 to $108 per month; and, while as we have said he was probably not a man of robust health, he was engaged in labor at his trade and; so far as appears, was in no respect incapacitated to pursue the same, and no circumstances are disclosed rendering it necessarily improbable that he would live out his expectancy maintaining the physical efficiency of the average man.

We find no prejudicial error in the record, and the judgment of the district court is Affirmed.

Evans, Gaynor, Withrow, and Ladd, J. J., concur.

PRESTON, J. (dissenting).—I regret that I am unable to agree with my Associates in regard to the admissibility of the evidence as to the number of children and instruction No. eleven and one-half on that subject. I shall set out the record more fully than has been done in the majority opinion.

Plaintiff, Mrs. Nicoll, formerly Mrs. McNulty, was permitted to testify over objections as follows: "Q. Did he leave any family other than yourself? Did he have any children? The Court: It is not admitted for the purpose of affecting damages in any way, but it is done for some other purpose. A. Four. Q. What were their ages at the time of his death? A. The oldest was ten, the youngest was a little over a year old." In this connection, the court gave the following instruction: "(Eleven and one-half) You are instructed that there can be no recovery in this case for pain and suffering endured by the deceased resulting from the injury received by him, and you are also instructed that the remarriage of the widow of the deceased is not to be considered by you in diminishing the amount of damages sustained by said estate, if any you find. And on the other hand the amount of damages, if any you find, is not to be increased [698] by reason of the deceased having children that he left surviving him; evidence of his children and the number thereof being admitted by the court solely as bearing upon the question of inducement or incentive to habits of industry in case the deceased had lived."

It is urged by appellant that admitting the evidence, as to the children, was erroneous; that the latter part of the instruction did authorize the jury to enhance the damages by reason of deceased having left children; and that the last two sentences therein are in conflict with each other. It may seem that, even though this evidence was not admissible, the exception taken to its admission was canceled by the instruction of the court that the damages were not to be increased by reason of the fact that deceased left children surviving. It has been held that where the verdict is not excessive, and the court instructed the jury to disregard the evidence, the error in admitting it is not fatal. 13 Cyc. 197, and cases, some of which are to the contrary. But it is claimed by appellant that the verdict is excessive, and that the instruction did not cure the error because the latter part of it did authorize the jury to enhance the damages. The object in introducing this evidence was, no doubt, to inform the jury that deceased had infant children dependent upon him for support. It is impossible to determine how far the assessment of damages was controlled by this evidence as to plaintiff's family of small children. The reasonable inference is that it had some influence upon the verdict. The damages in such cases are more or less uncertain in any event, and the evidence should be limited to legitimate elements of damage. Appellant contends that the question as to the admissibility of such evidence has been settled in the case of Beems v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 58 Ia. 150, 12 N. W. 222, and that it is not admissible for any purpose in a case of this character. Appellee says that case was a three to two decision; that it is not in harmony with prior holdings, has not been followed since, is unsound; and that it has been an open question in this state for thirty years. It appears [699] to me that the tendency of our former cases is to exclude such evidence. The question as to evidence in regard to children was not involved in the Stafford case, or the Wheelan case, and many of the other cases cited in the majority opinion. It is being now decided for the first time in this jurisdiction, or any other, so far as I am able to discover, that such evidence is competent, under such a statute as ours, where the question is as to damages to the estate.

As stated, some of the cases hold that the evidence is not competent, but that if the court instructs the jury that it must not be considered as affecting damages, and the damages are not excessive, there is no prejudice. Other cases hold that, if such evidence is admitted and the verdict is excessive, it may be cured by remittitur, because the only effect of the evidence is to enhance the recovery. Chicago, etc. R. v. Batsel, 100 Ark. 526, 140 S. W. 726. Though this is denied in Jones, etc. Co. v. George, 227 Ill. 64, 81 N. E. 4, 10 Ann. Cas. 286, to which I shall again refer.

But the cases all hold that the evidence is incompetent. I am not prepared to say that a reversal should follow in every case where the evidence as to children is admitted. Cases might arise where the court instructed the jury squarely to not consider it as affecting damages and where the evidence is such that it could be fairly said that the verdict is not excessive and that there was no prejudice. But that is not the question being now determined. The question is: Is the evidence competent? The fact that jurors may learn about it on the street corners, or in the public prints, or incidentally in the courtroom is not, as I think, a reason for holding it competent.

As an original proposition, I should be inclined to say that the recovery should be the same whether a man is married or single. Conceding the rule to have been established by this court that evidence that the party is married is competent, I would not extend the rule to include evidence as to children. It occurs to me there are reasons for excluding evidence [700] as to children which would not apply to the question whether the party was married. There is but one wife, who is an adult, but there may be many children, some of tender age. But the question as to whether evidence that a person deceased, or injured, is married is not the question here, and I shall not discuss it. The only question now is whether it is competent to show the number and ages of children.

I concede that it is proper for a jury to be advised, in a general way, of the situation and condition in life of the party injured, as held in the cited New York case of Perry v. Lansing, and other cases, but it seems to me the argument in support of the proposition that the evidence as to the number and ages of children is admissible is on the theory that children would be a greater inducement to earn and save. If it is an inducement for greater effort and stricter economy, the effect would be to increase the value of the estate, and, if that is so, the estate would suffer greater damage; therefore the recovery should be larger. I understand the majority to say this is not the purpose, but the reasoning and cases in support of the proposition are, as I think, based upon the theory that it is for that purpose. For instance, it is said that under the Nebraska statute, authorizing a recovery for the injury to support of dependent relatives, such evidence is competent, and that the reasoning of that court in such a case is applicable here. That such evidence is admissible, "not as a direct ground for the jury's action, but as showing what the deceased was doing, and likely to do, to make his life pecuniarily valuable to plaintiff." If the fact of having children is likely to make his life pecuniarily valuable, it should enhance the damages; if less valuable then the damages should be decreased. It would be one way or the other, depending on the character of the children, whether they were a help or otherwise.

I do not say that the evidence is not competent under the Nebraska statute, where damages do not go to the estate, as in Iowa. What I am trying to show is the false position of [701] the majority when they say it is not admitted for the purpose of increasing or decreasing the damages, when it cannot have any other effect, and is not and cannot be admissible for any other purpose. It seems to be the theory under the Nebraska holding that the fact of having children would make the life more valuable, while in at least one Iowa case (Dufree v. Wabash R. Co. 155 Ia. 544, 136 N. W. 695) the thought seems to be that the life would be less valuable. This is so, or else I do not comprehend the ruling in that case. Here was the situation in that case, as stated in the majority opinion: "The plaintiff having shown the wages earned by the deceased, it was developed on cross-examination that he was saving none of his earnings and had no property. On re-direct examination plaintiff was permitted to show that deceased was supporting a wife and three children. The defendant assigned error upon this ruling and cited Beems v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. in support of its position. The authority of that precedent was not discussed by the court, for we held that the evidence was admissible, in any event, as an explanation of the fact that deceased was not making any savings." If he was unable to save anything because of the expense of raising his children, what other effect could it have but to decrease the value of his estate?

It should be kept in mind that this is not a case under the Employers' Liability Act but is an action for damages to the estate of deceased. In State v. Rutledge, 135 Ia. 581, 113 N. W. 461, a criminal case, it was held such evidence was not proper, and in it the Beems case is referred to and approved. In State v. Wangler, 151 Ia. 555, 132 N. W. 22, a bastardy case, the ruling was the same, and the Beems case referred to, but it was held that in such a case there was no prejudice, on the theory, no doubt, that the form of the verdict in a bastardy case is guilty or not guilty, and the jury do not have to do with fixing the amount which shall be allowed for the support of the child. But these two cases do not quite reach the point now under consideration. The question first arose in Donaldson v. Mississippi, etc. R. Co. 18 Ia. 280, 87 Am. Dec. 391, but was not squarely decided; [702] the court holding that, because the jury were, by the instructions, guarded against allowance of damages for improper causes, there was no prejudice. The court did say: "We would not be understood, however, as determining that evidence as to the number and ages of his children is strictly proper." In Lowe v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 89 Ia. 420, 423, 56 N. W. 519; decided since the Beems case; it is stated that it was shown by the evidence, among other things, that deceased left a wife and three children, but the question now being considered was not raised in any manner.

Under statutes which provide that the damages for wrongful death inure to the benefit of the family, such evidence is admissible. Baltimore, etc. R. Co. v. Mackey, 157 U. S. 72, 15 S. Ct. 491, 39 U. S. (L. ed.) 624 (2d ed.). In that case the statute excludes the creditors of deceased from any interest in the recovery and declares not only that the judgment shall inure exclusively to the benefit of his family but that the damages shall be assessed with reference to the injury done to the widow and next of kin. This seems to be the distinction running through the cases that, if the damages inure to the benefit of the family, it may be shown what persons compose the family, but not so if the damages go to the estate, as in this case. The question here is: What was the value of the life of the deceased to his estate? The number of his children can have no bearing on that question. The measure of the recovery and the elements to be considered are stated in Grace v. Minneapolis, etc. R. Co. 153 Ia. 418, 432, 133 N. W. 672; and Neal v. Sheffield Brick etc. Co. 151 Ia. 690, 695, 130 N. W. 398.

The thought in the last sentence of instruction eleven and one-half that evidence as to the children is to be considered on the question of inducement or incentive to habits of industry, etc., is on the theory, doubtless; that, as stated by the minority in the Beems case, it "would largely add to the value of his personal services to his own estate." The majority opinion in this case says the purpose is "to stimulate him to industry, prudence, and economy." It would seem [703] that, if this be true, the only effect it could have would be to increase the value of his estate, and thus necessarily to increase the damages, so that the last two clauses in instruction eleven and one half are in conflict and cannot be reconciled.

Some of the cases exclude evidence as to children because its admission is likely to prejudice the jury. It was said by a majority of the court in the Beems case that observation and experience do not teach that one's income is likely to increase in the same ratio as the number of his children. It would seem that there are other reasons for excluding such evidence. If it is thought that children would be an inducement to habits of industry, and thus increase the value of his estate, how long would the inducement continue? Would it continue during the entire expectancy of the person injured or deceased? Would there be other children born after the injury and after the trial? Would some of these die? What is their expectancy? What are their habits? Would their earnings, until they reach their majority, add to the estate, or would it cost more to raise them than they earn? Suppose a man has six minor children, who are dutiful, in good health, industrious, and saving; they would, when old enough, be a great help and aid to the parent in accumulating and saving money. But suppose the children are sickly, requiring medical expense, they are unable to work, or suppose they are lazy and spendthrifts, would they enhance or decrease the value of the estate? We will say that the parent is injured or killed. If proof as to the number of children is competent, then the man with the family of children who are not helpful obtains the same advantage by such proof as the man whose family is an aid to him, unless all these matters are gone into. Would defendant's attorney dare to cross-examine and show that the children are cripples or sickly? For the purpose of argument, I am assuming at this point that the sympathies of the jury would not be aroused, and that they would fairly consider such evidence for the only [704] purpose for which it could be considered, and that is to either enhance or decrease damages. If it be competent to show the number of children composing the family of the person injured or deceased, why would it not be competent to show that the parents or grandchildren of such person were members of his family, if that be the fact? These and other questions naturally arise. It seems to the writer that these matters are too remote, uncertain, speculative, and would involve the investigation of collateral matters. To hold that such evidence is admissible necessarily overrules the Beems case and overturns a precedent of thirty years' standing, is against the overwhelming weight of authority, and establishes a dangerous rule.

If the evidence is properly in the record, it would be legitimate to refer to it in argument to the jury, and hereafter, in personal injury and like cases, we may expect it to be used to the best advantage, and in all probability we will be compelled to reverse cases because of it.

Appellee cites Hamann v. Milwaukee Bridge Co. 136 Wis. 39, 116 N. W. 854, and quotes therefrom as follows: "In an action for negligent death, by decedent's widow, suing as administratrix, she can show the state of her health, and the number of her children; the jury being properly cautioned that she can recover only for the pecuniary damage resulting to herself from the death." The opinion is brief on this point. It cites two prior decisions of the Wisconsin court, one of which Lawson v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 64 Wis. 447, 24 N. W. 618, 54 Am. Rep. 634, cites Donaldson v. Mississippi, etc. R. Co. 18 Ia. 280, 87 Am. Dec. 391, as authority; and Abbot v. McCadden, 81 Wis. 563, 51 N. W. 1079, 29 Am. St. Rep. 910, in which the court says: "The court charged the jury, on the subject of damages, that the damages 'must be the money value only to her and her children which the life of the deceased was worth to her and them on the day of his death.' . . . This was error. The fact that there are children left surviving, whose support will be thrown on the plaintiff, is proper to be shown in evidence and to be considered by [706] the jury; but the damages recoverable are those which the widow has suffered, not those which the children have suffered." From this it appears that there is a different statute in Wisconsin from ours by which the damages are for the benefit of the widow and not the estate.

Appellee also cites as being to the same effect as the Hamann case, 7 Enc. of Evidence, 439; but an examination of the text shows that this is the rule in states which by statute allow the right of action for the benefit of the next of kin of deceased. He also cites 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 941. But at page 940 of the same volume the same distinction is made which I make. It is there stated that, where the action is brought by the widow for the death of her husband, the ground of the admissibility of such evidence is that by the death of the father the responsibility of supporting and rearing the children is cast upon the plaintiff, their mother, and it is proper to show the extent and character of this responsibility thus cast upon her. Also 13 Cyc. 358, and numerous cases there cited. The text here refers to the number and condition of persons dependent upon deceased. Some of the cases there cited are under statutes such as I have mentioned. In my opinion the rule announced in the Beems case as to evidence in regard to children of a deceased person is correct, and that it is sustained by the weight of authority. In some of the cases the party injured was deceased, in others he survived, but the rule is the same, for in one case he is suing for his own injuries, and in the other his representative is suing for damages to his estate. As sustaining the rule in the Beems case, see 13 Cyc. 196, and cases, also Pennsylvania Co. v. Roy, 102 U. S. 451, 26 U. S. (L. ed.) 141, 145 (2d ed.); Baltimore, etc. Ry. v. Camp, 81 Fed. 808, 26 C. C. A. 626, 54 U. S. App. 111; Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Binion, 107 Ala.

652, 18 So. 78; Dayharsh v. Hannibal, etc. R. Co. 103 Mo. 577, 15 S. W. 555, 23 Am. St. Rep. 900; Jones, etc. Co. v. George, 227 Ill. 64, 81 N. E. 4, 10 Ann. Cas. 285; Vandalia Coal Co. v. Yemm, 175 Ind. 524, 92 N. E. 49, 94 N. E. 881; [706] Simpson v. Foundation Co. 201 N. Y. 479, 95 N. E. 10, Ann. Cas. 1912B 321; Carlile v. Bentley, 81 Neb. 715, 116 N. W. 772; Maynard v. Oregon R. Co. 46 Ore. 15, 78 Pac. 983, 68 L. R. A. 477; Ft. Worth Iron Works v. Stokes, 33 Tex. Civ. App. 218, 76 S. W. 231; St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. Adams, 74 Ark. 326, 85 S. W. 768, 86 S. W. 287, 109 Am. St. Rep. 85; Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Eakins, 108 Ky. 465, 45 S. W. 529, 46 S. W. 496, 47 S. W. 872; Chicago, etc. R. v. Batsel, 100 Ark. 526, 140 S. W. 726; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Hammerland, 70 Kan. 888, 79 Pac. 152; Rio Grande Southern R. Co. v. Campbell, 44 Colo. 1, 96 Pac. 986; Standard Oil Co. v. Tierney, 92 Ky. 367, 17 S. W. 1025, 14 L. R. A. 677, 36 Am. St. Rep. 595; Union Pac. R. v. McMican, 194 Fed. 393, 114 C. C. A. 311. These are not all the cases which might be cited. Many others are cited in some of these. It would unduly extend this dissent to quote at any length from these cases, but I wish to refer to a few of them.

In Pennsylvania Co. v. Roy, supra, a verdict for $10,000 was set aside and the cause reversed solely because of the admission of such evidence.

In the Kansas case (Union Pac. R. Co. v. Hammerland, supra), it was held that the evidence was not competent, and the court said the question is not debatable.

In the Kentucky case of Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Eakins, supra, the court quotes from the opinion in the case of Chicago v. O'Brennan, 65 Ill. 163, as follows: "Was this evidence admissible? If it was, then it would have been competent to have gone further and shown all the circumstances of the family, such as that the mother was an invalid, that one of the daughters was blind, that one son had accidentally lost a leg, etc., if such had been the case, so as to present a most pitiable picture of a helpless family dependent upon appellee for support as a lecturer, for, as the evidence had no place in the case but as a stimulant to the jury, it would have been just as competent to make the stimulant strong as weak. But was it competent at all? It is an elementary rule that evidence must be confined to the points at issue. There [707] was no point in issue to which this evidence had any relevancy. This sort of attempt to foist irrelevant matters upon the attention of the jury, with a view to creating a personal interest, is too often the secondary resort of a party on the witness stand." The Kentucky case states that this rule has received the approval of that court in a number of recently decided cases, citing them.

In the case of Jones, etc. Co. v. George, 227 Ill. 64, 81 N. E. 4, 10 Ann. Cas. 285, supra, it was said:

On the trial of this case appellee was allowed to prove that he was a married man and had three children. The evidence was objected to, and the objection overruled. The damages recoverable in this case can only be compensatory. The domestic relations, the financial standing of the parties, are therefore irrelevant. . . . Youngblood v. South Carolina, etc. R. Co. 60 S. C. 9, 38 S. E. 232, 85 Am. St. Rep. 835, and note, where many other authorities are collected. . . . The error in admitting this evidence is virtually admitted by appellee and was recognized by the appellate court, but it was thought that the remittitur of $1,500 ought in some way to cure this error. We cannot assent to this view. Evidence of this character not only tends to enhance the damages, but it is calculated to arouse a sympathy for appellee which is liable to unconsciously influence a jury in the decision of other controverted questions of fact in the appellee's favor. It would be a dangerous precedent to hold that a party might introduce irrelevant testimony which would appeal to the sympathy, passions or prejudices of a jury in such a way as to insure him the verdict on all doubtful questions of fact, then permit the trial court to estimate how much of a gross sum awarded as damages was due to such irrelevant testimony, and deduct that from the total verdict and render judgment for the balance, and thus cure an error, but for which the verdict might have been in favor of the other party.

Early New York and Alabama cases are cited in the majority opinion. I have not examined them but the later cases from those states which I cite hold that the evidence is inadmissible.

[708] In my opinion, the evidence as to the number and ages of the children was not admissible in this case for any purpose, and the instruction cannot be sustained because of the conflict therein. I would reverse.

Deemer, J., joins in the dissent.

In Kramm v. Stockton Electric R. Co. 22 Cal. App. 737, 136 Pac. 523, the court said: "It was strictly proper in this case to show that the deceased left a family who had suffered pecuniary loss by reason of his death through the tortious act of the defendant, and to show the extent of such loss with reasonable certainty. In order to determine such loss, the jury were entitled to be informed of whom said family consisted—whether of persons who had never received pecuniary assistance from the deceased or who were not dependent upon him for nurture, care, and support, or of persons who had received such assistance and were so dependent, and would, by reason of their minority and consequent helplessness, have still required and been entitled to such assistance and care from him, had he not lost his life."

In Michigan where an action is brought for the benefit of all those who are interested in the estate of the deceased, evidence of the family relations of the decedent is admissible. Breckenfelder v. Lake Shore, etc. R. Co. 79 Mich. 560, 44 N. W. 957; Philip v. Heraty, 135 Mich. 446, 97 N. W. 963, 11 Detroit Leg. N. 171, rehearing denied Phillips v. Heraty, 135 Mich. 453, 100 N. W. 186, 11 Detroit Leg. N. 174, 100 N. W. 186. But where the suit is to recover the damages sustained by the deceased, evidences that the decedent left a family is immaterial and ought not to be admitted, but its admission is not reversible error where there is no claim for damages based on such evidence. Olivier v. Houghton County St. R. Co. 138 Mich. 242, 101 N. W. 530, 11 Detroit Leg. N. 559.

There is some authority contrary to the majority view. Thus it has been held that the number of persons in the family of the deceased cannot be shown. Kesler v. Smith, 66 N. C. 154. And it was held in Kelepech v. Donald, 4 Wash. 436, 30 Pac. 991, 31 Am. St. Rep. 936, that it was error to allow the plaintiff in an action for death by wrongful act, who was the widow of the deceased, to testify as to her children.

In Kentucky it has been held that it is error to admit testimony that the deceased is survived by a wife or a child or children. Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Eakin, 103 Ky. 465, 45 S. W. 529, 46 S. W. 496, 47 S. W. 872; Chesapeake, etc. R. Co. v. Reeves, 11 S. W. 464, 11 Ky. L. Rep. 14; Southern R. Co. v. Evans, 63 S. W. 445, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 568. Compare Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Mahony's Adm'x, 7 Bush (Ky.) 235. In Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Eakin, supra, the court said: "This instruction is objectionable also for another reason. It directed the jury to find for the plaintiff 'the damages sustained by the widow and children, not exceeding the amount sued for.' They were not parties to the action, and this part of the instruction, when considered in connection with the testimony which was permitted to go to the jury over the objection of appellant,—that decedent was a married man and left three children,—it was extremely prejudicial, as it diverted the attention of the jury from the duty of fixing the actual sum of money which would fairly compensate the estate of decedent for the destruction of his power to earn money and directed it to the affliction which had overtaken the family by reason of his death." In Cincinnati, etc. R. Co. v. Sampson, 97 Ky. 65, 30 S. W. 12, 16 Ky. L. Rep. 819, however, it was held that a judgment should not be reversed because evidence was admitted which showed that the deceased left one child where it appeared that this fact was not made an element of damage in any instruction by the trial court. And in Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Taaffe, 106 Ky. 535, 50 S. W. 850, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 64, it was held that where testimony is admitted showing that the deceased left a family it will not cause a reversal on appeal if its admission is not prejudicial to any substantial right of the defendant.

It was held in Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Kelly, 100 Ky. 421, 38 S. W. 852, 40 S. W. 452, that the widow and infant children of the deceased have a right to be present at the trial. To the same effect see Boyd v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 236 Mo. 54, 139 S. W. 561.

And see the reported case. In Alabama Mineral R. Co. v. Jones, 121 Ala. 113, 25 So. 814, modifying 114 Ala. 519, 21 So. 507, 62 Am. St. Rep. 121, however, it was held to be necessary only to prove, where recovery was sought of the amount which the deceased would have expended on the defendants if his expectancy of life had not been disappointed, that he had persons who would have been distributees if he had left an estate, dependent on him for support, and there was no need of showing their ages.

In South Omaha Water Works Co. v. Vocasek, 62 Neb. 710, 87 N. W. 536, it was held that the fact that there were a mother and children who were supported by the deceased's next of kin, his father, to whose support the decedent was contributing, made it competent to show the existence of the mother and children for the purpose of bringing out the fact that he was doing something to make his life pecuniarily valuable to his father.

Where a mother as administratrix sues to recover for the wrongful death of her minor son she may give in evidence the fact that she has children and their number. Thompson v. Johnston Bros. Co. 86 Wis. 576, 57 N. W. 298.

In Galveston, etc. R. Co. v. Contreras, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 489, 72 S. W. 1051, it was held that in an action by a posthumous child of the deceased to recover damages for his death evidence could be introduced by the defendant to show the existence of a widow and other children of the decedent who were also entitled to recover the pecuniary damages which accrued to each for the death of the father.

Where a declaration for death by wrongful act stated that the widow of the deceased was pregnant and it was further alleged therein that the deceased left a widow and unborn child as his next of kin, it was held that it was not error to permit proof of the facts that a child was born and died subsequent to the death of the deceased. Preble v. Wabash R. Co. 243 Ill. 340, 90 N. E. 716, modifying Preble v. Wabash R. Co. 149 Ill. App. 584.

In Bromley v. Binningham Mineral R. Co. 95 Ala. 397, 11 So. 341, it was held that an offer of proof by the administrator of the deceased that he left a wife and minor child surviving him who depended on him for support ought to be received if followed by evidence that the decedent expended, in whole or in part, his earnings on them.

Limitation of Rule.

The proof of the domestic relation of the deceased must ordinarily be confined to a showing as to his immediate family, or to proof as to the existence of the relatives who are beneficiaries of the cause of action. In Cook v. Cleveland, etc. R. Co. 143 Ill. App. 109, it was held that evidence to show the number, ages and sex of the children of one of the deceased's daughters, and that decedent had supported them for a long period, was inadmissible. To the same effect as to the decedent's half sister's children see Murphy v. Erie R. Co. 202 N. Y. 242, 95 N. E. 699, wherein the court said: "In the case at bar the plaintiff was permitted to prove the number of her children. These children were not next of kin to the decedent. This evidence was supplemented by proof of specific services and expenditures rendered and made by the decedent for the benefit of these children. This evidence was admitted upon the theory that it tended to prove the pecuniary loss which was sustained by the plaintiff, the mother of these children, in the death of her intestate. That is a theory, however, which is obviously fallacious, for its effect is to place before the jury extraneous facts calculated to excite sympathy and induce a verdict based on elements of loss not contemplated by the statute." Compare South Omaha Water Works Co. v. Vocasek, 62 Neb. 710, 87 N. W. 536.

WARD.

Minnesota Supreme Court—December 18,

127 Minn. 510; 150 N. W. 209.

Malicious Mischief — Indictment Sufficient.

An indictment for malicious injury to property is not bad because it fails to charge that defendant acted "maliciously."

[See 128 Am. St. Rep. 173.]

Expert Evidence — Correspondence of Logs with Stumps.

It is not error to receive as evidence the opinions of qualified witnesses as to whether logs found in defendant's possession came from stumps on the land of the complaining witnesses.

Witnesses — Juror at Former Trial.

Jurors on a former trial may testify on a subsequent trial as to physical facts coming to their knowledge during a view made by them on the former trial. It is not material that the former verdict was set aside because of the misconduct of the jury in conducting unauthorized experiments during the view.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

It is not error to permit jurors on the former trial to give their opinions or conclusions derived from and based upon the knowledge acquired on the view.

[See note at end of this case.]

Malicious Mischief — Trial — Rulings Approved.

There was no error in rulings in the admission or rejection of evidence, or in failing to give a requested instruction.

Evidence Sufficient.

The evidence sustains the verdict.

Indictment — Sufficiency — Words Charging Malice.

The words "wilfully and unlawfully" embody the idea of maliciousness.

[See generally 16 Ann. Cas. 336.]

Appeal from District Court, Wright county: GIDDINGS, Judge.

Criminal action. Robert Ward convicted of malicious injury to property and appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

W. H. Cutting and James E. Madigan for appellant.

Lyndon A. Smith, John C. Nethaway and Stephen A. Johnson for respondent.

[511] BUNN, J.—Defendant was convicted under an indictment charging malicious injury to property, and appealed from the judgment.

The sufficiency of the indictment is challenged, as are certain rulings in the admission of evidence, and the sufficiency of the evidence to warrant the conviction.

1. The indictment was in the language of the statute, G. S. 1913, § 8934, subd. 1. It charged that defendant on or about March 10, 1912, at the town of Maple Lake in Wright county, wilfully and unlawfully cut down two maple trees then standing and growing upon the lands of others, the owners being named and the lands particularly described. The alleged defect in the indictment is that it did not allege that the cutting was done "maliciously." There is no doubt that to constitute an offense under the statute, there must be an element of malice. Price v. Denison, 95 Minn. 106, 103 N. W. 728. But it is not necessary to use the word malicious in the indictment. The words "wilfully and unlawfully" embody the idea of maliciousness, and they are the words used in the statute. We think the indictment was sufficient.

The rulings on evidence that are complained of may be grouped into two classes: (1) Receiving expert opinion evidence on the [512] question whether two logs found with defendant's name on them came from the stumps on the land of the complaining witnesses; (2) permitting jurors on a former trial to testify as to their observations and experiments on a view they were permitted to take during the trial, and their opinions derived from such observations and experiments.

The facts are as follows: The land involved was timber land owned by certain sisters, and known as the Butler woods. A brother "looked after" it. Two maple trees were found to be cut down and the logs hauled away. Two green maple logs were afterwards found in a nearby mill yard, both marked "R. Ward" on the end. The logs were measured, and then the stumps in the woods and the distances between them and the tree tops on the ground. It was testified that defendant, when asked where he got the logs, replied that he cut them on "our own place," referring to the farm of his father. It was shown that there were no recently cut maple stumps on the Ward land, and no stumps or trees as large as the logs in controversy. The tops of the stumps in the Butler woods and the ends of the two logs were cut off and used as exhibits in the case. It was in evidence that defendant had never asked for permission to cut any logs in the Butler woods. He did not take the stand on this trial, though he did on the former one. It appears that his defense and testimony then was that the logs were cut on his father's land.

2. We think it was a proper case for expert opinion evidence. The opinions of woodsmen who had examined the logs and stumps and measured the distance between the latter and the tree tops, and who had examined the stumps on the Ward land, would naturally be of assistance to the jury in determining whether the logs were from the trees in the Butler woods or from the Ward land. This is the consideration which should in the main govern the admission or exclusion of opinion evidence. We see no abuse of discretion in receiving this testimony.

3. On the former trial the jurors were permitted to go to the woods and view the stumps and tree tops. They conducted experiménts, and their verdict of guilty was set aside because of this impropriety. On this trial many of them were called as witnesses [513] by the state, and were permitted over objections not only to testify as to what they observed on the view, and their experiments, but to state their opinions derived from such observations and experiments. It is quite clear upon principle and well established by decided cases that jurors upon a former trial may testify on a subsequent trial as to physical facts coming to their knowledge during a view made by them on the former trial. Hughes v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 126 Wis. 525, 106 N. W. 526; Cramer v. Burlington, 42 Ia. 315; Woolfolk v. State, 85 Ga. 69, 99, 11 S. E. 814; Hull v. Seaboard Air Line Ry. 76 S. C. 278, 57 S. E. 28, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1213; 40 Cyc. 2236. It is not material that the former verdict was set aside because of the misconduct of the jury in conducting unauthorized experiments. This was not receiving the evidence or affidavits of jurors to impeach their verdict. That verdict had already been set aside.

4. It is a question of more doubt whether the opinions of the jurors, derived from the knowledge acquired on the view, were properly received. The opinions might be influenced by the testimony on the former trial, and not wholly based on the view. But this bears rather on the weight of the evidence than on the question of its admissibility. Holding as we have that opinion evidence was properly received, and that the former jurors were competent witnesses, it would seem to follow that their opinions, based on the facts ascertained on the view were properly received. In Woolfolk v. State, 85 Ga. 69, 11 S. E. 814, cited above, defendant was convicted of the murder of his father, and a new trial was granted. On the first trial certain drawers with blood stains thereon were in evidence and taken to the jury room when the jury retired. On the second trial two of the former jurors were allowed to testify as to their conclusions that there was the blood print of a hand on the drawers. It was contended that it was impossible for the witnesses to say what effect the other testimony on the trial had, in causing their minds to form the conclusions that they saw the print of a hand. It was held that the evidence was admissible, the objection going more against its weight rather than against its admissibility. In the case at bar the jurors declared that their opinions were based [514] upon the facts learned on the view. We cannot say that they were influenced by evidence received on the trial. While for the reasons suggested, we do not approve of the practice, we are unable to hold that it was error to permit the jurors, as well as the other witnesses, to state their conclusions based upon the knowledge acquired on the view. We have no right to say, as counsel for defendant does, that the former jurors were allowed to give generally their conclusions as to defendant's guilt, and the reasons why they convicted him. We must assume as true their sworn statements that they based their opinions wholly on the facts that came to their knowledge while viewing the stumps and logs, and conducting their experiments.

5. We see no error in sustaining objections to cross-examination of these jurors directed to showing their misconduct on the former trial. This appeared clearly enough, if it was material on the question of their credibility, and restricting the cross-examination in this regard was well within the court's discretion. We find no error in any other ruling on evidence, or in failing to give an instruction on the weight to be given circumstantial evidence.

6. Defendant claims that the verdict is not sustained by the evidence. We think that the evidence, though circumstantial, points pretty clearly to the conclusion that defendant cut the logs from the property of the complaining witnesses. The chief claim, and one not wholly without merit, is that the evidence fails to show that defendant cut down the trees "maliciously." The owners of the land did not testify, and there is no separate evidence that defendant was actuated by malice, or an intent to injure the owners. But the malice which is an essential ingredient of the offense need not be proved directly or as a separate fact. When the act is wrongfully and wilfully done, and the necessary result is to injure the property of another, malice may be inferred. Defendant had no permission to cut down trees in the Butler woods. He was not laboring under any belief that he had a right to do so, or under any mistaken impression that the land belonged to himself or his father. He insisted at all times that the logs came from the farm of his father, some distance away. On the whole we are unable to say [515] that the necessary malice was not shown, or that the verdict is not sustained by the evidence. Defendant has been tried twice. The trial that resulted in the judgment from which this appeal was taken was a fair one, and the trial court has approved the verdict. We think it should stand.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE.

Competency as Witness of Juror on Former Trial.

A witness having personal knowledge of relevant facts is none the less competent to testify thereto because his knowledge was acquired while acting as a juror on a former trial of the case. Thus a member of a former jury may testify to conditions observed by him in the course of a view by the jury. Cramer v. Burlington, 42 Ia. 315; Hull v. Seaboard Air Line Ry. 76 S. C. 278, 57 S. E. 28, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1213; Hughes v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 126 Wis. 525, 106 N. W. 526. And see the reported case. In Hughes v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. supra, it was said: "We are unable to discover any sound reason why a juror should be precluded from testifying to material, relevant facts coming to his knowledge while making a view of the premises, when called as a witness on a subsequent trial." So in Woolfolk v. State, 85 Ga. 69, 11 S. E. 814, it was held that a juror at a former trial could testify as to the condition of an exhibit introduced at that trial. Similarly in Quattlebaum v. State, 119 Ga. 433, 46 S. E. 677, it was held that on an issue of the sanity of the defendant, a juror on a former trial might testify to his observations during the trial as to the defendant's appearance and conduct.

A juror at a former trial may testify as to what issues were then litigated. State v. Thompson, 19 Ia. 290; People v. Ostrander, 110 Mich. 60, 67 N. W. 1079; Follansbee v. Walker, 74 Pa. St. 306. However, in so doing he cannot contradict the record. Stapleton v. King, 40 Ia. 278; Smith v. Smith, 50 N. H. 212. In Hewitt v. Chapman, 49 Mich. 4, 12 N. W. 888, the court said: "The defendants sought to show by the jurors in the assumpsit case, that in making or arriving at their verdict, they allowed the plaintiff for the full amount of labor claimed by him. This clearly was incompetent and properly rejected by the justice. A juror may be called, like any other witness, to prove any fact pertaining to what took place in open court on the trial of a cause. To this extent he stands as would a third person or stranger to the cause, and if the facts sought to be proven could be shown by third parties present, they may be by the jurors. When, however, the jury retire to deliberate upon their verdict to be given, their conversations and discussions,—their deliberations,—cannot be inquired into. The result of their deliberations is the only material fact; it is the one fact upon which the jury agreed, and that can best be shown by their verdict."

The competency of a juror to testify on a motion for a new trial in impeachment of his verdict is beyond the scope of the present discussion. It has, however, been held that the rule forbidding a juror to impeach the verdict does not exclude testimony by a juror in a subsequent trial that the verdict rendered was, through a mistake, not that agreed on. Hamburg-Breman F. Ins. Co. v. Pelzer, 176 F. Co. 76 Fed. 479, 22 C. C. A. 283. And see Cape v. Stoughton, 16 Gray (Mass.) 364. In the case first cited, it was said: "It is contended that the admission of this testimony violates the rule which excludes the evidence of jurors to impeach a verdict by testimony as to their deliberations, or to show upon what grounds the verdict was rendered, or to show a mistake or misconduct of the jurors in arriving at the verdict. But the testimony objected to only tended to show what the verdict was, not how it had been arrived at, and to prove that the verdict read out in court by the foreman was not their verdict, but the result of an oversight by him in making the announcement. Without weakening at all the strictness of the general rule, testimony to this effect has been sanctioned in well-considered cases, and does not fall within the strong objections which properly exclude the statements of jurors in a different class of cases."

WALL

v.

FOCKE.

Hawaii Supreme Court—January 11, 1913.

21 Hawaii 399.

Tenants in Common — Compensation for Services — Sale of Common Property.

A tenant in common is not entitled to compensation for services in selling the common property in the absence of an agreement therefor, and no agreement to pay compensation will be implied from the fact that his cotenant had knowledge of the efforts to sell, acquiesced therein, and was benefited by the sale.

[See note at end of this case.]

Exceptions from Circuit Court, First Circuit.

Action to recover commissions. Walter E. Wall, plaintiff, and Herman Focke, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant alleges exceptions. The facts are stated in the opinion. EXCEPTIONS SUSTAINED.

W. B. Lymer for plaintiff.

I. M. Stainback and Holmes, Stanley & Olson for defendant.

[399] PERRY, J.—This is an action of assumpsit for $2700, upon three counts. The plaintiff and the defendant were tenants in common of a tract of land known as Pilipili, 54 acres in area, the plaintiff having purchased his undivided one-half interest in June, 1903, and the defendant having acquired his interest before that date. [400] After unsuccessful efforts on the plaintiff's part to procure an amicable partition both parties were desirous of selling the common property to the best advantage. In the three counts of the declaration it is alleged that "plaintiff and defendant entered into an oral arrangement whereby it was mutually agreed that plaintiff should become the agent or broker of them both for the sale of said Pilipili tract and as such agent or broker should procure a purchaser or purchasers of said land, either as a whole or in such parcels or lots as plaintiff might in his discretion decide to be most advantageous to their mutual interests." It is also alleged that the plaintiff procured a sale of the land with the consent and approval of the defendant for the sum of $54,000. The first count is on an express promise alleged to have been made by the defendant to pay to the plaintiff for the latter's services in selling the land ten per cent. of all sums received by the defendant from sales of the defendant's interest in the land. The second is to the effect that by reason of the sale the plaintiff is entitled to compensation in a reasonable amount for his services and that $2700 is a reasonable amount. The third is upon an account stated in the sum of $2700. The defendant filed an answer of general denial and a counter-claim for $152.09 for balance of revenue from the land collected by the plaintiff and belonging to the defendant. Trial was had without a jury.

The trial court in its decision made no reference to the third count; there was no evidence in support of it. Lamenting the contradictory nature of the evidence and speaking of the case generally, the court said that it was of the opinion "that the plaintiff has failed to make out his case by that clear preponderance of the evidence which the burden of proof requires." Concerning the first count the court held that it was "from the evidence impossible for the court to say that there was a fair preponderance of evidence showing a contract to pay a ten per cent. commission on the sale of the land." Of the claim in the second count it said, inter alia, "There can be no question if a [401] person stands by and sees another acting in good faith working in his behalf and gives no intimation that he does not desire such labor done that the law will imply a promise on his part to pay the reasonable value of such labor. Such it does not appear to the court are the facts in this case. During the entire time that plaintiff was dealing with Desky the defendant was absent from the Territory.

The undisputed evidence is that the defendant's attorney in fact knew nothing of the transaction until the deal had been practically completed with Desky and the latter had agreed to enter into a contract, whatever it was, either of sale or to sell. The plaintiff and defendant were co-owners of the land in question and whatever advantage the defendant obtained by the endeavors of the plaintiff the plaintiff obtained an equal advantage. Under such circumstances it seems apparent that it cannot be said as a matter of law that the plaintiff was working for the defendant rather than himself or that the defendant stood by or encouraged him to work in his behalf. It cannot be doubted that the labors of plaintiff did benefit the defendant, but it seems clear to the court that such benefit was incident to the benefit sought for himself and that therefore no case arises where in good conscience the defendant is bound to pay the plaintiff." Judgment was thereupon ordered and entered for the defendant for the amount of the counter-claim. Subsequently the plaintiff filed a motion for a new trial upon the grounds that the decision and judgment were "contrary to the law, to the evidence and to the weight of the evidence" and that the court erred "in finding that no contract for the sale of the property in question was entered into by plaintiff and defendant" and "in finding that said plaintiff was not entitled to account for his services under the quantum meruit count," and upon the further ground of errors alleged to have occurred in the admission and rejection of evidence. The motion was granted and a new trial ordered.

In its written opinion on the motion the court, after reciting that it had held "on the hearing of the case in chief that the [402] plaintiff had not shown by a preponderance of the evidence that defendant had entered into a contract with him to pay plaintiff for his services in selling a certain land held by them in common" and "that plaintiff was not entitled to judgment under his count for quantum meruit," said: "There can be no doubt that defendant did know that plaintiff was using effort and time in the sale of the common land, and that defendant acquiesced in such effort and expenditure of time. Nor can it be doubted that defendant was benefited by the sale of the land, nor that the sale was consummated by the efforts of Wall, the plaintiff, alone. Under such circumstances, I am of the opinion that the efforts of plaintiff were not in contemplation of joint or common tenancy, were without his duties as co-tenant of the defendant, and being acquiesced in by the defendant and the defendant having been benefited thereby, and that therefore the plaintiff is entitled to judgment on his count of quantum meruit." The case comes to this court on the defendant's exceptions.

The essence of the action is a claim by one person against his co-tenant for compensation for services rendered in effecting a sale of the land held in common. The law relating to compensation of a co-tenant for individual services rendered in the management and care of the common property is well settled. A clear statement of it is found in Ranstead v. Ranstead, 75 Md. 378, 22 Atl. 405, 406, as follows: "It is certainly a well-established principle that joint or common owners are not entitled to charge for services rendered in the care and management of the common property, except where there has been a special agreement or a mutual understanding to that effect; and courts are not disposed to extend such agreements beyond their plain and reasonable import. . . . But the mutual understanding of the parties may be proved by the facts and circumstances of the case, and, though it may not be shown that any specific amount had been agreed upon as compensation, yet, if it clearly appears to the satisfaction of the court that compensation [403] for the services to be rendered was to be made and services to be rendered with reference to such understanding, the law will imply an obligation to pay a reasonable amount." "Each joint owner, in taking care of the joint property, is taking care of his own interest and the law never undertakes to measure and settle, between partners, their various and unequal services bestowed on the joint business. This must be left to be regulated by contract." Franklin v. Robinson, 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 157, 164. "If an agreement that the partner shall be paid for his services can be fairly and justly implied from the course of business between the co-partners, he is entitled to recover. The question is one of evidence, or contract, and whether the right to recover is established by necessary implication or from express stipulation, the rule is the same." Levi v. Karrick, 13 Ia. 344, 350. To the same effect are: Freeman, Co-Tenancy and Partition, Sec. 260; 17 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d ed.) 688; 38 Cyc. 53, 54; Gay v. Berkey, 137 Mich. 658; 100 N. W. 920; Cole v. Cole, 57 Misc. 490, 108 N. Y. S. 124; Lake v. Perry, 99 Miss. 347, 54 So. 945. Upon principle the same rule applies when the services rendered consist of efforts to sell common property. Each owner in attempting to bring about an advantageous sale of the whole property is primarily taking care of his own interest and only incidentally benefiting his co-owner. Ordinarily a sale of the whole property will result more advantageously to each of the owners than will the sale of a mere undivided interest and for this reason a co-tenant may well endeavor to procure a purchaser of the whole with the hope that his co-owners will join in the sale. The law does not, in the absence of contract, undertake to measure between co-owners their various and unequal services bestowed on the business of selling their common land. The mere fact that a co-tenant is, with the knowledge of the other owners, making efforts to sell the common land and that the sale, if accomplished, will result to the benefit of all the other co-tenants is not sufficient to justify the inference that the more active co-tenant is making the [404] efforts with the expectation of compensation from the others or the inference that the others knew or must have known that he had such expectation.

In this connection it is well to bear in mind the distinction between express contracts, implied contracts and constructive contracts. The first are, as the term implies, those in which "the terms of the agreement are openly uttered and avowed at the time of the making." 2 Blackstone Com. 443. Constructive contracts are "fictions of law adapted to enforce legal duties by actions of contract where no proper contract exists, express or implied." Hertzog v. Hertzog, 29 Pa. St. 465, 468. In these the actual intention of the promisor is disregarded. "Implied contracts arise under circumstances which, according to the ordinary course of dealing and the common understanding of men, show a mutual intention to contract." (29 Pa. St. 468.) "An implied contract, in the proper sense, is where the intention of the parties is not expressed, but an agreement in fact, creating an obligation, is implied or presumed from their acts, as in the case where a person performs services for another, who accepts the same, the services not being performed under such circumstances as to show that they were intended to be gratuitous, or where a person performs services for another on request." 9 Cyc. 242. "There is some looseness of thought in supposing that reason and justice ever dictate any contracts between parties or impose such upon them. All true contracts grow out of the intentions of the parties to transactions and are dictated only by their mutual and accordant wills. When this intention is expressed we call the contract an express one; when it is not expressed it may be inferred, implied or presumed from circumstances as really existing and then the contract thus ascertained is called an implied one. . . . The law ordinarily presumes or implies a contract whenever this is necessary to account for other relations found to have existed between the parties. . . . A party who relies upon a contract must prove its existence; and this he does not do by merely proving a [405] set of circumstances that can be accounted for by another relation appearing or existing between the parties. . . . Every induction, inference, implication or presumption in reasoning of any kind is a radical conclusion derived from and demanded by certain data or ascertained circumstances. If such circumstances demand the conclusion of a contract to account for them a contract is proved; if not, not." Hertzog v. Hertzog, supra. In general there must be evidence that defendant requested plaintiff to render the services or assented to receiving their benefit under circumstances negating any presumption that they would be gratuitous. The evidence usually consists in, first, an express request pertaining to the services, or second, circumstances justifying the inference that plaintiff, in rendering the services, expected to be paid, and defendants supposed or had reason to suppose and ought to have supposed that he was expecting pay, and still allowed him to go on in the service without doing anything to disabuse him of this expectation; or third, proof of benefit received, not on an agreement that it was gratuitous and followed by an express promise to pay." Columbus, etc. R. Co. v. Gaffney, 65 Ohio St. 104, 116, 61 N. E. 152.

In his first opinion the trial judge found, and there was ample evidence to support the findings, not only against the claim of an express contract for a commission of ten per cent. but also against the claim of an understanding or expectation on the part of both parties that plaintiff would be compensated by defendant in an amount not agreed upon. His findings of fact and his reasoning, above quoted, under the second count, admit of no other interpretation. His conclusion was in effect that the facts disclosed by the evidence were not such as to justify the implication of a contract or mutual understanding or expectation that the plaintiff was to receive compensation from defendant. It may be that in the later decision the statement that "there can be no doubt that the defendant did know that plaintiff was using effort and time in the sale of the common land and that the defendant acquiesced in such effort and expenditure [406] of time" and that "defendant was benefited by the sale of the land" and that "the sale was secured by the efforts of Wall, the plaintiff, alone" was intended or operates as a modification to that extent of the findings in the earlier opinion. Assuming, but not deciding, that that is so and that the court had the power under the circumstances to alter its findings of fact to that extent, it is clear that the original findings were not altered in any other respect and that in the later opinion all that the court intended to hold was that upon the facts, and those only, stated in the second opinion the plaintiff was, as a matter of law, entitled to compensation. But the four facts relied upon by the trial court, namely, that defendant had knowledge of plaintiff's efforts, that he acquiesced in those efforts, that he was benefited by the sale and that the sale was consummated by the plaintiff alone, are not, under the law above stated, of themselves sufficient to give rise to an obligation on the defendant's part to pay and since the findings that there was no express contract and that no circumstances existed from which a mutual understanding or expectation should be presumed remain unreversed by the trial court the exceptions are sustained and the order granting a new trial is set aside.

NOTE.

Right of Tenant in Common to Compensation for Services in Selling Common Property.

As a logical application of the general rule that a tenant in common has no implied right to compensation from his cotenant for services rendered with respect to the common property, (see 38 Cyc. 53) the few cases passing on the question are agreed that a tenant in common who sells the common property is not entitled to compensation for his services in so doing, in the absence of an agreement by which the right to compensation is expressly given or plainly implied. Hamilton v. Conine, 28 Md. 635, 92 Am. Dec. 724; Franklin v. Robinson, 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 157; Central Trust Co. v. New York Equipment Co. 87 Hun 421, 34 N. Y. S. 349. And see the reported case. In Central Trust Co. v. New York Equipment Co. supra, it was said: "The defendant claims $3000 for its services in taking possession of, caring for, and selling the property. The referee found that the plaintiff had not agreed to compensate the defendant for such services. In the absence of a contract that compensation for services shall be paid, joint owners of property or persons jointly interested in property cannot recover of each other compensation for services rendered in caring for it and converting it into money." So in Hamilton v. Conine, 28 Md. 635, 92 Am. Dec. 724, the court, after reviewing the cases denying the right of a partner to sue his copartner at law for services, said: "It is impossible to distinguish the present case, in principle, from those just cited. The services rendered by the plaintiff, for which he seeks to recover in this action, were done during the continuance of the tenancy in common, on account of the whole common property, and inured to the benefit of all the joint owners, and if performed by a stranger the suit would have been against the four jointly, and the plaintiff must have contributed his proportionate share towards paying for them. The same reason, therefore, holds against his right to maintain this action. It is difficult to find authorities precisely in point in the courts of other states, probably for the reason that the well settled practice has been so generally followed, that such suits at law have rarely been attempted."

However, it is said obiter in the reported case that an express agreement may give to a tenant in common the right to compensation for selling the common property, and compensation has been allowed without a specific discussion of the right thereto, it appearing that the sale was made under an agreement clearly providing for compensation. Thompson v. Salmon, 18 Cal. 632; McCreery v. Green, 38 Mich. 172. In Harman v. Moss, 117 Va. 676, 86 S. E. 111, it appeared that one of several tenants in common obtained from the others an agreement giving him an agency to sell the common land at a specified price. The court said: "With respect to the matter of commissions (without intending to be understood as intimating an opinion as to what should be the final result), the record seems to indicate the existence of special circumstances affecting the character and quantum of services rendered by appellant in selling the timber in question, which, if sustained, may take the claim to commissions out of the ordinary class of sales for which the customary commission of 5 per cent. is allowed."

JOHNSON ET AL.

LIBBY.

Maine Supreme Judicial Court—October 29, 1913.

111 Me. 204; 33 Atl. 647.

Corporations — Double Liability of Stockholders — Acceptance of Statute.

The charter of the Waterville Trust Company (Priv. & Sp. Laws 1889, c. 401, § 6) imposed a double liability on stockholders, and a similar liability was imposed by Rev. St. c. 48, § 86, as amended by P. L. 1905, c. 19. Held, that one who voluntarily became a stockholder in such corporation assumed the double liability imposed by statute and charter.

Same.

A stockholder in a trust company who retained his stock after enactment of P. L. 1905, c. 19, amending Rev. St. c. 48, § 86, imposing a double liability on shareholders in such corporation by providing a method of enforcing the liability, must be deemed to have accepted the effect of the amendment.

Constitutional Law — Change of Remedy.

The legislature has the power to modify and change a remedy, provided no substantial right is thereby impaired; consequently a shareholder in a trust company cannot complain because the legislature changed the remedy by which the double liability previously imposed might be enforced.

Corporations — Liability of Stockholders — Enforcement against Estate of Decedent.

The double liability assumed by a purchaser of the stock of a trust company is contractual in its nature and does not abate at his death but survives and his estate is liable therefor.

[See note at end of this case.]

Assessment on Stock — Proceedings — Notice to Stockholders.

In proceedings for the liquidation of the affairs of a trust company and the payment of its debts, the court may make an assessment against the shareholders upon their double liability without personal service upon them; the proceeding being against the corporation, which is presumed to represent them.

Same.

Where a shareholder in a trust company died during the liquidation of its affairs, an assessment against the shareholders on their double liability is valid against such shareholder's estate, without personal service on his representatives; the shareholder being represented in the proceeding against the corporation.

When Liability Accrues.

The liability of a shareholder in a trust company which by statute is fixed at a sum equal to the par value of the shares, in addition to the amount invested therein, does not accrue as a claim against the shareholder's estate until assessed by a decree of court in liquidation.

Same.

Rev. St. c. 89, §§ 16, 17, 18, respectively, provide that, when an action on a contract or covenant does not accrue within the 18 months provided for the presentation of claims against an estate, the claimant may file his demand within that time in the probate office, and thereupon the judge shall direct that sufficient assets shall be retained by the administrator, and that, when such claim has not been filed in the probate office within said 18 months, the claimant may have a remedy against the heirs or devisees of the estate within one year after it becomes due and not against the executor or administrator. Held that, where the liability of a deceased shareholder in a trust company on account of an assessment against shareholders did not accrue until the decree of the court which was rendered more than 18 months after the time for the presentation of claims, an action to enforce such liability might within the year be maintained against her heirs.

Enforcement of Assessment.

In view of P. L. 1905, c. 19, authorizing the receivers of a banking or trust company to enforce the double liability of shareholders in an appropriate action at law or in equity for the benefit of creditors, a decree of the court assessing the double liability of the shareholders and authorizing the receivers to institute all necessary proceedings in law or in equity to collect the same and enforce the decree is not limited in its scope solely to those persons who were shareholders at the time of the receivership but includes shareholders who have died subsequent to the receivership and authorizes an action against their estates.

On report from Supreme Judicial Court, Kennebec county.

Action of assumpsit. Charles F. Johnson et al., receivers of Waterville Trust Company, plaintiffs, and Helen M. Libby, defendant. Case reported to Law Court on agreed statement of facts. The facts are stated in the opinion. JUDGMENT FOR PLAINTIFFS.

Johnson & Perkins for plaintiffs.

Manson & Coolidge for defendant.

[205] KING, J.—This case is reported to the Law Court on an agreed statement of facts.

July 1, 1909, the Waterville Trust Company of Waterville, Maine, by decree of the Supreme Judicial Court of Maine, was enjoined from further prosecuting business, and the plaintiffs were then appointed its receivers and duly qualified.

At that time Bertha L. Libby of Pittsfield, Maine, was the owner of record of five shares of the capital stock of said Trust Company of the par value of $100 each. April 3, 1910, she died, intestate, leaving a surviving husband, and the defendant, Helen M. Libby, as her sole heir. Her estate was settled by her husband, who was appointed as administrator in April, 1910, and he settled his final account in October, 1911, showing a balance of the estate of $3,592.05, which was distributed; one-third to the surviving husband, and two-thirds to the defendant.

Thereafter, April 29, 1912, upon the petition of the receivers against the corporation, and after notice and hearing, it was adjudged and decreed by a Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court that there was due the depositors of said Trust Company the sum of $107,058.90 in excess of the amount that could be realized from all its assets, and

"That an assessment of one hundred per cent upon the whole capital stock of said Waterville Trust Company, amounting to $100,000, is necessary to be made to meet the claims of said depositors.

[206] "And that the said Charles F. Johnson and Harry L. Holmes in their said capacity as receivers of said Waterville Trust Company be hereby authorized and directed to collect from each owner of the record of the stock of said Waterville Trust Company on the first day of July, 1909, the date when the receivers were appointed by this court, a sum equal to the par value of his stock to be used in payment of the claims of said depositors when ordered by the court.

"And that the said Charles F. Johnson and Harry L. Holmes in their said capacity as receivers aforesaid be authorized and directed to institute all necessary proceedings in law or equity to collect the same and enforce this decree."

This action was begun September 27, 1912 to collect of Helen M. Libby the sum of $500 as the assessment of 100 per cent on the five shares of said stock owned by Bertha L. Libby at the time of her death.

The plaintiffs base their right to recover on these propositions: that at the time of the death of Bertha L. Libby there was a contingent liability resting upon her as a shareholder in said Trust Company to pay a sum equal to the par value of her shares if required for the payment of the debts and engagements of the corporation; that that obligation was contractual in its nature and survived her death and became a contingent obligation against her estate; that by the decree of the court of April 29, 1912, that obligation became an absolute liability for a specific amount which then became due and payable from her estate; that her estate having been previously settled and a distributive part thereof received by the defendant, as the only heir of said Bertha L. Libby, in excess of the amount due under that obligation, the defendant became liable therefor; and that the receivers are authorized and empowered to enforce the defendant's liability in this action.

Bertha L. Libby, as a shareholder in the Waterville Trust Company, became liable for the debts and engagements of the corporation to an amount equal to the par value of her shares in addition to the amount invested in those shares. Such an additional liability was expressly provided for in the charter of the corporation. Sec. 6, ch. 401, Private and Special Laws, 1889. It was also imposed by statute. Section 86, ch. 48, R. S., before its amendment in 1905, was as follows: "The shareholders in a trust and banking company [207] shall be individually responsible, equally and ratably, and not one for the other, for all contracts, debts and engagements of said corporation, to a sum equal to the amount of the par value of the shares owned by each in addition to the amount invested in said shares." This section was amended by chapter 19, P. L., 1905, by adding thereto the following: "Whenever in liquidating the affairs of such a corporation it appears that its assets are not sufficient to pay its indebtedness the receiver thereof, under proper orders of the court, shall proceed to enforce such individual liability of shareholders in any appropriate action at law or in equity, in his own name or in the name of the corporation for the benefit of the creditors."

Every person who voluntarily becomes a shareholder in a corporation thereby agrees to the terms of its charter, and assumes those obligations which the laws of the State creating the corporation impose upon such shareholders. Pulsifer v. Greene, 96 Me. 438, 445, 52 Atl. 921, and cases cited.

It does not appear whether Bertha L. Libby became the owner of the five shares of the stock of said trust company before or after the amendment of 1905. But that is immaterial, because, if she was a shareholder before, by continuing as such thereafter she thereby accepted the effect of the amendment so far as it applied to her liability as a shareholder. Flynn v. American Banking, etc. Co. 104 Me. 141, 145, 69 Atl. 771, 120 Am. St. Rep. 378, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 428. Moreover, if she was a shareholder before the amendment, it in no manner increased her liability as such. Its only purpose and effect was to provide a different remedy, a different course of procedure, by which the shareholders' liability could be enforced. The Legislature has power to modify or change a remedy, provided no substantial right is thereby impaired. And a shareholder in a corporation has no vested right in a particular remedy by which his liability as such may be enforced against him. A change of remedy, whereby no substantial right is affected, is not obnoxious to the fundamental law which forbids the impairment of contracts.

It may be regarded as well settled that the obligation which the shareholder assumes by becoming a member of the corporation is contractual in its nature, and does not abate at his death but survives, and his estate becomes chargeable therefor. This court in Pulsifer v. Greene, supra, speaking of such liability said: "The obligation which he thereby assumed though statutory in its origin [208] was contractual in its nature, and as such not local but transitory. It goes with him wherever he goes, and is enforceable in any court of competent jurisdiction."

In Cook on Corporations (5th Ed.) Vol. 1, Sec. 248, it is said: "The estate of a deceased person is liable upon stock held and owned by the decedent in the same way and to the same extent that the stockholder was liable in his lifetime. Accordingly an executor or administrator of the estate of a deceased stockholder is chargeable upon the shares of the decedent to the extent of the property that comes into his hands as the personal representative of the deceased. The cause of action against a stockholder arising from his statutory liability, is not defeated by his death. The action may proceed against his estate." See also Richmond v. Irons, 121 U. S. 27, 7 S. Ct. 788, 30 U. S. (L. ed.) 864; Fidelity Ins. Trust, etc. Co. v. Mechanics' Sav. Bank, 97 Fed. 297, 38 C. C. A. 193, 56 L.R.A. 228; Douglass v. Loftus, 85 Kan. 720, Ann. Cas. 1913A 378, 119 Pac. 74, 78, L.R.A. 1915B 797. In 3 Thom. Corp. Sec. 3325, the author says: "Where the estate of the deceased shareholder is fully administered, and distribution made by the personal representative, the heirs or next of kin are assessable to the extent of the assets which they have received from the ancestor's estate, for the payment of calls subsequently made upon shares of stock belonging to his estate."

But, conceding the liability of Bertha L. Libby, as claimed, to an assessment on the shares owned by her, and that the defendant, as her heir and a distributee of her estate, might have been made liable therefor, it is contended that the necessary proceedings were not taken to make an assessment which is binding upon her, and that no sufficient order of court was made authorizing the receivers to bring this suit against her. We think these contentions in behalf of the defendant are not sustainable.

In construing the decree of the court of April 29, 1912, all its recitals and provisions are to be considered in order to ascertain its full scope and effect. It recites that it was made upon the petition of the receivers against the corporation, asking the court to ascertain and determine the value of the assets of the corporation remaining in the hands of the receivers, and "to ascertain and determine whether any assessment should be ordered and decreed upon the capital stock of said Waterville Trust Company, and the amount of said assessment." And it shows that after notice and hearing, the [209] court did ascertain and determine explicitly the amount due the depositors, the cash remaining in the receivers' hands, the value of the unsold assets, and that both the cash and value of the unsold assets would be insufficient to pay the depositors in the sum of $107,058.90. It was then ordered and decreed by the court as hereinabove quoted.

We entertain no doubt that by that decree a valid assessment was made of 100 per cent upon the whole capital stock of the Waterville Trust Company, including the five shares which stood in the name of Bertha L. Libby at the time of her death.

It has been repeatedly held that when, in proceedings for the liquidation of the affairs of a corporation, and for the payment of its debts and engagements, an assessment is necessary to be made upon unpaid stock subscriptions and upon the additional liability which its shareholders have assumed by becoming members of the corporation as shareholders, the court may make such assessment in proceedings therefor against the corporation without the presence of, or personal service upon, the individual shareholders. In such proceedings the representation which a shareholder has by virtue of his membership in the corporation is all that he is entitled to. Bernheimer v. Converse, 206 U. S. 516, 532, 27 S. Ct. 755, 51 U. S. (L. ed.) 1163; Howarth v. Lombard, 175 Mass. 570, 577, 56 N. E. 888, 49 L.R.A. 301; Converse v. Spargo, 184 Fed. 324, and Spargo v. Converse, 191 Fed. 823, 112 C. C. A. 337. The case last cited is very similar to the one at bar. In that case, as in this, the assessment was made after the death of the shareholder, and it was contended in defense of a suit by the receiver against the executor of the shareholder, that the assessment was invalid because the proceeding in making the assessment was conducted in the same manner it would have been had the shareholder been alive. But that contention was not sustained, the court holding the assessment valid against the shareholder's estate, though made after his death. We think that conclusion rests in sound reasoning and well established principles.

It has already been noted that it is the accepted theory that in proceedings for liquidating the affairs of a corporation the shareholders are sufficiently represented by the corporation itself. Its presence in theory carries with it the presence of its shareholders. Prior to the death of Bertha L. Libby the Waterville Trust Company had become insolvent and proceedings had been begun against [210] it under the statute to liquidate its affairs. Her liability as a shareholder in that corporation, under the terms of its charter and the laws of the State, became fixed by those proceedings which were binding upon her. She was then liable to pay such assessment not exceeding the par value of her shares, as the court should determine to be necessary to satisfy the debts and engagements of the corporation. The assessment itself was but the determination by the court in those proceedings, commenced in the lifetime of the shareholder, of the deficiency in the assets of the corporation; and hence the amount to be apportioned to each share of stock as the additional sum to be paid by those legally liable therefor. Had Bertha L. Libby been living at the time that part of the proceedings was had to determine the amount of the assessment, she would have been bound thereby without previous personal notice. And as her liability to pay such an assessment as should be made against her shares in those proceedings survived her death, and became a liability of her estate, we perceive no reason why her personal representative or heirs are not likewise bound by the assessment made subsequent to her death without previous notice to them.

It is provided by statute in this State (R. S., ch. 89, secs. 16, 17 and 18) that when an action on a contract or covenant does not accrue within the eighteen months provided for the presentation of claims against an estate, the claimant may file his demand within that time in the probate office, and thereupon the Judge of Probate shall direct that sufficient assets, if such there be, shall be retained by the executor or administrator, unless the heirs or devisees give bond to pay whatever is found due on said claim. And the statute further provides (sec. 18) that, "When such claim has not been filed in the probate office within said eighteen months, the claimant may have remedy against the heirs or devisees of the estate within one year after it becomes due, and not against the executor or administrator."

The liability of Bertha L. Libby at the time of her death to an assessment, as a shareholder in the trust company, did not accrue until April 29, 1912, when the court decreed that a resort to the statutory liability of the shareholders was necessary and fixed the amount thereof. Flynn v. American Banking, etc. Co. supra. That was after the expiration of the eighteen months during which claims [211] could have been presented against the estate of Bertha L. Libby. Nor was any demand, under said contingent liability, filed in the probate office within said eighteen months. But this action is brought, as provided for in said sec. 18, ch. 89, against the heir of Bertha L. Libby within one year after the decree of April 29, 1912, fixing the amount of the assessment.

Finally, the defendant says, that the decree of the court of April 29, 1912, authorized the receivers to collect the assessment of those persons only who were owners of stock of record on the first day of July, 1909, and therefore that the receivers have no authority to maintain this action against her, notwithstanding her liability for such assessment as the heir and distributees of her mother's estate.

We think such a construction of the decree is too narrow and limited. To sustain it would require a holding that the decree did not impose an assessment upon the whole capital stock of the trust company, for if by the decree the whole capital stock was assessed, then this suit is abundantly authorized by the last paragraph of the decree wherein the receivers were authorized and directed "to institute all necessary proceedings in law or in equity to collect the same and enforce this decree."

But we have already stated the opinion of the court to be that this decree reasonably construed, giving effect to all its parts, did impose an assessment upon the whole capital stock of the trust company. And we need here only add that it appears from the decree itself that in the proceedings to liquidate the affairs of this banking corporation the court was called upon to determine the necessity for and the amount of an assessment upon the capital stock of the corporation to pay the claims of its depositors, and that it did judicially ascertain and expressly decree that "an assessment of one hundred per cent upon the whole capital stock . . . is necessary to be made to meet the claims of said depositors." Such determination and decree, we think, may reasonably be construed to be in effect such an assessment. No other construction would be consistent with the adjudged necessity in the premises, and the manifest purpose of the decree. It was clearly so intended by the Justice who signed it.

Moreover, it is expressly provided by sec. 86, ch. 48, R. S. amended by chapter 19, P. L. 1905, as hereinbefore quoted, that [212] whenever in liquidating the affairs of a trust and banking company "it appears" that its assets are not sufficient to pay its indebtedness "the receiver thereof, under proper orders of the court, shall proceed to enforce such individual liability of shareholders in any appropriate action at law or in equity, in his own name or in the name of the corporation for the benefit of the creditors." Under the provisions of this section the receivers in the case at bar were not only authorized but commanded to enforce the defendant's liability, under proper orders of the court, in any appropriate action at law or in equity. Considering the provisions of this statute in connection with the decree of April 29, 1912, it seems a reasonable conclusion that the receivers of the Waterville Trust Company were authorized to bring this action against the defendant.

Accordingly it is the opinion of the court that the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment against the defendant for $500 with interest from the date of the writ.

So ordered.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that the liability of a stockholder to a receiver of the corporation for an assessment on the stock may, after the death of the stockholder, be enforced against his personal representative, or if the estate has been fully administered, against the heirs. This holding is in accord with the earlier cases which are reviewed in the note to Douglass v. Loftus, Ann. Cas. 1913A 376.

PEOPLE

v.

KANE.

New York Court of Appeals—January 5, 1915.

213 N. Y. 260; 107 N. E. 655.

Homicide — Intent — Evidence Sufficient.

Evidence in a murder case held to make a question for jury whether the shooting was intentional or accidental.

Cause of Death — Supervening Cause.

Defendant was guilty of causing decedent's death, if his shooting her caused a miscarriage followed by blood poisoning, resulting in her death, notwithstanding any intervening medical negligence; it being only when the death is solely attributable to the secondary agency, and not at all induced by the primary one, that its intervention constitutes a defense.

[See note at end of this case.]

Dying Declarations — Foundation.

To make statements of deceased admissible as a dying declaration, preliminary questions to her as to anticipation of death should not be put in a perfunctory manner, as merely formal and unimportant, but so as to make sure that she understands them.

Same.

The rule, as to dying declarations, that it must be shown they were not made in answer to interrogatories calculated to lead deceased to make a particular statement, applies to the statements in regard to hope of recovery.

Appeal from Trial Term of Supreme Court, Kings county.

Criminal action. Robert Kane convicted of murder in first degree and appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Edward J. Reilly for appellant.

James C. Cropsey, Ralph C. Hemstreet and Hersey Egginton for respondent.

[262] WILLARD BARTLETT, Ch. J.—On the afternoon of May 20th, 1914, at 35 Varick avenue in the borough of Brooklyn, the defendant inflicted two serious pistol-shot wounds on the body of Anna Klein, a young married woman about twenty-two years of age, who was then living with her grandmother at the house where the shooting occurred. Anna Klein was pregnant at the time. The evidence warranted the jury in finding, and their verdict shows they must have found, that the pistol-shot wounds inflicted by the defendant caused a miscarriage, the miscarriage caused septic peritonitis, and the septic peritonitis thus induced caused Anna Klein's death on the third day after she was shot.

The defendant, who described his occupation as that of an engineer's assistant, was twenty-nine years old at this time, and had served as a first-class fireman in the United States navy. Upon leaving the navy, in 1911, he married a girl in New York, but left her at the end of their first week of marriage; and thereafter he appears to have lived with his wife only occasionally and for [263] comparatively brief periods of time. Anna Klein was also married but did not live with her husband. The defendant made her acquaintance while he was working for the Long Island Railroad Company at its freight station in Brooklyn, and illicit relations were soon established between them, and continued in St. Louis where they went to live. In 1913 they returned to Brooklyn, Anna Klein going to her mother's and the defendant rejoining his wife. Inspired by jealousy, the wife on one occasion attempted to shoot Anna, when the defendant, according to his account of the occurrence, tore the revolver from her hand and thus defeated her purpose. The defendant, nevertheless, was arrested for participation in the attempted assault by his wife, and was detained in jail eight days, when he was discharged, upon the refusal of the grand jury to indict him. It was the theory of the prosecution that the defendant regarded Anna Klein as largely responsible for his imprisonment on this occasion, and that this was one of the causes which led him to determine to kill her.

He did not return to work after thus being in custody, but, according to his own testimony given upon the trial, he spent his time roaming around and drinking, being disgusted and discouraged at the treatment he had received. Anna Klein's grandmother, at whose house the shooting took place, testified that the defendant came there on the night of the 16th of May, and that she "chased him out." She saw him subsequently on the same night asleep in front of a neighboring liquor saloon. He admits having purchased a revolver about a fortnight before the shooting, though he was unable to assign any reason for buying it.

The circumstances of the shooting were related by Anna Klein in her dying declaration as follows: "On Wednesday, May 20, Robert Kane was standing on the corner of Varick avenue and Harrison place in the saloon vestibule. About three o'clock when I saw him, Robert [264] Kane, standing there, I went back home, and told my grandmother that Robert Kane was there. Then I wanted to go out to my mother's, who lives at 31 Varick avenue. As I opened the door to go out into the street, Robert Kane opened the door at the same time. As soon as he got into the vestibule, he pulled out a gun from his pocket and says to me 'I want to speak to you.' I said, 'You can speak to me if you do not raise a disturbance.' So he said he wanted to talk to me in private and I then said, 'You can't. My grandmother and everybody else must be there.' He kept on talking that I could not call a policeman as I did the last time. My grandmother then came out and asked if he had a pistol. I said 'Yes' and my grandmother then went out and called my mother. My mother then chased him out of the vestibule. As he stepped out of the vestibule, he turned and fired four shots out of the vestibule. Three shots took effect. Robert Kane then walked to the saloon corner from where he came. I don't know what happened then. I then identified him as Robert Kane, the man who shot me."

This narrative of the tragedy was corroborated by the mother and grandmother, both of whom were eye-witnesses, and also by Mrs. Mary Meyer, of 81 Varick avenue, who went over with the mother to No. 35, when she learned that Robert Kane was there. This witness stated that he was standing "right close" to Anna Klein when he shot the first time, having hold of her elbow with his left hand. The mother testified he fired one shot at her daughter after she had fallen to the ground.

The defendant, testifying in his own behalf, declared that the shooting was all an accident; that, although he fired into the vestibule, he did not intend to kill anybody, but merely wanted to scare the persons there and keep them in, and thus prevent his own arrest.

The jury rejected this explanation of his conduct. In doing so they were doubtless influenced by the statements [265] made by him just after the shooting, in answer to questions by Assistant District Attorney Conway of Kings county at the Stagg Street police station. The defendant, after being fairly warned that anything he said might be used against him, identified his revolver as the weapon with which he had fired five times at Anna Klein on that day. The following are extracts from the stenographic transcript of his statement on that occasion:

"Question: That is the revolver you bought two weeks ago?

"Answer: Yes, sir.

"Question: Did you carry this revolver around with you for the last two weeks?

"Answer: Yes, sir.

"Question: You never left it at home?

"Answer: Yes, sir; I left it at home.

"Question: When did you put it in your pocket after you left it at home? Yesterday?

"Answer: This morning when I went out.

"Question: Did you tell your wife where you were going?

"Answer: Yes, sir.

"Question: What did you tell her?

"Answer: Told her I was going over to Jersey; to take that gun over to Jersey.

"Question: That was not true?

"Answer: No, sir.

"Question: What were you going to do?

"Answer: I was going to come over here to Brooklyn and shoot Anna Klein with it.

"Question: What did you say to her before you shot her?

"Answer: I went in there and said I want to speak to you by yourself a minute."

"Question: What did she say?

"Answer: She said, 'All right. Wait until I get my grandmother and grandfather out of here.'

[266] "Question: What did you say?

"Answer: I didn't say nothing; I just stayed there for a couple of minutes.

"Question: Then what happened?

"Answer: Then I saw the grandfather stick his head out of the window to call a cop, to have me arrested again and before I got arrested and go to jail for nothing, like I did the other time, I would do a good job and do something to go to jail for.

"Question: What were you going to do with the five extra shells?

"Answer: I was going to use them if I had a chance to.

"Question: On whom?

"Answer: On anybody that got in front of me.

"Question: That is, on anybody that prevented you from escaping, from getting away?

"Answer: I do not know about that. I had them three shells and I had seven with the gun and I had five in my pocket. I do not know whether I would have used them or not.

"Question: When you told Anna Klein you wanted to speak to her for a minute, did you ask to see her alone?

"Answer: Yes, sir.

"Question: What was your idea in getting her to see you alone?

"Answer: I just wanted to speak to her.

"Question: Did you think you would have a better chance of getting away?

"Answer: No, if I wanted to kill anybody, I would kill them if there was a regiment around me.

"Question: That was the way you felt to-day?

"Answer: That was the way I felt, yes. I know what a man will get, if he commits murder.

"Question: What will be get?

"Answer: The electric chair.

"Question: You knew that before you shot her?

[267] "Answer: I read it enough in the newspapers to know that a man that commits a deliberate murder, he will get the electric chair.

"Question: You were willing to take that chance?

"Answer: Yes, I do not look for any sympathy whatever.

"Question: But you do not want to tell me why you shot her?

"Answer: I would not tell you that. You will do me a great favor if you do not try to make me."

At this point the assistant district attorney very properly ceased to inquire further, having already assured the witness that he was not required to answer any questions to which he objected.

It is true that when the defendant came to testify he denied having made some of the responses we have quoted which bore most strongly against him. He did not remember saying he was going to come over to Brooklyn and shoot Anna Klein; and he swore positively that he never had any such intention. According to his account of the occurrences in the vestibule, Anna Klein readily assented to the interview which he desired, when her mother appeared on the scene—the grandfather and grandmother having retired into the background—and threatened the defendant with arrest, at the same time seizing him by the arm. She was about starting for a policeman when he shot into the vestibule "to scare them," as he said, and without intending to kill any one. He admitted having a faint recollection of being brought back to Anna when she was lying down but could not remember things thoroughly after that.

In this condition of the record, it was for the jury to determine which version of the occurrence was the true one—that given by the defendant on the witness stand or that presented by the case for the prosecution, including the inferences to be drawn from his admissions to the assistant district attorney, as recorded by the stenographer [268] at the time they are alleged to have been made. We cannot say that they were wrong in concluding that the latter represented the truth beyond all reasonable doubt.

The chief position assumed by the defense, however, upon the present appeal, as it was upon the trial, is that the defendant's shots were not proved to be the cause of Anna Klein's death. It matters not that the shooting was intentional and premeditated and deliberate, if it did not effect the death of the person shot. Of the five shots fired by the defendant three struck the deceased. One of the bullets merely came into contact with the skin without penetrating it, and that shot may be left out of consideration on this branch of the case. The second bullet lodged in the back, three inches from the spine. The third entered the right arm, passed inward puncturing and fracturing the sixth rib, and lodged in the lower lobe of the right lung, where it was found. The wounded woman was taken to St. Catherine's Hospital in Brooklyn for treatment. She died there three days later, and the coroner's physician who performed the autopsy testified that the cause of her death was a pistol shot wound penetrating the lung and a septic peritonitis following an abortion (miscarriage). In behalf of the defendant it was insisted that the evidence failed to establish any causal connection between the wounds and the death; but that, on the contrary, it showed that death was due to the intervention of an outside agency, namely, negligent and improper medical and surgical treatment at the hospital.

This contention is based wholly on the testimony given by the medical witnesses and nurses called in behalf of the People, and the contents of the hospital charts. Soon after her arrival the patient complained of abdominal pains; at 2 o'clock the next morning vaginal bleeding was observed; and ergot appears to have been administered to check this. Counsel for the defendant attributes the miscarriage which followed to the action of this ergot; but no opinion evidence was adduced in support of his view in [269] this respect, and, on the other hand, Dr. George Bodkin, the assistant visiting surgeon connected with the hospital, gave opinion evidence to the effect that the miscarriage was caused by the shock of the shooting. "To begin with," this witness said, "the shooting, the bullet wounds, and the shock and fright attached to it or connected with it were, in my opinion, responsible for the miscarriage; the miscarriage resulted in a septic peritonitis; and the septic peritonitis resulted in her death." After the miscarriage, the uterus was packed with gauze to prevent further bleeding; and this procedure is bitterly denounced in the brief for the appellant, where it is asserted that the packing produced the septicæmia which proved fatal. The jury, however, could hardly be expected to adopt this view in the absence of any medical testimony to the effect that the septic condition was or could have been thus developed. Upon the evidence in the case such a finding would have been purely speculative.

As to this portion of the defense, which counsel contended reduced the charge to an attempt to commit murder, the learned trial judge instructed the jury as follows: "The defendant claims that he did not kill this girl. . . . That is a question of fact which the jury have to determine. I will say this to you, gentlemen: that if that shooting was the cause of a miscarriage and if the result of the miscarriage was death, even though there may have intervened some disease, like blood-poisoning, then, if that relation of cause and effect is traceable from the shooting of this girl right up to the point of her death, it caused her death in the eyes of the law. That is a question of fact. The responsibility of determining that question of fact rests upon you. . . . If the chain of cause and effect runs from the shots right up to the death, then, although there may have been subsidiary causes due to the pregnant condition of this woman, such as blood-poisoning resulting from a miscarriage which was produced by the [270] wound, then, even though those subsidiary causes existed, the defendant is responsible in the eyes of the law for all the consequences of his act. If the woman was pregnant and was peculiarly susceptible to injury from a gunshot wound, he cannot take refuge behind that. Of course, in order to find his responsibility, you must find that the gunshot wound caused her death. In other words, you must find, either that the gunshot wound directly caused her death or that the gunshot wound was the cause of the miscarriage and the miscarriage caused her death: if that relation of cause and effect existed then he is responsible for her death. . . . When one person wounds another in a part of the body in which the wound may result in serious injury, and death follows, it becomes a question of fact whether, under all the circumstances, the death is the result of that wound. I am going to leave that question to you, gentlemen."

In ruling upon the requests to charge the court consistently adhered to these instructions concerning the contention that death was due to a secondary intervening cause; so that if these instructions were correct no error was committed in dealing with this phase of the case.

We think they were correct. They accord with the uniform current of authority in those jurisdictions where the question has been passed upon, and enunciate the rule as derived by the leading text writers from such authoritative decisions.

If a felonious assault is operative as a cause of death, the causal co-operation of erroneous surgical or medical treatment does not relieve the assailant from liability for the homicide. It is only where the death is solely attributable to the secondary agency, and not at all induced by the primary one, that its intervention constitutes a defense. Thus, if the internes at St. Catherine's Hospital had carelessly killed Anna Klein by the negligent administration of a deadly poison, the defendant [271] would not have been liable for her death, though he would still have remained responsible for the assault; but he was liable for killing her, if the jury were satisfied, as they must have been, that no matter what was done at the hospital, the pistol-shot wounds which he inflicted operated to cause her death.

That liability for homicide does not depend upon the death being the immediate consequence of the injury was clearly held in Cox v. People, 80 N. Y. 500, where it was contended that the deceased died from fright and not from the assault alleged in the indictment. The court charged the jury that "if the deceased died from fright, and if the fright was caused by the violence of the prisoner he is as responsible, and can as properly be convicted under this indictment of murder in the first degree as if the immediate result of his act was suffocation." This instruction was upheld by the Court of Appeals, which said, by Andrews, J.: "It was not necessary in order to convict the prisoner that it should appear that his actual personal violence was the sole and immediate cause of the death of the deceased. If his violence so excited the terror of the deceased that she died from the fright, and she would not have died except for the assault, then the prisoner's act was in law the cause of her death." (p. 515.)

The earliest consideration given by the courts in England to the negligent treatment of the wounded person as an excuse for one subsequently accused of homicide appears to have been in Rew's Case, (J. Kely. 26) in the reign of Charles II, wherein one Edward Rew was indicted for killing his brother, and upon the evidence it was resolved "that if one gives wounds to another who neglects the cure of them, or is disorderly, and doth not keep that rule which a person wounded should do; yet if he die it is murder or manslaughter, according as the case is in the person who gave the wounds, because if the wounds had not been, the man [272] had not died; and therefore neglect or disorder in the person who received the wounds, shall not excuse the person who gave them." This is in accordance with the rule as laid down by Hawkins: "But if a Person hurt by another die thereof within a Year and a Day, it is no Excuse for the other that he might have recovered if he had not neglected to take Care of himself." (Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown, bk. 1, ch. 13, § 10.)

The law of England as it exists to-day is thus stated in Lord Halsbury's elaborate work as follows: "If a dangerous wound is inflicted and death results, the person who inflicted the wound is criminally responsible for the death, although the person wounded neglected to use proper remedies; or refused to submit to a necessary operation; or died after such an operation which was carefully and properly performed. If a wound is given which is not in itself mortal or dangerous, but which from improper treatment becomes the cause of death, the person who gave the wound will not be criminally responsible for the death, if it clearly appears that the death was caused by the improper treatment." (9 Halsbury's Laws of England, 572.)

Among the cases cited in support of this statement of the law is Reg. v. Holland, 2 M. & Rob. 351, which was tried before Maule, J., at the Liverpool assizes in 1841. The prisoner was indicted for murder by having inflicted divers mortal blows and wounds upon one Thomas Garland, including a cut upon one of his fingers. Garland refused to allow the finger to be amputated, although the attending surgeon advised him that he would imperil his life by his refusal. He eventually died of lockjaw. On the trial it was contended in behalf of the prisoner that the cause of death was not the wound which he had inflicted, but was the obstinate refusal of the deceased to submit to surgical treatment which would have averted the fatal result. Mr. Justice Maule, however, instructed the jury that if the prisoner willfully and without any [273] justification inflicted the wound which was ultimately the cause of death, the prisoner was guilty of murder; that for this purpose it made no difference whether the wound was in its own nature instantly mortal or whether it became the cause of death by reason of the deceased not having adopted the best mode of treatment, and that the real question was whether in the end the wound inflicted by the prisoner was the cause of death.

Where the wound or injury has contributed mediately or immediately to the death of the injured person and the injury was neglected or mismanaged, to warrant the escape of the person inflicting the injury from the responsibility for the killing, the subsequent neglect or mismanagement must have been the sole cause of death. (Wharton on Homicide [3d ed.] p. 41.)

In 2 Bishop on Criminal Law (§ 637 et seq.) it is stated: "Whenever a blow is inflicted under circumstances to render the party inflicting it criminally responsible if death follows, he will be deemed guilty of the homicide though the person beaten would have died from other causes, or would not have died from this one had not others operated with it; provided the blow really contributed either mediately or immediately to the death in a degree sufficient for the law's notice." (§ 637.)

"And the doctrine is established, that if the blow caused the death, it is sufficient, though the individual might have recovered had he used proper care himself; or submitted to a surgical operation, to which he refused submission; or had the surgeons treated the wound properly." (§ 638.)

"But where the wound is not of itself mortal, and the party dies in consequence solely of the improper treatment, not at all of the wound, the result is otherwise. And it is the same if the wounded person becomes sick and dies of an independent disease, not connected with the wound, which was not mortal. But we should not suffer these propositions to carry us too far; because, in [274] law, if the person dies by the action of the wound, and by the medical or surgical action, jointly, the wound must clearly be regarded sufficiently a cause of the death." (§ 639.)

In Com. v. Hackett, 2 Allen (Mass.) 136, the defendant was convicted of murder of stabbing. He contended that the evidence showed that the wound of the deceased was unskillfully and improperly treated by the surgeons. Bigelow, Ch. J., after quoting from the English authorities, said: "The well established rule of the common law would seem to be, that if the wound was a dangerous wound, that is, calculated to endanger or destroy life, and death ensued therefrom, it is a sufficient proof of the offence of murder or manslaughter; and that the person who inflicted it is responsible, though it may appear that the deceased might have recovered if he had taken proper care of himself, or submitted to a surgical operation, or that unskillful or improper treatment aggravated the wound and contributed to the death, or that death was immediately caused by a surgical operation rendered necessary by the condition of the wound. The principle upon which this rule is founded is one of universal application and lies at the foundation of all our criminal jurisprudence. It is, that every person is to be held to contemplate and to be responsible for the natural consequences of his own acts. If a person inflicts a wound with a deadly weapon in such manner as to put life in jeopardy, and death follows as a consequence of this felonious and wicked act, it does not alter its nature or diminish its criminality to prove that other causes co-operated in producing the fatal result. Indeed, it may be said that neglect of the wound or its unskillful and improper treatment, which were of themselves consequences of the criminal act, which might naturally follow in any case, must in law be deemed to have been among those which were in contemplation of the guilty party, and for which he is to be held responsible."

[275] In State v. Bantley, 44 Conn. 537, 26 Am. Rep. 486, the defendant inflicted a gunshot wound upon the deceased, who died eleven days thereafter of lockjaw. There was evidence of mismanagement or carelessness on the part of the attending physicians. Again the court, after citing many of the same authorities cited in the Hackett Case (supra), deduces the following rule: "If one person inflicts upon another a dangerous wound, one that is calculated to endanger and destroy life, and death ensues therefrom within a year and a day, it is sufficient proof of the offence either of manslaughter or murder, as the case may be; and he is none the less responsible for the result though it may appear that the deceased might have recovered if he had taken proper care of himself, or that unskillful or improper treatment aggravated the wound and contributed to his death."

In Com. v. Eisenhower, 181 Pa. St. 470, 37 Atl. 521, 59 Am. St. Rep. 670, the killing was by shooting and there was evidence in the case that the attending surgeon treated the wound by means of a drainage tube which found its way into the spinal cord and thus caused death. The trial court in referring to this said: "But suppose it did, the prisoner cannot escape by showing that death was the result of an accident occurring in an operation which his felonious act made necessary. There is no pretense that the drainage tubes were not required or that they were improperly placed." This instruction was declared by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania to be clearly correct.

In State v. Wood, 112 Ia. 411, 84 N. W. 520, the defendant was convicted of manslaughter for having committed homicide by means of an assault upon his victim with his fists and feet, inflicting mortal wounds of which the victim died. The latter had improved under medical treatment at first but subsequently empyema set in resulting in his death. The appellant insisted that the evidence tended to show that but for mismanagement on the part of the physician he might have recovered, and that the jury [276] should have been instructed, if they so found, that the accused could not be convicted of manslaughter. The Supreme Court of Iowa approved the rule applicable to such a case as thus stated by Greenleaf: "If death ensues from a wound given in malice, but not, in its nature, mortal, but which, being neglected or mismanaged, the party died, this will not excuse the prisoner who gave it." (3 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 139.) The court goes on to say: "The true reason for not allowing the defence is that the wound inflicted, though it may not have been the only cause, yet contributed, mediately or intermediately, to the death of the person assaulted. To warrant escape from the responsibility for the killing, the subsequent mismanagement or neglect must have been the sole cause of death. No principle is better settled than that he who, by his wrongful act, accelerates or hastens death, or contributes to its cause, is guilty of homicide; and whether this be murder or manslaughter necessarily depends on the intent or motive by which the person making it was actuated. The court rightly instructed that, if the injuries inflicted by the defendant directly contributed to produce empyema causing death, he was guilty of taking the life of the deceased; if these did not so contribute, he could not be convicted of murder or manslaughter."

In State v. Strong, 153 Mo. 548, 55 S. W. 78, the wound was inflicted with a knife. An instruction by the trial court was approved which was to the effect that the jury might find the defendant guilty "notwithstanding you may also find and believe the testimony that unskilled medical treatment aggravated such wound and that deceased might have recovered if greater care and skill had been employed in treating him."

Further illustrations of the general rule as it has been stated may be found in People v. Cook, 39 Mich. 236, 33 Am. Rep. 380; Kelley v. State, 53 Ind. 311; Downing v. State, 114 Ga. 30, 39 S. E. 927; Daughdrill v. State, 113 Ala. 7, 34, 21 So. 378; State v. Foote, [277] 58 S. C. 218, 36 S. E. 551; Clark v. Com. 90 Va. 360, 18 S. E. 360, and Coffman v. Com. 10 Bush (Ky.) 495.

The instructions given to the jury by the learned trial judge on this phase of the case before us being in strict accordance with the settled law and the evidence being sufficient to warrant the finding that the wounds inflicted by the defendant operated as causes of death even though the medical treatment may also have had some causative influence, the record discloses no error in this respect.

The only other point which requires notice refers to the admission of the dying declaration of Anna Klein, taken by the coroner.

It appears from the evidence in the present case, and from the records in several other capital cases which have recently come before us, that a new custom has come into vogue among coroners in reference to dying declarations of victims of crime. A printed form is prepared by these officers for use in obtaining such declarations upon which the first question is: "Do you now believe that you are about to die?" Then follow these questions:

"Question: Have you any hope of recovery from the effects of the injury that you have received?"

"Question: Are you willing to make a true statement as to how and in what manner you came by the injury from which you are now suffering?"

This method of interrogation by reference to printed questions is not necessarily objectionable in itself provided the questions are put, not in a perfunctory manner, but in such a way as to impress the injured person with their true character and meaning. On the other hand, if the initial inquiry in reference to the patient's apprehension of death is slurred over and we have nothing but a careless assent, perhaps expressed only by a nod to the question, whether the patient now believes that he is about to die, there is an utter absence of the clear and unequivocal expression of the certain conviction of impending death which the law has always demanded as [278] an essential prerequisite to the admission of unsworn declarations of fact which may be used to deprive a human being of his life. We do not say that the necessary emphasis was lacking in the present case. On the contrary, if those who testified to the dying declaration here may be believed the victim declared in express words that she felt she would die and that she had no hope of recovery from the effects of the injury which she had received. These statements afforded ample ground for the reception of the statement which followed as to the circumstances of the fatal shooting. We deem it proper, however, to call attention to the untoward effects which may follow the use of printed forms, such as we have mentioned, unless extreme care is taken by the interlocutor to impress upon the wounded person the character of the preliminary inquiries relating to the anticipation of death. As we have already intimated, if these are treated as merely formal and unimportant, without taking any pains to make sure that the injured person understands them, the safeguard which the law exacts in such cases may be entirely wanting—in the absence of certainty that the patient looks upon death as an inevitable consequence of the injury and will, therefore, be as likely to tell the truth under the influence of that apprehension as he would be under the sanction of an oath calling God to witness that what he is about to say is true. In the case at bar the coroner who took the dying declaration, after testifying that he had a printed form and he took the questions from that form, said he had used as many as twenty of them for the purpose of taking dying declarations within the six months preceding the trial. His habit was to take the printed slip containing five printed questions out of his pocket and put the questions to the patient just as they were on the slip. It can readily be understood that a practice of this kind will be likely to degenerate into a mere perfunctory form; and we deem it proper to refer [279] to the matter in this way as a warning to those whose duties may call upon them to attend dying victims of crime. The precautions which the law prescribes to insure the existence of a state of mind on the part of the declarant which will be equivalent to the state of mind produced by the administration of a solemn oath, cannot be too carefully observed. If they are disregarded in the slightest degree the evidentiary value of the declaration is wholly destroyed.

In several of the states of the Union the reception in criminal cases of dying declarations made under a sense of impending death, is regulated by statute. The Texas statute prescribes that in order to render declarations of the deceased competent evidence, it must be proved, among other things, that the declaration was not made in answer to interrogatories calculated to lead the deceased to make any particular statement. (Texas Code Crim. Pro. 1895, § 788.) This is doubtless the rule independent of any statutory enactment; and it applies to the statements of the wounded person in regard to his hope of recovery just as much as to his statement respecting the identity of his assailant.

We find no error of law or fact in this case which calls for a reversal of the judgment. There was ample evidence of an intent to kill; the necessary premeditation and deliberation could well be found by the jury; and whether the treatment that the wounded woman received at the hospital was all that it should have been or not, the conclusion that the pistol-shot wounds inflicted by the defendant were the cause of her death was warranted by the proof and we cannot say that it was wrong.

The judgment of conviction should be affirmed.

Treatment of Wounds.

The recent cases are in accord with the holding in Hamblin v. State, 81 Neb. 148, 16 Ann. Cas. 569, that where a person inflicts on another wounds which are dangerous or calculated to cause death, under circumstances rendering the person inflicting the wounds criminally guilty therefor, erroneous treatment of the wound or of the wounded person suffering from it, which merely contributes to the death, will afford no protection against a charge of unlawful homicide. Johnson v. State, 64 Fla. 318, 59 So. 894; Allen v. State, 133 Ga. 260, 65 S. E. 431; Perdue v. State, 135 Ga. 277, 69 S. E. 184; Quinn v. State, 106 Miss. 844, 64 So. 738. And see the reported case. Thus in Johnson v. State, supra, wherein it was contended by the defendant that the life of the deceased who had been cut in the abdomen, might have been saved by proper surgery, the court said that one cannot escape the penalties for an act which in point of fact produces death, though the death might possibly have been averted by some possible mode of treatment. In Quinn v. State, 106 Miss. 844, 64 So. 738, it appeared that the deceased was struck by the defendant on the head with an empty whisky bottle, fracturing his skull. He contracted pneumonia and died some two months after the wound was inflicted. It was maintained that he had not received proper medical treatment. The court said: "It is undoubtedly the law that, if death results from the combined effect of a wound inflicted with malice and of a disease disconnected from the wound the person inflicting the wound is guilty of murder."

But where a person inflicts on another a wound, not of itself mortal or calculated to produce death, and the injured person dies solely because of improper treatment of the wound, the fact that death so results is a good defense to a charge of homicide. State v. Morahan, 7 Penn. (Del.) 494, 77 Atl. 488; Tibbs v. Com. 138 Ky. 558, 128 S. W. 871; Quinn v. State, 106 Miss. 844, 64 So. 738; McMillan v. State, 58 Tex. Crim. 525, 126 S. W. 875. And see the reported case. Thus in Quinn v. State, supra, the court said the law was that if the wound was not "in its nature mortal, and death results solely from an entirely independent cause, the person inflicting the wound cannot be held responsible for the death." And in McMillan v. State, 58 Tex. Crim. 525, 126 S. W. 875, the same rule was affirmed, the court saying: "Appellant was entitled to have the jury instructed as requested by him, that if the death of deceased was brought about by improper treatment or gross neglect of the physicians, he would not be guilty of the homicide. The evidence, even as briefly stated in the foregoing portion of the opinion, suggests that it may have been the improper treatment that brought about the peritonitis which resulted fatally. It was an issue before the jury on the facts sharply drawn and strongly presented."

Where a wound is apparently mortal, and a surgical operation is performed in a proper manner, under circumstances which render it necessary, in the opinion of competent surgeons, though the operation is itself the immediate cause of the death the person who inflicted the wound will be responsible. People v. Williams, 27 Cal. App. 397, 149 Pac. 768; State v. Gabriella, 163 Ia. 297, 144 N. W. 9; McCoy v. Com. 149 Ky. 447, 149 S. W. 903; Odeneal v. State, 128 Tenn. 60, 157 S. W. 419. Thus in People v. Williams, supra, wherein it appeared that the death of a person feloniously shot was due to the shock of the wound and of the operation for the removal of the bullet, it was held that the wound was the primary cause. The court said that "it was immaterial to know, and therefore the trial court rightfully refused to permit the defendant to show, whether or not the deceased would have survived the shock of the wound in the absence of naturally resulting complications." In State v. Gabriella, 163 Ia. 297, 144 N. W. 9, it appeared that immediately after a shooting the victim was taken to a hospital where he was operated on with a view of improving his condition and saving his life. The trial judge rejected evidence offered by the defendant "to show that the operation was not performed in a manner that a reasonably prudent doctor would perform the same." Affirming a judgment of conviction for manslaughter the court said: "There is no claim that Turso had recovered from his wound at the time of the operation, nor that there was any evil intent in the performance of the operation, nor that it was performed for any other purpose than in a good-faith attempt to save the life of the patient. Lack of skill or bad judgment or mere negligence in any form on the part of the surgeon will not avail the slayer to protect him against the final consequences of his wrongful act." So in Odenal v. State, 128 Tenn. 60, 157 S. W. 419, the court said: "One who unlawfully inflicts a dangerous wound upon another is held for the consequences flowing from such injury, whether the sequence be direct or through the operation of intermediate agencies dependent upon and arising out of the original cause. One of these dependent occurrences is the necessity of surgical aid, which may eventuate as the immediate cause of death. Surgical aid must be employed, with the attendant risks. Surgeons are not infallible. They are required to have and exercise only reasonable skill, measured by the rules of their art or profession. When the accused inflicts the injury that necessitates the operation, he is held to assume the risk attendant on it. Much is required before the surgeons can be substituted for the defendant."

The recent cases are agreed that the failure of a person feloniously wounded to procure treatment for his wounds, or improper conduct on his part aggravating his injuries, is no defense to a charge of homicide against the person causing the wounds. State v. Morahan, 7 Penn. (Del.) 494, 77 Atl. 488; Hollywood v. State, 19 Wyo. 493, 120 Pac. 471, rehearing denied 19 Wyo. 522, 122 Pac. 588. In the case last cited, wherein it was contended that the deceased by the use of opium caused hypostatic pneumonia to set in, the court said: "The use of opium or morphine by the deceased was not a defense, even though it may have contributed to the death of deceased, unless it was the sole cause of the death, or that death resulted from the use of morphine as a cause independent and distinct from the wound."

Disease Caused by Wounds.

The recent cases are in accord in holding that where a person wounds another, and death occurs from a disease which can be directly traced to the wound, the person inflicting the injuries is liable to the same extent as though the wound had caused the death. Dumas v. State, 159 Ala. 42, 49 So. 224, 133 Am. St. Rep. 17 (blood poisoning); State v. Block, 87 Conn. 573, 89 Atl. 167, 49 L.R.A.(N.S.) 913 (delirium tremens); State v. Harmon (Del.) 92 Atl. 853 (lock-jaw); Clements v. State, 141 Ga. 667, 81 S. E. 1117 (blood poisoning); State v. James, 123 Minn. 487, 144 N. W. 216 (pneumonia); Terrell v. State, 10 Okla. Crim. 488, 138 Pac. 1039 (blood clots in heart); Paschal v. State (Tex.) 174 S. W. 1057 (lepto meningitis). Thus in State v. Harmon, supra, the court said that "if the lock-jaw which it is alleged was the direct cause of Rickits' death resulted from the knife wounds inflicted by the prisoner, then the death was caused by said wounds." And in Dumas v. State, 159 Ala. 42, 49 So. 224, 133 Am. St. Rep. 17, wherein it appeared that blood poisoning set in and death resulted from the wound inflicted, it was held that the defendant could not minimize his criminal act by showing that the wounds were at first trifling and that the victim was so diseased as to become infected more readily with blood poison. So in State v. Block, 87 Conn. 573, 89 Atl. 167, 49 L.R.A.(N.S.) 913, it appeared that deceased while being driven in an automobile at a dangerous and reckless rate of speed by the defendant was thrown therefrom. The deceased was suffering from an alcoholic brain and delirium tremens ensued from the fall. It was held that the fall was the legal cause of his death. The court said: "The judge in the present case told the jury, in substance, that it was sufficient if they found from the evidence that the injuries received by Gilbert in his fall from the automobile caused delirium tremens, which caused his death, and that the delirium tremens would not have occurred and caused his death if the wounds received from the fall had not been received. These instructions are in conformity with the principles of law above indicated."

Perilous Condition Created by Accused.

It has been held recently that where a person by the use of force, applied either to the body or mind, compels another person to do that which causes his death, he is as much responsible for the death as though he had caused it with his own hands. Rex v. Hayward, 21 Cox C. C. (Eng.) 692; State v. Angelina, 73 W. Va. 146, 80 S. E. 141, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 877. In the case first cited it appeared that the death of a wife was due to physical exertion and fright on her part caused by the violent conduct of her husband. The court held that the evidence was sufficient to support a conviction for manslaughter and that proof of actual physical violence was not necessary. And in State v. Angelina, supra, it appeared that the defendant inflicted a mortal wound on the deceased who within a minute and a half thereafter shot himself in the head from which wounds he died in about twenty minutes. The court said: "On the evidence before the jury at the trial, the proper theory of the state's instructions should have been a mortal wound by defendant, and that the self-inflicted injury by deceased, though it may have been the proximate cause of death, was not the act of an intervening responsible agent, but of one rendered irresponsible by the wound inflicted by defendant, and as the natural result of that wound, the causing cause of the immediate death of deceased."

Independent Supervening Cause.

Where it appears that the act of the accused was not the proximate cause of the death of the person for whose murder he is being prosecuted, but that another cause intervened, with which he was in no way connected, and but for which death would not have occurred, the supervening cause is a good defense to the charge of homicide. See State v. Angelina, 73 W. Va. 146, 80 S. E. 141, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 877. Compare Henderson v. State, 11 Ala. App. 37, 65 So. 721. In the case first cited, the court said that the well established rule or principle of homicide was that "if after a mortal blow or wound is inflicted by one person another independent responsible agent in no way connected in causal relation with the first, intervenes and wrongfully inflicts another injury, the proximate cause of the homicide, the latter and not the former is guilty of the murder."

But in Henderson v. State, 11 Ala. App. 37, 65 So. 721, it appeared that the deceased was first stabbed by the defendant, and then shot by his son, dying shortly thereafter. Affirming a conviction of murder in the second degree the court said: "Under the law, if the jury believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the knife wound inflicted by the defendant contributed to the death of deceased, then defendant would be guilty of the homicide, notwithstanding the jury may not have believed that death would have inevitably followed from such knife wound alone, and notwithstanding they may not have believed that there was any preconcert or community of purpose between defendant and his son."

SOTHAM

v.

MACOMBER ET AL.

Michigan Supreme Court—April 7, 1914.

180 Mich. 120; 146 N. W. 674.

Brokers — Right to Compensation — Ability of Purchaser.

A person, employed to arrange for, advertise, and conduct an auction sale of lands, whether called a sales manager, with a salary and expenses and a right to one-half the net profits or a broker, cannot recover, unless there is a sale or the production of some one able and willing to purchase according to the terms previously agreed upon between him and the owners or on terms agreeable to the owners; and hence, in an action for compensation, evidence as to the pecuniary responsibility of one to whom the property was struck off, but who was never in a position to buy the land, is properly received.

[See 139 Am. St. Rep. 250; 4 R. C. L. tit. Brokers, p. 309.]

Witnesses — Confidential Communications — Stenographers.

In an action for compensation under a contract to arrange for, advertise, and conduct an auction sale of lands for an agreed price and expenses, the testimony of a stenographer, employed to assist plaintiff and paid out of the expense fund which came out of the proceeds of sales, concerning matters taken from plaintiff's books, is not privileged, as she owed no duty to plaintiff that she did not owe to defendants, and neither she nor plaintiff had any right to withhold information from defendants.

[See note at end of this case.]

Error to Circuit Court, Montcalm county: DAVIS, Judge.

Action to recover commissions. Thomas F. B. Sotham, plaintiff, and Esther Macomber et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff for less than amount claimed. Plaintiff brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Laurence W. Smith for plaintiff in error.
N. O. Griswold and S. F. Kennedy for defendant in error.

[121] MOORE, J.—This action is brought to recover commissions claimed to have been earned by the plaintiff on the sale of various parcels of land in and about Lakeview, Montcalm county, Mich.; some of the sales being consummated and others, it is claimed, being defeated by the actions of the vendors. It is also sought to recover a percentage of the cost of conducting the sale.

The firm of Macomber & Bale owned many thousands of acres of wild and improved lands in and around Lakeview. Mr. Macomber died, and his wife, Esther Macomber, as executrix, and Charles M. Miller, as executor, with the will annexed, assumed the administration of his estate.

It is claimed by plaintiff as follows:

"That plaintiff should undertake to sell all the lands defendants owned about Lakeview.

"He was to arrange for, advertise, and conduct the auction sale of these lands, and was to receive the sum of $1,000 and his expenses in any event. A list price was placed on each lot, and in the event that the total sales amounted to more than the list plus the expenses of sale, including $1,000 for plaintiff, then and in that case such excess was to be equally divided between plaintiff and the defendants; the plaintiff receiving one-half. All expenses were to be borne by the defendants.

[122] "It is claimed by the plaintiff that certain village property was put into the sale in the disposal of which he was to have no interest, except that these lots were to bear their pro rata of the general sale expense, which, in the event of a surplus, would inure one-half to his benefit."

This claim is not admitted by the defendants.

"The plaintiff claims also for the repairs necessarily made to his automobile, for parts and tires worn out in the sale service."

This claim is not admitted by defendants.

After the arrangement was made, an elaborate illustrated catalogue of 90 pages, containing maps, landscape views, pictures of State and other buildings, advertising for sale 111 tracts of land at auction, which was to be held September 6th, 7th, and 8th, and October 4th, 5th, and 6th, was published and freely circulated. This catalogue advertised special low-rate, round-trip excursion rates. The announcement was signed as follows:

"Lakeview, Michigan, July 15th, 1911.

"Estate of Allen Macomber, Deceased.

"Esther Macomber, Administratrix.

"Charles M. Miller, Administrator.

"Macomber & Bale.

"John J. Bale.

"Sotham & Sons Land Co.

"Carey M. Jones, Auctioneer.

"T. F. B. Sotham, Sale Manager."

At the close of the catalogue were printed 12 rules and regulations in relation to the sale. The following of which are important in this litigation:

"Rule IV.—Deposit. Whenever the auctioneer shall declare any lot (subdivision of lot, or combination of lots) sold, the buyer or buyers thereof shall forthwith deposit at least ten per cent. of the purchase price with the clerk of the sale as a first payment. Such deposits may be made in currency, bank draft, certificate of deposit or certified check, endorsed to the [123] satisfaction of the clerk. In event any buyer should fail or neglect to satisfactorily settle such first payment, the auctioneer may declare sale void and thereafter resell the premises in question."

"Rule IX.—Terms: Cash or its equivalent. Half cash with mortgage on land purchased to secure payment of balance will be deemed the same as all cash. Earnest, capable, honest workers desiring to buy on smaller cash payments will be accommodated, but before bidding should arrange for credit with the sale manager. Such sales will be covered by contract. Interest on all deferred payments will be at the rate of six per cent. per annum. Time to suit purchaser within 5-year limit unless otherwise agreed.

"Rule X.—Settlements. The right is reserved to the vendors to declare off any sale or sales not satisfactorily settled for within ten days from date of such sale and to declare any payment or payments under Rule IV forfeited thereafter.

"Rule XI.—Commissions. One commission, of one dollar ($1.00) per acre, on each lot or subdivision of lot sold and satisfactorily settled for, will be paid land agents who comply with the following conditions. Said land agent must attend sale in person. . . . Such names must be filed at least twenty-four hours prior to clients' purchase at sale; otherwise the agent will forfeit any commission rights that could accrue hereunder.

"XII. Any and all statements, offers, bids, sales, payments or settlements made by buyer, seller or agents of either, at these auctions are subject to these rules. The right to interpret these rules is strictly reserved to and in the vendors."

Part of the lands were sold and part were not. The parties to this litigation could not agree as to the compensation due the plaintiff, and this suit was commenced by summons, followed later by a declaration on all the common counts in assumpsit. This was followed by a bill of particulars for "commission due as per contracts earned on the following pieces of real estate." Then followed the lot numbers and the expense account. The case was put at issue, and early in the trial the respective counsel made concessions [124] that simplified the issues. It was conceded by defendants that the profits on the land sold were $5,485, less the expenses incurred, which, including $1,000 for plaintiff's salary, amounted to $5,062.32, and that if the lands sold on contract were to be counted as though sold for cash, there was due plaintiff $234.13. This made no allowance for automobile repairs, salaries to the sons of plaintiff for acting as chauffeurs, or for the making of a map; it being the claim of defendants that plaintiff was not entitled to any allowances on these claims, except for the map, and as to that the parties could not agree as to the amount.

The trial judge submitted these two claims to the jury, who returned a verdict of $25 for the map, and $300 for chauffeurs' salaries and automobile repairs, and a verdict and judgment were entered in favor of the plaintiff for $500.25. The defendants have not appealed. The plaintiff has brought the case here by writ of error.

The first question we will consider is whether the jury should have been allowed to assess some damages because certain village properties should have borne their pro rata share of the general sale expense. It was the claim of defendants that these lands were put in the catalogue, at the request of plaintiff, for advertising purposes only, and that plaintiff's claim that they should bear part of the expense was untenable. The court was of the opinion that in any event there was no showing which would warrant an intelligent apportionment pro rata of these expenses. Counsel does not suggest in his brief whether it should be upon the basis of values, or acreage, or number of lots. We agree with the judge that there is no basis for intelligently arriving at an amount for this purpose.

The special grievance of the plaintiff is that the court decided, as a matter of law, that he was not [125] entitled to compensation as to various lots of land, where no sale was, in fact, made. It will not be necessary to discuss in this opinion each lot which was offered for sale, and struck off to a bidder, as is done by counsel in their brief. We will take up the most important items, and the ones most favorable to the claim of plaintiff. Those are lot 6 and lot 7.

We now quote from the brief:

"Lot 6 was struck off to Hiley Warner at $22,000 and sold to him. Lot 7 was struck off to the same buyer at $1,800, making a total of $23,800. Before the bidding started, Bale and plaintiff urged Warner to bid. Warner told them he couldn't comply with the rule as to 1 per cent. down, and defendant Bale told him to bid, and he would take care of him, give him time on the 10 per cent. and on the balance. Warner told him he thought he could interest other parties in it. It was struck off to him in the presence of defendants Bale and Miller.

"Bale told Warner that whatever arrangement he made with Sotham as to time was all right with him. Sotham told him he could have 20 days on the 10 per cent., and 90 days or longer on the balance, to be half cash and half mortgage or all cash. Accordingly Warner gave a check due in 20 days, which satisfied Sotham and Bale, but not defendant Miller, and one due in 10 days was substituted.

"Warner interested Meade, Sandell, Lambertson, and Chappell in the deal, and they agreed to finance him and give him one-fifth of the profits. Warner told Bale he had interested Lambertson and Chappell, and that they would back him. Then Sotham sent Exhibit 19 to Warner and to the bank at which the check was payable, attempting to change the terms and get the balance above the 10 per cent. in cash on the same day the check was due.

"Sotham and the vendors went to Belding the day the check was due, and met Warner and his people. The Belding people objected to the change in terms, and offered to pay the 10 per cent. check of $2,380 that day, and to bind themselves to pay the rest within 30 days, reserving the right to give a mortgage of $12,000. This was agreed to by all parties. Then [126] the dispute arose over the form by which this agreement should be set forth. Defendant Miller wanted a bond to guarantee payment of Warner's bid, and would not sign a land contract setting forth the agreement that was reached, on the advice of his attorney. The check was not protested until after the Belding meeting. At that time they were ready to pay it. The financial ability of the Belding parties up to the $12,000 to be covered by mortgage was conceded on the trial.

"After this deal fell through, Sotham re-advertised lots 1 to 7 for the October auction in his circular of September 23d, but they were not offered in that auction. . . .

"The first assignment of error relates to the court's allowing the witness Warner to answer the following question: 'Q. What property did you have in September, 1911?' (the time of the sale). Unless the test of our performance is the buyer's ability at the time of the sale to pay the purchase price, the question was immaterial, and the answer should not have been received. Under the agreement as to the conduct of the sale, the vendors—that is, the defendants—were to pass on all credits. This would necessarily negative the idea of any guaranty on the part of the plaintiff of the financial ability of any purchaser. Nowhere in the correspondence is any such idea hinted at. In this connection let it be noted from a reading of Exhibit 6, which forms the basis of the agreement, that plaintiff was bound only as a sale manager, and is not held as strictly as a broker would be. His duty consisted in working out a plan and putting it through. He was to run the sale and advertise it. He lacked many characteristics of a broker. But, even if he is considered as a broker, without an agreement on his part to guarantee the financial ability of a buyer, such ability or inability is immaterial in an action for commissions.

"Before citing authorities on this proposition, I desire to call the court's attention to another matter directly connected with it, viz., that, where a purchaser is presented who is ready and willing to sign a contract in compliance with his offer, the failure of the vendor to require such a contract is no defense to an action for commissions if the sale falls through, [127] and to argue from that the proposition demonstrated by the cases that where buyer and seller enter into a contract of sale, the agent's commissions are not thereafter defeated by the financial inability of the purchaser to perform. Consequently it is our claim in this case, under this assignment, that Warner is to be treated as having entered into a binding contract to buy, and his financial ability to carry that out being immaterial, the question and answer excepted to should not have been received."

The defendants do not admit the truth of the statements of counsel as we have stated them, but it may be safely assumed counsel will make as favorable a claim for his client as the record will warrant.

The foregoing claim raises the pivotal questions in the case. Mr. Warner testified as to the extent of his property. When he gave the check referred to, he had not to exceed $100 in the bank. He had some horses and other personal property, all of which was chattel mortgaged. Exhibit 19 referred to in the brief of counsel for appellant, which we have quoted, reads:

"Lakeview, Mich., Sept. 7, 1911.

"Hiley Warner, Orleans, Mich., to Macomber & Bale, Dr. to lots 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 of land catalogue, $23,800.00. Due this day according to Rule 4 of the sale rules and regulations, a deposit of ten per cent., or $2,380.00, for which, purely as an accommodation to Mr. Warner, he was allowed to deposit a ten-day check, due on or before September 18, 1911. The balance of purchase price, $21,420.00, to be paid in cash on or before September 21, 1911, at the Farmers' & Merchants' State bank of Lakeview, Michigan.

"N. B. Should the ten-day check for $2,380 not be paid on presentation September 18, 1911, the sale will be declared off, and bill rendered for such damages as may have been done. Should the check for $2,380 be paid on September 18, 1911, as agreed the said $2,380 will be held as a deposit under Rule 4, and forfeited as liquidated damages in event the balance of $21,420 is not paid in cash or its equivalent on the date and in the manner hereinbefore provided."

[128] This exhibit was prepared and sent by the plaintiff, indicating his understanding of the situation. Notwithstanding the impecunious condition of Mr. Warner, the defendants were willing that he should have the benefit of his bid, if he could get the Belding parties to do what it was his duty to do, if the bid was to remain good, and the defendants and Mr. Sotham went to Belding to see what could be done.

The plaintiff claims an agreement was made by all the parties at Belding, and cites the testimony of the attorney, Mr. Hubbell. This witness, after testifying to the conferences held by the parties, and to drawing a contract which was satisfactory to his clients, and to the production by Mr. Miller of papers drawn by the attorney for defendant, closed his testimony as follows:

"Q. They four didn't get together and agree it was what they wanted and that they would sign it, did they? A. Oh, no; the two sides didn't get together upon it."

The conference ended without the parties being able to get together, and later the $2,380 check given by Mr. Warner went to protest.

Following the Belding conference Mr. Sotham prepared and circulated in large quantities a circular letter reading in part as follows:

"Lakeview, Michigan.

"Closing Session.

Grand Wind-up.

"Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, October 4th, 5th, and 6th, 1911.

"T. F. B. Sotham, Sale Manager.

"Lakeview, Mich., Sept. 23d, 1911.

"Dear Sir:

"Since last writing we 'woke up' and got busy adding attractive land bargains to those (lots 56 to 111 of catalog) originally set apart for the closing session Oct. 4, 5, and 6 of our Lakeview land auctions. . . .

"Having revived somewhat from the disappointing [129] shock of low prices at the September auction, and adjusted ourselves to the situation, we saw that at the sale prices the lands we had sold were yet the very cheapest really first-class lands in Michigan. . . .

Again, certain other buyers were disappointed in their money arrangements, and while the vendors will aid our customers in every consistent way and will not crawfish on any sale, no matter how absurdly low the price, it is obvious that they cannot be cut off from the right to reoffer in our October auction any September lot not settled for.

"Therefore, kindly take notice that in addition to lots 17 and 21 (passed) we will be able to reoffer lots 6, 7, 22, 36, 37 and 38 in our October auction. You will see by the catalog that lot 6 is the celebrated Macomber & Bale home farm made up of lots 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5. . . . Now, if you missed coming to the September sale remember that we have these lots where you can get another chance at them.

[Signed] "Sotham & Sons Land Co.,
"By T. F. B. Sotham."

The auction sale in October was held, but these lands found no purchaser, and had not been sold at the time of the trial. It is not very important in what way Mr. Sotham is characterized in this transaction, whether he is called sales manager, with a salary and expenses, with the right to one-half the net profits, or whether he is called a real estate broker; in either event he must show either a sale or the production of some one able and willing to purchase according to the terms fixed in the contract between him and the vendors, or to take the property upon terms agreeable to himself and the vendors.

As bearing upon the last of these two propositions, it was entirely proper to inquire into the pecuniary responsibility of Mr. Warner, who was the bidder, and to whom the property was struck off. The record shows beyond any question that Mr. Warner was never in a position to buy the lands; that Belding parties were never present at the sale; and that [130] though a conference was had with them at Belding, they and the vendors were not able to get together; and that nothing came of the extensive and expensive advertising, so far as securing a sale of these lands is concerned. The result of the ruling of the trial judge is that the plaintiff has been given a judgment for the balance due upon his share of the profits of all sales made, whether payment was made in cash, or partly in cash and partly upon land contract.

One other assignment requires attention. We again quote from the brief:

"13. This relates to permitting Miss Conant, the stenographer furnished the plaintiff, to testify in relation to Exhibit 43, the list she took from plaintiff's book of the list prices, the plaintiff claiming the communication is privileged. As appears on pages 8 and 9 of the record, in plaintiff's bill of particulars, Miss Conant's salary was a sale expense to which plaintiff contributed from the surplus. She was therefore as much his stenographer as the defendants' . . .

"We submit that this communication, or, rather, this taking of information by a stenographer from records to which she is in confidence given access, demands the utmost protection. Its primary quality is confidence in nondisclosure. There can be no doubt that the universal opinion favors its maintenance. Compared with the benefit to a litigated case, if the privilege is abused the relation must terminate. The admission of the testimony was error. Its only purpose could be to disprove plaintiff when he says that his report of the list price of lot 94 contained in Exhibit 34 was an error on his part, unintentional any typographical, and that no such list was ever given him."

We have difficulty in understanding this contention. Mr. Sotham was the sales manager of defendants. Miss Conant was employed as stenographer to assist him in his duties, and was paid out of the expense fund, which, of course, came out of the proceeds of the sale of defendants' land. She owed no duty to Mr. Sotham that she did not owe to defendants, and [131] it was not the duty of either of them to withhold any information from defendants as to what was being done to promote the sales. We discover no reversible error in the case.

Judgment is affirmed.

Introductory.

This note is designed to review the status, with respect to privilege from disclosure, of communications made or information acquired in a fiduciary or confidential capacity other than that of legal, medical or spiritual adviser or of spouse. It excludes the question of privilege with respect to a person acting as assistant to one having an established privilege, such as the clerk of an attorney or a nurse assisting a physician. It also excludes the privilege accorded to state secrets and privilege, resting on the same reason, of the source of information leading to the detection of a crime.

It may be stated as a general rule that except for the common law privilege with respect to communications to an attorney and those privileges which have been expressly declared by statute, the public interest in the disclosure of all facts relevant to a litigated issue is deemed to be paramount to any consideration of the inviolability of a communication made in reliance on personal confidence or on a fiduciary or contract relation. See the cases cited throughout this note. In Wheeler v. LeMarchant, 17 Ch. D. 675, the common law rule was stated by Jessel, M. R., as follows: "In the first place, the principle protecting confidential communications is of a very limited character. It does not protect all confidential communications which a man must necessarily make in order to obtain advice, even when needed for the protection of his life, or of his honor, or of his fortune. There are many communications which, though absolutely necessary because without them the ordinary business of life cannot be carried on, still are not privileged. The communications made to a medical man whose advice is sought by a patient with respect to the probable origin of the disease as to which he is consulted, and which must necessarily be made in order to enable the medical man to advise or to prescribe for the patient, are not protected. Communications made to a priest in the confessional on matters perhaps considered by the penitent to be more important even than his life or his fortune, are not protected. Communications made to a friend with respect to matters of the most delicate nature, on which advice is sought with respect to a man's honor or reputation, are not protected. Therefore it must not be supposed that there is any principle which says that every confidential communication which it is necessary to make in order to carry on the ordinary business of life is protected. The protection is of a very limited character, and in this country is restricted to the obtaining the assistance of lawyers, as regards the conduct of litigation or the rights to property."

The disinclination of the courts to extend the established limits of the privilege was thus expressed in Henisler v. Freedman, 2 Pars. Eq. Cas. (Pa.) 274: "The law is jealous of extending the circle of persons, excused or interdicted from giving testimony. Parents are required to testify against children, children against parents, brothers against brothers, friends against friends. Communications by letter, made under the deepest obligations of friendship, affection, or honor, still must be produced, if deemed necessary to the ascertainment of truth, and the administration of justice by the public tribunals. To this great end of social organization, all secondary causes are required to give way."

Communication Based on Friendship or Promise of Secrecy.

In a few early English cases the courts evinced some disposition to treat as privileged communications made in personal confidence, on the ground that the honor of the recipient was involved. Courtess of Shrews- bury's Case, 12 Rep. 94; Rex v. Gray, 9 How. St. Tr. 129; Rex v. Laver, 16 How. St. Tr. 93. And after that view had been overruled by the decision of the House of Lords in the Rex v. Kingston, 20 How. St. Tr. 586, some reluctance was expressed in denying the privilege in Wilson v. Rastall, 4 T. R. 753, the court saying: "It is indeed hard in many cases to compel a friend to disclose a confidential conversation; and I should be glad if by law such evidence could be excluded. It is a subject of just indignation where persons are anxious to reveal what has been communicated to them in a confidential manner."

Following the decision of the House of Lords heretofore referred to, it is now established that a communication is not privileged from disclosure in evidence by the recipient because it is made in the confidence of personal friendship or in reliance on a promise of secrecy. Rex v. Hill, 20 How. St. Tr. 1362; Rex v. Shaw, 6 C. & P. 373, 25 E. C. L. 444; Hopkinson v. Burghley, L. R. 2 Ch. (Eng.) 447; Mills v. Griswold, 1 Root. (Conn.) 383; Sherman v. Sherman, 1 Root. (Conn.) 486; Calkins v. Lee, 2 Root. (Conn.) 363; Plunkett v. Hamilton, 136 Ga. 72, Ann. Cas. 1912B 1259, 70 S. E. 781, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 583; Com. v. Best, 180 Mass. 492, 62 N. E. 748; Rogers v. State, 88 Miss. 38, 40 So. 744; People v. Buchanan, 145 N. Y. 1, 39 N. E. 846; People v. Hess, 8 App. Div. 143, 40 N. Y. S. 486; Ex p. Parker, 74 S. C. 466, 55 S. E. 122; Owens v. Frank, 7 Wyo. 457, 53 Pac. 282, 75 Am. St. Rep. 932. In Plunkett v. Hamilton, supra, it was said: "It is declared in the constitution of this state that 'Protection to person and property is the paramount duty of government, and shall be impartial and complete.' Civil Code (1910), § 6358. In order that the judicial department of the government may discharge its duty in this regard, it is essential that the courts shall have the power to command and compel the giving of testimony. The citizen or inhabitant owes to the state the duty of testifying, when lawfully called upon to do so, in order that the truth may be ascertained and impartial and complete justice be done. Omitting any reference to instances which are expressly excepted, the law requires a witness to testify, when duly summoned before a court having jurisdiction, and called upon to give competent and relevant evidence. A promise not to testify when so required is substantially a promise not to obey the law. Such promises cannot be recognized, save in subordination to the requirements of the law. Neither can the wishes or even the commands, of employers be allowed to outweigh the commands of the law. If the views sought to be maintained in this case were permitted to prevail, the power to ascertain the truth in judicial investigations, and to administer justice accordingly, would depend, not upon the law of the land, but upon the private promises of secrecy on the part of witnesses, or upon the wishes or orders of their employers. To sustain such a doctrine would render courts impotent and the effort to administer justice oftentimes a mockery. An extreme illustration will serve to show where such theories, pursued to their logical end, might lead. A murderer, a burglar, or a thief might pledge his friends or their employers to secrecy, and succeed in concealing himself or the results of his crime; and when the witnesses who had knowledge of the facts were placed upon the stand, they might claim exemption from testifying, on the ground that they had pledged their sacred words to the criminal not to do so, and that they considered it disgraceful to violate such promise, or that they feared a loss of their employment if they testified to the truth." So in Rogers v. State, 88 Miss. 38, 40 So. 744, the court said: "The grand jury was inquiring into the larceny of a two thousand dollar money express package. Rogers was a witness, and testified that a woman with an infant in her arms had brought the package unbroken to him, to be by him returned to the express company, upon his solemn promise of secrecy and immunity from prosecution of the person who committed the larceny, and that the guilty party was unknown to him. Because of this solemn promise Rogers refused to name the woman who brought him the package. The grand jury reported him to the court, which fined him, and he appeals. In the prosecution of its duty to ferret out crime, it was entirely competent, relevant and material for the grand inquest of the county to ask the witness the name of the person who had in possession the stolen package. Without this indictments would depend upon the personal conception of the witness of the requirements of his private honor. Individual standards of elevated principles of social duty cannot be permitted to terminate investigations so absolutely essential to the public welfare." In the case of Ex p. Parker, 74 S. C. 466, 55 S. E. 122, it was said: "It is not pretended that the witness was required to disclose a privileged communication, or that any personal privilege or constitutional right of the witness himself was involved in requiring an answer to the question asked. As to the position that the witness should not have been required to repeat a private conversation, it is hardly necessary to say that the law cannot take account of purely sentimental considerations as against the public interests or substantial rights." In Owens v. Frank, 7 Wyo. 467, 53 Pac. 282, 75 Am. St. Rep. 932, holding that no privilege attaches to a communication to a fellow member of a fraternal order in reliance on an obligation of secrecy imposed thereby, the court said: "The error assigned involves the question whether a witness may refuse to answer a material question in relation to a material conversation on the ground that, having been given and received as a Mason, it is a privileged communication. . . . It is perfectly clear that at common law the conversation would not have been privileged. (1 Greenleaf on Ev. 15th ed. Secs. 236-248; Hoffman v. Smith, 1 Caines (N. Y.) 157, 159.) In the case cited the court said in the course of the opinion, 'Nor was there any weight in the objection to the competency of Mr. Troup's testimony, his information being received in the character of a friend and not in that of counsel.' In Greenleaf, at Sec. 248, the author says that the protection is not extended 'to confidential friends, clerks, bankers or stewards, except as to matters which the employer himself would not be obliged to disclose.' Neither does the statute include such a conversation among privileged communications, although the privilege is extended to certain communications which were not entitled to that protection at common law. Rev. Stat. 1887, Sec. 2589. The ruling of the court was therefore erroneous. However binding an obligation may be, as between members of the same society, secret or otherwise, not to divulge to others that which may be confidentially communicated to them, such an obligation must be understood to be subject to the laws of the country, and doubtless the societies themselves recognize that such a limitation attaches to the obligation; and therefore it cannot be said that the obligation is violated when the disclosure is compelled in a court of justice, in the course of the administration of the laws."

So it has been held that an answer to an inquiry addressed to persons whom another has given as references is not privileged, though the inquiry embodies an assurance that the answer will be treated as confidential. Webb v. East, 5 Ex. D. 108; Mahony v. National Widows' L. Assur. Fund, L. R. 6 C. P. (Eng.) 252. In the case last cited it was said: "Then with regard to the private friends' reports, there is no authority for saying that inspection ought not to be granted of such documents, but it is urged that they are confidential as between the parties who wrote them and the company who receive them. No doubt, as between these parties and the company, it is stated that they shall be confidential; but on what principle is that to affect the plaintiffs, when a dispute arises between them, and the company? The company now complain that they have been deceived in effecting this insurance. In so doing they acted on the proposal made by the plaintiffs, on the personal statement and medical officer's report, and also on these reports by private friends. Upon the issue, whether the company were deceived or no, it may be most essential to the plaintiffs' case to know what the statements contained in these last documents were. I do not say that in every case the court would order such documents as these to be produced. The court has a discretion, and is bound to exercise it according to the circumstances of the particular case. It is easy to see that in some cases these documents may be of importance, and in others not. Here, there are no grounds shown by the affidavits why they should not be produced, except the mere fact that they are stated to be confidential as between the insurance office and the parties who wrote them. That is not any legal ground of privilege."

A person cannot by marking papers "private and confidential" impress them with a privilege in the hands of a person to whom he sends them. Kitcat v. Sharp, 48 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 64.

Information Acquired in Employment or Fiduciary Relation Generally.

A clerk or other employee may be compelled to disclose information communicated to him in the course of his employment, though the disclosure operates to the detriment of his employer. Webb v. Smith, 1 C. & P. 337, 11 E. C. L. 410; J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. v. Fisher, 144 Ia. 45, 122 N. W. 575; Sondheim v. Schmidt, 66 N. Y. S. 1034. And see the reported case. In Corpus v. Robinson, 2 Wash. 388, 6 Fed. Cas. No. 3,252 it was said: "It is certainly a very unpleasant thing, to compel a person, standing in the situation of this witness, to betray the confidence of his principal. But it has never been considered as an objection which the witness can make, and were it to be laid down as a general rule, that a person, standing in such a situation, could excuse himself from giving evidence, it is impossible to foresee the extent of the mischief which might arise from it. The objection cannot prevail." So in Holmes v. Comegys, 1 Dall. (Pa.) 439, 1 U. S. (L. ed.) 213, the court said: "It would be of very dangerous consequence, if it was established, that a commercial agent was not amenable as a witness in a court of justice, in a cause against his constituent. It is straining the matter of privilege too far. And if the law makes him a witness, we are too fond of getting at the truth, to permit him to excuse himself from declaring it, because he conceives, that, in point of delicacy, it would be a breach of confidence." In Falmouth v. Moss, 11 Price (Eng.) 455, holding that an employee could be compelled to state the contents of a writing which had been entrusted to him, the court said: "I cannot, under the circumstances, consider that his being the steward of the owner of the estate, afforded him any protection from the examination. An arbitrator, on a reference before whom it had been produced, and who had taken a note of it, might have given evidence of it, if, after the notice, it had not been produced. An amanuensis, who might have been employed to transcribe it any time, or a private friend, to whom it might have been communicated in confidence, whilst partaking the hospitalities of his lordship's table, that he had in his possession a deed which showed that his uncle had only a life estate in the premises. All these persons might have been called to give evidence of its existence and contents. These instances are all confidences, more or less, and are only not protected because the parties do not come within the rule, being neither barrister, attorney nor solicitor; and the witness in this case, the steward of the party, is in no better situation than any of the persons I have enumerated."

A report made by an employee to his employer in the ordinary course of the employment, such as a report of an accident made by a railroad employee, is not privileged. Anderson v. British Columbia Bank, 2 Ch. D. (Eng.) 644; Woolley v. North London R. Co., L. R. 4 C. P. (Eng.) 602; Mahony v. National Widows' L. Assur. Fund, L. R. 6 C. P. (Eng.) 252; Skinner v. Great Northern R. Co. L. R. 9 Exch. (Eng.) 298; Van Volkenburg v. Bank of British North America, 5 British Columbia 4; Shea v. Halifax, etc. R. Co. 47 Nova Scotia 366; Carlton v. Western, etc. R. Co. 81 Ga. 531, 7 S. E. 623. In Virginia-Carolina Chemical Co. v. Knight, 106 Va. 674, 58 S. E. 725, it was said: "In the case at bar the report in question was made by an official of the defendant in the course of his ordinary duty immediately after the accident, before any action had been brought or threatened. A report made under those circumstances, although the original or a copy of it was afterward communicated to the defendant's attorneys when suit was threatened or brought, is not a privileged communication within the reason of the rule under the authorities."

A statute making privileged communications by an employer to his stenographer applies only to communications connected with the confidential employment. Ewing v. Hatcher (Ia.) 154 N. W. 869, wherein the court said: "It is next complained that one Minnie E. Allen was permitted to testify as to certain statements made by the defendant. She was at the time the defendant's stenographer. It was claimed that statements made to her were privileged, and that one cannot be permitted to divulge a privileged communication. It is true she was doing work for him as a stenographer at the time, but the matters testified to by her had no relationship to the duties imposed upon her as such, nor was the communication made to her in the capacity of stenographer. The statute relied upon is section 4608, Code Supplement 1913. The inhibition relates to confidential communications properly intrusted in a professional capacity, and necessary and proper to enable one to discharge the functions of his office according to the usual course of practice or discipline."

No privilege attaches to a confidential statement to a bank examiner. Cox v. Montague, 78 Fed. 845, 24 C. C. A. 364; to a mercantile agency, Shauer v. Alterton, 151 U. S. 607, 14 S. Ct. 442, 38 U. S. (L. ed.) 286; or to the pursuivant of the College of Heralds, Slade v. Tucker, 14 Ch. D. (Eng.) 824. In like manner no privilege attaches to information acquired by a trustee, Jones v. Manchester, 1 Vent. (Eng.) 197; or by a tenant in common or a guardian, Sutton v. Sutton (Tenn.) 68 S. W. 891. In Wills Point Bank v. Bates, 72 Tex. 137, 10 S. W. 348, holding that a communication between partners was not privileged, the court said: "The letter was an admission made by one member of the firm, shown to have been present at the time the transaction with Gugenheim & Co. was consummated, tending to show what its real nature was, and in reference to which either partner could be compelled to testify. Such declarations or admissions made by one partner to another have never been recognized as privileged communications. The fact of partnership being shown to have existed at the time the letter was written, and at the time the transaction to which it referred occurred, the writing of the letter and its contents might be proved by any person having knowledge of these facts."

Communication in View of Litigation.

Where an employer in view of existing or prospective litigation requires from an employee a report of facts relating to the subject matter thereof, the report is by the weight of authority deemed to rest on the same reason as a communication to counsel and is privileged. Reid v. Langlois, 2 Hall. & T. 59, 47 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 1596; Woolley v. North London R. Co. L. R. 4 C. P. (Eng.) 602; Ross v. Gibbs, L. R. 8 Eq. 522; India Bank v. Rich, 4 B. & S. 73, 116 E. C. L. 73; Davenport Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 166 Pa. St. 480, 31 Atl. 245. Compare Chadwick v. Bowman, 16 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 561; Kerr v. Gillespie, 7 Beav. 572, 49 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 1188; Wheeler v. LeMarchant, 17 Ch. D. (Eng.) 675; Georgia, etc. Ry. v. Johnson, 10 Ga. App. 101, 72 S. E. 951. In Davenport Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co. supra, the court, referring to an answer to a bill for discovery said: "This report they allege was not made in the ordinary course of business, but for a special purpose, viz., to resist and defend against the claim which the plaintiff had made on the company by letter dated the seventh of July, 1892. That it was prepared after the receipt of the plaintiff's letter and as a statement of the defense of the railroad company to the claim set up against it by him, so that if suit was brought it might be placed in the hands of counsel to guide them in making defense. The objection made to these answers is that they set up new matter that should come into the case by answer to the bill. There can be no doubt that the facts stated would have made a good answer to the bill, but we think they are equally good as a reply to the interrogatories. If they are true, as for the purposes of this appeal they must be assumed to be, they amount to a denial of the possession of any communication or report such as the plaintiff alleges; and an assertion that the documents they have were prepared after the plaintiff's claim for damages was made, and for the special purpose of resisting it. This brings the documents within the privilege accorded to communications made to counsel. It is true as appellant points out that they were not made directly to counsel but the answers allege they were made to the immediate superior of him who made them for the express purpose of being by him submitted to counsel. They were in effect made to counsel, for they were made for the use of counsel in resisting this particular claim and were transmitted to the proper officer, that he might deliver them to the attorney to whom the defense of the company might be committed. It is very clear that such reports do not belong to the class of instruments of which discovery will be compelled by a chancellor, and the learned judge of the court below was right in dismissing the exceptions."

In Baker v. London, etc. R. Co. L. R. 3 Q. B. (Eng.) 91, an exception was asserted as to a report on a medical examination of an injured person at the instance of a person alleged to be liable for the injury. The court said: "I adhere to the decision in Chartered India Bank v. Rich, 4 B. & S. 73, 116 E. C. L. 73, but the present case is clearly distinguishable, because in that case the documents in question were letters from the one party's own private and confidential agents who had never placed themselves in communication with the other party; and I quite agree that, when confidential communications have taken place between you and your agent, who has been sent to inquire and report about the subject matter of the litigation, you are not in general to be compelled to tell your adversary what the result of the inquiries may be. But when you send your agents to see and negotiate with the other party, whatever passes at such interviews ought to be made known, and the other party, or those representing him, have a right to inspect the communications respecting them." In Fenner v. London, etc. R. Co. L. R. 7 Q. B. (Eng.) 767, the allowing of a privilege to such a report was said to rest in discretion. In Crossey v. London, etc. R. Co. L. R. 5 C. P. (Eng.) 146, the case of Baker v. London, etc. R. Co. supra, was said to be an exceptional one, and the subsequent decisions seem to establish an absolute privilege with respect to a medical examiner's report on an injured person made in anticipation of a personal injury action. Skinner v. Great Northern R. Co. L. R. 9 Exch. (Eng.) 298; Malden v. Great Northern R. Co. L. R. 9 Exch. (Eng.) 300; Friend v. London, etc. R. Co. 2 Ex. D. (Eng.) 437. In Skinner v. Great Northern R. Co. supra, Baron Pigott said: "The case of Cossey v. London, etc. R. Co. [L. R. 5 C. P. 146] lays down a clear, broad, and intelligible principle, which there is no difficulty in acting upon; but if that is departed from, and the matter is made to turn upon the discretion of the judge, there can be no certainty in the practice."

In the case of In re Krueger, 2 Lowell 182, 14 Fed. Cas. No. 7,942, correspondence between partners with respect to proposed litigation was held to be privileged, the court saying: "When a lawsuit is begun, or is imminent, the parties to it ought to be at liberty to consult with each other, and with agents, without the necessity of producing the correspondence, at the call of the opposing party."

Information Acquired by Banker or Broker.

A banker or broker is not privileged from disclosing the state of the account of a customer or depositor. Loyd v. Freshfield, 2 C. & P. 325, 12 E. C. L. 149; Interstate Commerce Commission v. Harriman, 157 Fed. 432; In re Lathrop, 184 Fed. 534; In re Davies, 68 Kan. 791, 75 Pac. 1048; Winder v. Diffenderffer, 2 Bland. (Md.) 166; McManus v. Freeman, 2 Pa. Dist. 144; Hannum v. McRae, 18 Ont. Pr. 185, affirming 17 Ont. Pr. 567. And see Heath v. Waters, 40 Mich. 457, wherein it was said: "No stronger evidence of probable fraud could exist than the obstinate and offensive manner in which every attempt to get at the real state of the partnership business was resisted, not only by Daniel Waters, but by his associates and his banker. The latter, who seems to have been honest in his remarkable notion that banking business privileged from scrutiny, was probably free from any wrong design." In Winder v. Diffenderffer, 2 Bland. (Md.) 166, it was said: "It surely cannot be pretended, that an individual, because it happens to be convenient to withhold a statement of his dealings with a party to the suit, pertinent to the matter in issue, from being used as evidence in that suit, should, therefore, be permitted to do so at his pleasure. A bank, as a body politic, is endowed with many attributes of personality; and acts as an individual in its dealings with all persons; consequently it can have no pretension to any greater right, arising from its mere character as a body politic, than any individual whatever to withhold any legal evidence, that may be in its possession." So in the case of In re Davies, 68 Kan. 791, 75 Pac. 1048, the court said: "It is next insisted that the petitioner should be discharged because the matter concerning which he was interrogated was privileged, and that to require a disclosure by a banker of the amount standing to a depositor's credit on the bank books would be against public policy. Counsel, thus contending, frankly admits that he has found no adjudicated case which sustains his position. The relation of debtor and creditor exists between a depositor and a banker. By the inquiry in this case, it was sought to ascertain how much the bank owed Bellringer on March 1. The ordinary debtor would hardly stop to assert a privilege in his behalf to protect him from disclosing the amount owing by him to another. Again, it is argued that to permit grand juries or courts to inquire into such private affairs of business men would cause withdrawal of deposits from banks annually for many weeks preceding the 1st of March—some to escape taxation, others to avoid publicity. It is a sufficient answer that annoyance to depositors or the loss to banks predicted by counsel has never appealed to courts or legislatures with enough force to work a change in the rules of evidence. In the case of Loyd v. Freshfield, 2 C. & P. 325, 12 E. C. L. 149, decided in 1826, it was held that a banker was bound to answer what a party's balance was on a given day, as it was not a privileged communication."

In England the same rule obtains except as it is modified by the Bankers Books Evidence Act. Emmott v. Star Newspaper Co. 62 L. J. Q. B. (Eng.) 77, 67 L. T. N. S. 829.

To require a disclosure, however, it must appear that the information is necessary for the purpose of the action in which it is sought to elicit it. Jonau v. Ferrand, 3 Rob. (La.) 364, wherein it was said: "The second bill is to the refusal of the judge to compel a broker, who was examined in order to fix the market value of certain stocks, to disclose the names of the different persons to whom he had sold such stocks. The broker objected to answering, stating that he considered his transactions with other individuals as confidential and appertaining to themselves, but that if the court said he must answer, he would do so. The judge refused to compel the witness to disclose the names of the different purchasers, as there was no intimation of any intention to call on them to testify in contradiction to the broker, and the names were therefore immaterial. We think the judge decided correctly."

Telegram.

No privilege attaches to telegrams or copies of telegrams in the hands of a telegraph company and their production can be compelled. Tomline v. Tyler, 44 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 187; Re Dwight, 15 Ont. 148; In re New York, etc. Tel. Co. [1854-1884] New Foundland L. Rep. 575; U. S. v. Babcock, 3 Dill. 586, 3 Cent. L. J. 101, 24 Fed. Cas. No. 14,484; U. S. v. Hunter, 15 Fed. 712; In re Storrer, 63 Fed. 564; Woods v. Miller, 55 Ia. 168, 7 N. W. 484; State v. Litchfield, 58 Me. 267; Ex p. Brown, 72 Mo. 83, 37 Am. Rep. 426; People v. Webb, 5 N. Y. S. 855; Henisler v. Freedman, 2 Pars. Eq. Cas. (Pa.) 274; Ex p. Gould, 60 Tex. Crim. 442, 132 S. W. 364, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 835; Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Wheeling First Nat. Bank, 7 W. Va. 544. In Ex p. Brown, supra, it was said: "The only ground, therefore, upon which the exemption of telegrams from this process of the court can be placed, is that they are privileged communications, and we cannot declare them to be such in the absence of a statute so providing. The transportation of packages and parcels by means of express lines, is becoming almost as great a necessity as that of sending communications by telegraph, and the two agencies are very frequently employed in intimate connection, and the argument which asserts the inviolability of telegrams, derived from a supposed analogy between the postal system and the telegraph, would as well apply to parcels or packages intrusted to the express company for transportation. The rules of the company forbidding the petitioner from delivering telegrams or copies, afforded no legal excuse for his refusal to produce the telegrams. Telegraph companies, it is true, are by section 13, Wagner's Statutes 325, subjected to a penalty for disclosing the contents of any private dispatch to any person other than the person to whom it is addressed, or his agent; but taken in connection with section 51, page 507, it is obvious that it is not to be construed as prohibiting such disclosure when it is required as evidence in a judicial proceeding. The latter section makes it a misdemeanor for any person connected with any telegraph line, wilfully to disclose the contents, or the nature of the contents, of any message intrusted to him for transmission or delivery to any one to whom it is not addressed, except a court of justice, and in that exception we have a legislative recognition of the amenability of custodians of telegrams to a subpoena duces tecum, commanding their production. It follows, if the court has the right to compel their production, that the company cannot, by any rules it may adopt, exonerate its agents from obedience to the judicial mandate." So in State v. Litchfield, 58 Me. 267, it was said: "Nor can telegraphic communications be deemed any more confidential than any other communications. Telegraphic communications are not to be protected to aid the robber or assassin in the consummation of their felonies, or to facilitate their escape after the crime has been committed. No communication should be excluded, no individual should be exempt from inquiry, when the communication, or the answer to the inquiry would be of importance in the conviction of crime or the acquittal of innocence, except when such exclusion is required by some grave principle of public policy. The honest man asks for no confidential communications, for the withholding the same cannot benefit him. The criminal has no right to demand exclusion of evidence because it would establish his guilt. The telegraph companies cannot rightfully claim that the messages of rogues and criminals, which they may innocently or ignorantly transmit, should be withheld, whenever the cause of justice renders their production necessary. They cannot wish their servants should, however innocently, co-operate in the commission of crime, and decline to co-operate in its detection and punishment, and thus become its accomplices. The interests of the public demand that resort should be had to all available testimony, which may lead to the detection and punishment of crime, and to the protection of innocence. The telegraphic operator, as such, can claim no exemption from interrogation. Like other witnesses, he is bound to answer all inquiries material to the issue." Similarly in Woods v. Miller, 55 Ia. 168, 7 N. W. 484, the court said: "The objection to the production and introduction of the telegrams was based upon section 1328 of the Code, which provides that any person employed in transmitting messages by telegraph, who makes known the contents of any message sent or received, to any person except to him to whom it is addressed, or to his agent, or attorney, is guilty of a misdemeanor. The defendants insist that a person cannot under one rule of law be compelled to do what under another rule of law is a misdemeanor. Nearly all kinds of business, however important, are transacted by telegraph. The contents of messages, unlike the contents of letters, are necessarily known to the persons engaged in transmitting them. The interests of business require that they should not be divulged to third persons. but the parties themselves have a right to the messages to prove their contracts. Any rule which should disallow this would greatly impair the value of the telegraph as a means of doing business. It is evident that the statute was not designed to prevent the use of messages as evidence. That the statute does not prohibit the production and introduction of messages as evidence, under an order of court for that purpose, might be demonstrated by saying that the person who produces them in obedience to the order is not guilty of voluntarily disclosing their contents, and no person can be punished for an act which is not voluntary. The statute, therefore, does not reach such a case, and is wholly inapplicable."

No further disclosure will be permitted than the necessities of the particular issue require. Ex p. Gould, 60 Tex. Crim. 442, 132 S. W. 364, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 835, wherein it was said: "In this case the subpoena duces tecum was for all telegrams sent from the office at Baird; ordering intoxicating liquors; it did not specify whether the liquors ordered were unlawfully sent for; it said all intoxicating liquors. All intoxicating liquors are not under the ban of the law. What right had the grand jury to have exposed before them the messages sent indiscriminately by the citizenship of Baird in ordering intoxicating liquors? The demand made upon the witness was unreasonable and unwarranted; it was too general; it did not relate to any crime committed, nor to any person accused or suspected; it was not directed to the inquiry into any crime; it failed to show the purposes for which the telegrams were demanded, and was but a prying and fishing expedition that cannot be authorized by law. The protection of papers is as much secured under the provisions of the Bill of Rights as a man's house; and the same rules that apply to one apply to the other. The courts will not permit the exercise of an arbitrary power, where its tendency might be to disturb domestic relations; expose commercial secrets to satisfy the idle curiosity of men. The Constitution holds too sacred the privacy of home to permit this."

Communication to Newspaper Reporter.

The policy of a newspaper to treat as confidential the sources of information acquired by its reporters will not be regarded by the courts and no privilege attaches to a communication to a newspaper reporter. People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 179, 48 Pac. 75; Ex p. Lawrence, 116 Cal. 298, 48 Pac. 124; Pledger v. State, 77 Ga. 242, 3 S. E. 320; Plunkett v. Hamilton, 136 Ga. 72, Ann. Cas. 1912B 1259, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 583; In re Granow, 84 N. J. Ann. Cas. 1918C.—45.

L. 236, 85 Atl. 1011; People v. Fancher, 4 Thomp. & C. (N. Y.) 467. In the case of In re Granow, supra, it was said: "The appellant gave as his reason for refusing to answer the question the following: 'I declined to give the sources of my information or the names of any person or persons who gave me any information about it, and gave as my reason for such refusal that I was a newspaper reporter, and therefore could not give up my sources of information.' In effect he pleaded a privilege which finds no countenance in the law. Such an immunity, as claimed by the defendant, would be far-reaching in its effect, and detrimental to the due administration of law. To admit of any such privilege would be to shield the real transgressor and permit him to go unwhipped of justice." In Ex p. Lawrence, 116 Cal. 298, 48 Pac. 124, the rule was applied, the court saying: "The senate of the state was engaged in an investigation of the conduct of its members under a published charge that some of them, whose names were not given, had taken bribes for aiding in the passage of a certain bill. The news editor and one of the reporters of the paper which published this charge were called upon to testify in the matter, and refused to answer certain interrogatories propounded to them, upon the ground that the information sought to be elicited was privileged. . . . It cannot be successfully contended, and has not been seriously argued, that the witnesses were justified in refusing to give these names upon the ground that the communications were privileged." In People v. Fancher, 4 Thomp. & C. (N. Y.) 467, holding that a newspaper proprietor could be compelled to disclose the name of the person from whom was obtained the information embodied in a libellous article, the court said: "As the law now is, and has for ages existed, no court could possibly hold that a witness could legally refuse to give the name of the author of an alleged libel, for the reason that the rules of a public journal forbade it. That some other party assumes the responsibility of a crime, and is willing to suffer its consequences, can never prevent an inquiry as to each and every person concerned therein, and the holding of all such equally responsible with the one avowing it. The admission of such a principle, if carried to its logical conclusion, would shield him who hires an assassin to strike a fatal blow, so long as the slayer avowed himself to be solely responsible for the act. This extreme case is put for the purpose of showing the impolicy of the reason, and its worthlessness in a court of justice."

COMPANY

ARNOLD ET AL.

South Carolina Supreme Court—December 10, 1918.

97 S. Car. 418; 81 S. E. 984.

Life Insurance — Incontestability Clause — Validity.

A life policy, providing that it shall be incontestable, except for nonpayment of premiums, after one year from its date, is not objectionable as in conflict with the state statute of limitations, but is valid.

[See 4 Ann. Cas. 364; 13 Ann. Cas. 305.]

Effect on Attack for Fraud.

Where a life policy provides that it shall be incontestable, except for nonpayment of premiums, after one year from date, the insurer, after the expiration of the year, cannot maintain a suit against the insured and the beneficiary to cancel the policy for the defendant's alleged fraud in procuring it.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court,
Anderson county: DE VORE, Judge.

Action to cancel policies of life insurance. Philadelphia Life Insurance Company of Philadelphia, Pa., plaintiff, and Quincy L. Arnold et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Quattlebaum & Cochran for appellants.

Bonham, Watkins & Allen for respondent.

[420] HYDRICK, J.—This action was brought to have two policies of insurance, issued by the plaintiff on the life of the defendant, Q. L. Arnold, in favor of his wife, Mattie H. Arnold, cancelled on the ground that they were obtained by fraud. The policies were issued and dated June 11, 1910. The premiums were duly paid. The policies contain this clause: "This policy shall be incontestable, except for nonpayment of premiums, after one year from its date." This action was commenced June 8, 1912, more than a year after the date of the policy. On motion of defendants, issues were referred to a jury, which answered them all in favor of defendants. But the Court set aside the verdict, holding that the fraud alleged had been proved, and adjudged the policies void.

From the view that we take of the case, it will be necessary to consider only one question: Is the incontestable clause above quoted a bar to the action? The language is plain—so plain that it does not require interpretation. There can be no doubt of its meaning, and unless there is some reason why an insurance company cannot lawfully make such a contract, this action is barred. The Courts, with practical unanimity, hold such a [421] stipulation valid. It is called by some of them a short statute of limitations in favor of the insured, and it is sustained on the analogy of the cases which hold that the parties to a contract may, by stipulation therein, fix a reasonable time within which action thereon must be brought, or claims made. We cannot agree that such a stipulation conflicts with the statute of limitations, only in the sense that by its terms action must be brought within a shorter period than that allowed by law. But the statute of limitations does not expressly or impliedly prohibit such an agreement. It merely fixes the maximum time within which actions may be brought.

No doubt the clause was inserted in the policy as an inducement to the public to insure with the plaintiff company. It is matter of common knowledge that insurance companies have, in the past, so frequently defended against claims under their policies, and tried to defeat payment of them on various grounds—sound and unsound—and especially on the ground of alleged false representations and warranties, that the legislature of this State deemed it necessary to take the matter in hand, and in 1878 (16 St. at Large, p. 530) a statute was enacted (Civ. Code 1912, secs. 2722, 2723) which provides that, when a company receives the premiums on a policy for the space of two years, it shall be deemed to have waived any right to dispute the truth of the application, or to allege that the insured made false representations. The same statute authorizes the companies to bring actions to vacate policies on that ground, but limits the time to two years from date of the policy. This legislation goes far to prevent these companies from taking a man's hard-earned money as long as he lives, and then slandering his memory after he is dead. While it is true in this case that the insured is alive, that circumstance does not make the meaning of the clause or the application of the law different from what it would be if he were dead. To hold that the clause means only [422] that the company cannot defend for any cause, except nonpayment of premiums, after the death of the insured, is to read into the contract, in construction, what the parties did not write into it.

The objection to taking insurance, arising out of the probability of such a defense being set up, whether founded in truth or not, grows to be such that the insurance companies found it to their advantage to insert in the policies certain stipulations specifying that grounds upon which they could be contested, and limiting the time within which such contest must be made. Of course, other things being equal, the more favorable to the insured these stipulations are, the more attractive will the policies be to insurers, and we have no doubt the clause in question was inserted for that purpose, and that the company has received the benefit of it in that intending insurers have been thereby induced to take its policies.

By the stipulation, the plaintiff practically agreed that it would take a year to investigate and determine whether any fraud had been perpetrated in procuring the policies, and, if it failed within that time to discover any, it would make no further investigation, and would not thereafter contest the validity of the policies on that ground. The evidence in the case shows that, if plaintiff had been diligent, it could have discovered the fraud within the year. Therefore, we do not feel that we are condoning the fraud by enforcing the stipulation. The following authorities sustain the validity of such a stipulation: Kline v. Nat. Ben. Ass'n, 111 Ind. 462, 11 N. E. 620, 60 Am. Rep. 703; Wright v. Mut. Ben. Ass'n, 43 Hun (N. Y.) 61, affirmed 118 N. Y. 237, 23 N. E. 186, 6 L.R.A. 731, 16 Am. St. Rep. 749; Clement v. Insurance Co. 101 Tenn. 22, 46 S. W. 561, 42 L.R.A. 247, 70 Am. St. Rep. 650, and note; Massachusetts Ben. Life Ass'n v. Robinson, 104 Ga. 256, 30 S. E. 918, 42 L.R.A. 261; Murray v. State Mut. Life Ins. Co. 22 R. I. [423] 524, 48 Atl. 800, 53 L.R.A. 743; 25 Cyc. 873, 881; 19 A. & E. Enc. L. (2d ed.) 79 et seq.

FRASER, J. (dissenting).—I cannot concur in the opinion of the majority of the Court. I think the statutory right of the company to two years may be waived, and that the incontestable clause did waive it, except for fraud. I think the words in the incontestable clause, "all statements made by the insured shall, in the absence of fraud, be deemed representations, and not warranties," clearly show that the insurer did not intend to waive any of its rights where there is fraud. The policy also provides that the question of age may be contested. The incontestable clause, therefore, was not absolute, and I think the plaintiff has the right to bring this action within the statutory period.

Gage, J., did not sit in this case.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that under a provision in a life insurance policy that it shall be incontestable after the lapse of one year except for nonpayment of premiums, not only is the insurer precluded from defending on the ground of fraud, but a suit to cancel the policy on the ground of fraud cannot be maintained after the lapse of a year from the date of the policy. The earlier cases as to the effect, on a contest of a life insurance policy on the ground of fraud, of a clause making the policy incontestable, are reviewed in the note to Harris v. Security L. Ins. Co. Ann. Cas. 1914C 648.

CAUSEY

v.

SEABOARD AIR LINE RAILWAY COMPANY.

North Carolina Supreme Court—May 20, 1914.

166 N. Car. 5; 81 S. E. 917.

Release and Discharge — Fraud in Procuring — Evidence Sufficient.

In an action for death of an employee, evidence held to warrant a finding that a release of liability for the injuries resulting in decedent's death had been procured by fraud or undue influence.

Limitation of Action — Action by Administrator.

Since an administrator succeeds to the rights of his intestate, derives his title from him, and in an action endeavors to enforce a right which belonged to the intestate, the bar of limitations, if available against the intestate, is ordinarily available against the administrator.

Death by Wrongful Act — Limitations — Effect of Bar of Action for Injury.

Since a right of action for injuries belongs to the injured person, terminates at his death, and depends on the common law, while the right to damages for wrongful death resulting from such injuries belongs exclusively to the administrator and is a creature of statute, limitations having run against an action for injuries to decedent is no bar to the administrator's right to recover for wrongful death.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Randolph county: LONG, Judge.

Action for death by wrongful act. R. L. Causey, administrator, plaintiff, and Seaboard Air Line Railway Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. AFFIRMED.

[6] This is an action to recover damages for the wrongful death of the plaintiff's intestate, caused, as alleged, by the negligence of the defendant.

The intestate was injured on 1 December, 1903, and died on 7 June, 1912. On 27 December, 1903, the intestate executed the following conditional release:

SEABOARD AIR LINE RAILWAY.

Conditional Release Agreement.

If, before the expiration of thirty days from this date, the Seaboard Air Line Railway shall pay to me, H. O. Causey, the sum of $75, I hereby agree to release the said railway of and from all claims whatsoever for damages for or on account of personal injury sustained by No. 1 freight running into A. C. L. freight at Hilton Bridge, throwing me against stove, cutting my head, on 1 December, 1903.

Witness my hand and seal, this 27 December, 1903.

(Signed) H. O. Causey. [Seal]

Witness:

(Signed) R. M. Baldwin.

The foregoing conditional release agreement has the following indorsements stamped on it: "Vouchers made for 5 January, 1904, amount shown," and "Voucher sent to Auditor Disbursements, 8 February, 1904."

On 17 February, 1904, the intestate executed the following release:

SEABOARD AIR LINE RAILWAY.

Release.

For and in consideration of the sum of seventy-five and no/100 dollars ($75) to me paid, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, I, H. O. Causey, do hereby release and forever discharge the Seaboard Air Line Railway, and any and all railroads [?] owned, leased, operated, or controlled by it, and its successors, from all injuries received by me in collision of trains S. A. L. No. 1, and A. C. L. No. 80, on or about 1 December, 1903, at or near Wilmington, N. C., while a conductor in the employ of the Seaboard Air Line Railway; the consideration hereinbefore referred to being in full compromise, satisfaction, and discharge of all claims and causes of action arising out of the injuries, and in exoneration of the railway from all liability by reason thereof.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal, this 17 February, A. D. 1904.

(Signed) H. O. Causey. [Seal.]

Signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of:

(Signed) R. M. Baldwin.

The defendant pleaded the release as a defense, and also the statute barring a recovery for personal injury within three years.

The plaintiff replied, alleging that the release was procured by undue influence and fraud.

The jury returned the following verdict:

1. Was H. O. Causey, the intestate of the plaintiff, killed by the negligence of the defendant, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

2. Did H. O. Causey, the intestate of plaintiff, execute the release as alleged by the defendant, the Seaboard Air Line, in its answer? Answer: Yes.

3. If plaintiff's intestate did execute and deliver the said release, did he at the time of the execution thereof have sufficient mental capacity to understand the nature and effect of the said release? Answer: Yes.

4. If the deceased, H. O. Causey, did not have such mental capacity, did the defendant have notice thereof? Answer: No.

5. If said release was executed and delivered as alleged in the answer, was the same procured by fraud and undue influence of the defendant, the Seaboard Air Line, as alleged by the plaintiff? Answer: Yes.

[8] 6. Is the plaintiff's cause of action barred by the statute of limitations? Answer: No.

7. What damage, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to recover? Answer: $6,075.

W. H. Neal for appellant.

Hammer & Kelly for appellee.

ALLEN, J.—There was evidence to support the finding by the jury that the injury in 1903 caused the death of the intestate, and this is practically conceded by the defendant.

It is, however, earnestly insisted that there was no evidence of fraud or undue influence in procuring the execution of the release set up as a defense.

No presumption of fraud arises from the relation of employer and employee, "but it is recognized by the courts that the employer has great influence in determining the conduct of the employee, and may use it to his injury." King v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 157 N. C. 63, 72 S. E. 801, 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 450. And "Where there is no coercion amounting to duress, but a transaction is the result of a moral, social, or domestic force exerted upon a party, controlling the free action of his will and preventing any true consent, equity may relieve against the transaction on the ground of undue influence, even though there may be no invalidity at law. In the vast majority of instances undue influence naturally has a field to work upon in the condition or circumstances of the person influenced which render him peculiarly susceptible and yielding—his dependent or fiduciary relation towards the one exerting the influence, his mental or physical weakness, his pecuniary necessity, his ignorance, lack of advice, and the like." Pom. Eq. Jur. vol. 2, sec. 851.

The plaintiff relies upon circumstantial evidence to prove fraud and undue influence, and as was said by Justice Brown in the matter of Everett's Wills, 153 N. C. 86, 68 S. E. 924: "Experience has shown that direct proof of undue or fraudulent influence is rarely attainable, but inference from circumstances must determine it.

[9] "Undue influence is generally proved by a number of facts, each of which standing alone may be of little weight, but taken collectively may satisfy a rational mind of its existence."

Let us, then, examine the circumstances connected with the execution of the release. The intestate was in the employment of the defendant when the release was executed, and wished to continue the employment. He was injured on 1 December, 1903, by a blow on the back of the head, and while the jury finds that he had sufficient mental capacity to execute a release, it was in evidence that he had trouble with his head continuously after the injury. He accepted $75 in settlement for an injury which finally resulted in death.

The settlement was made under an agreement to pay him for his lost time (the claim agent of the defendant testifies to this), and he was at that time earning from $90 to $95 a month, and according to the evidence of the plaintiff, lost two and one-half months.

The evidence does not disclose that any one was present when the release was executed, except the claim agent of the defendant, and he made conflicting statements as to his meeting with the intestate, saying: "I met him by appointment. He sent word that he wanted to see me. I did not meet him by appointment. I did not send for him to come and see me. I met him on the hotel porch at Hamlet by accident."

The conditional release was executed on 27 December, 1903, conditioned to accept $75, if paid within thirty days, under an agreement to pay for lost time, when there was due him then, computing at the rate of $90 per month, $81, and the time he would lose could not then be ascertained, as he had not resumed work.

The sum of $75 was not paid within the thirty days, but the intestate stood by the agreement, and at the end of two months and seventeen days, while still unable to work, executed a full release for $75, under the same agreement, the defendant says, to pay for lost time, when his wages alone would, at that time, have amounted to $231, not considering damages for mental and physical suffering and for reduced capacity, for which the defendant was liable, if for anything.

[10] We have, then, a full release executed upon the payment of less than one-third of the amount agreed to be paid, and when the most important element of damages was not then taken into consideration—mental and physical suffering and reduced capacity.

It was executed by an employee who was, at the time, suffering mentally and physically from his injury, and who wished to retain his place with the defendant, and when no one was with him except the claim agent of the defendant, who made contradictory statements about his meeting with the intestate.

It would seem that one of two conclusions must follow, if the jury accepted this evidence: that the intestate did not have sufficient mind to execute a release, or that he was improperly influenced.

The jury has adopted the latter solution, and in our opinion there was evidence to support it.

In King v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 157 N. C. 65, 72 S. E. 301, 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 450, quoting from our own reports and from the Supreme Court of the United States, as to the effect of inadequacy of consideration upon an issue of fraud and undue influence, we said: "In Byers v. Surget, 19 How. 311 [15 U. S. (L. ed.) 674], the Supreme Court of the United States says: 'To meet the objection made to the sale in this case, founded on the inadequacy of the price at which the land was sold, it is insisted that inadequacy of consideration, singly, cannot amount to proof of fraud. This position, however, is scarcely reconcilable with the qualification annexed to it by the courts, namely, unless such inadequacy be so gross as to shock the conscience, for this qualification implies necessarily the affirmation that, if the inadequacy be of a nature so gross as to shock the conscience, it will amount to proof of fraud.' And again, in Hume v. U. S. 132 U. S. 411, 10 S. Ct. 136, 33 U. S. (L. ed.) 393: 'It (fraud) may be apparent from the intrinsic nature and subject of the bargain itself, such as no man in his senses, and not under delusion, would make, on the one hand, and as no honest and fair man would accept, on the other.' Our Court, speaking through Justice Brown, so declares the law in reference to awards and other transactions. In Perry v. Greenwich Ins. Co. 137 N. C. 406, 49 [11] S. E. 890, he says: 'Where there is a charge of fraud or partiality made against an award, the fact that it is plainly and palpably wrong would be evidence in support of the charge, entitled to greater or less weight according to the extent or effect of the error and the other circumstances of the case. There might be a case of error in an award so plain and gross that a court or jury could arrive only at the conclusion that it was not the result of an impartial exercise of their judgment by the arbitrators. Godard v. King, 40 Minn. 164, 41 N. W. 659. The settled rule, which is applicable not only to awards, but to other transactions, is that mere inadequacy alone is not sufficient to set aside the award; but if the inadequacy be so gross and palpable as to shock the moral sense, it is sufficient evidence to be submitted to the jury on the issues relating to fraud and corruption, or partiality and bias. Where there is inadequacy of consideration, but it is not gross, it may be considered in connection with other evidence upon the issue of fraud, but will not, standing alone, justify setting aside a contract or other paper-writing on the ground of fraud."

The finding of the jury that the release was procured by fraud and undue influence, rendered upon competent evidence, makes it unnecessary to consider the effect of a valid release executed by the intestate on the plaintiff's right of action.

The remaining question presented by the appeal is the effect of the lapse of time between the injury to and the death of the intestate.

The right of action in favor of the intestate to recover damages for personal injury was barred by the statute of limitations of three years at the time of his death, and the question is presented, whether this can avail the defendant in an action by the administrator to recover damages for death, the result of the same injury.

Ordinarily, the bar of the statute is a good defense against the administrator, if available against the intestate, but this is because the administrator succeeds to the rights of the intestate, derives his title from him, and is endeavoring to enforce a [12] right which belonged to him, and if no such relation exists in a given case, there would seem to be no good reason for admitting the defense.

The right to recover damages for personal injury belonged to the intestate, and terminated at his death, while the right to recover damages for wrongful death never belonged to him, and did not exist until death. A recovery in an action for personal injury belongs to the estate of the intestate, but a recovery for death is no part of the assets of the intestate.

The two rights of action have no common source, one being under the principles of the common law and the other the creature of statute. The administrator sues, not because of any privity between him and the intestate, but for the reason that the statute designates him as the party plaintiff, and he is substantially a statutory trustee.

This Court said, in Hood v. American Telegraph, etc. Co. 162 N. C. 94, 77 S. E. 1096, in considering the statute conferring the right of action for death (Rev. sec. 59): "Prior to the statute, which was first enacted in 1854, there was no right of action to recover damages for wrongful death (Killian v. Southern R. Co. 128 N. C. 261), and as the right of action is conferred by the statute, it may designate who may sue. In 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 887, the author says: 'The right of action for the death of any person caused by the wrongful act of a defendant is, with the isolated exceptions mentioned, purely statutory, and in all cases the statute must be looked to in determining to whom such right belongs.' When we turn to our statute, we find that the right of action is given to the executor, administrator, or collector; and there being an executor in this case, the plaintiff cannot sue. The statute designates the person to bring the action and determines the disposition of the recovery. As was well said by Justice Walker in Hartness v. Pharr, 133 N. C. 570: 'It must be borne in mind that whatever the varying forms of the statute may be, the cause of action given by them, and also by the original English statute, was in no sense one which belonged to the deceased person or in which he ever had any interest, and the beneficiaries under the law do not claim by, through, or under him; [13] and this is so, although the personal representative may be designated as the person to bring the action. Baker v. Raleigh, etc. R. Co. 91 N. C. 308. The latter does not derive any right, title, or authority from his intestate, but he sustains more the relation of a trustee in respect to the fund he may recover for the benefit of those entitled eventually to receive it, and he will hold it when recovered actually in that capacity, though in his name as executor or administrator, and though in his capacity as personal representative he may perhaps be liable on his bond for its proper administration. Baker v. Raleigh, etc. R. Co. supra.'

If there is no privity between the administrator and the intestate as to this cause of action, and the former succeeds to no rights of the other, it is illogical, as it appears to us, to hold that the failure of the intestate to sue for personal injury will bar the right of the administrator to recover damages for death, when the first right of action could not pass to the administrator and the second did not exist until death.

It would be, in effect, an adjudication that the second cause of action was barred before it came into existence.

The weight of authority elsewhere is, we think, in support of the position that the action is not barred.

In Robinson v. Canadian Pac. R. Co. App. Cas. (Eng.) [1892] 481, it was held by the Privy Council, on appeal from the Supreme Court of Canada, "that the Civil Code of Lower Canada does not make it a condition precedent to the right of action given by section 1056 to the widow of a person dying as therein mentioned, that the deceased's right of action should not have been extinguished in his lifetime by prescription under section 2262 (2). The death is the foundation of the right given by the former section, which is governed by the rule of prescription contained therein and is exempt from the rule of prescription which barred the claim of the deceased."

In Hoover v. Chesapeake, etc. R. Co. 46 W. Va. 268, 33 S. E. 224 (the statute of limitations in West Virginia being one year), the Court said: "It is claimed that, the injured having lost his right to sue by reason of the bar of the statute of limitations at the time of his death, the cause of action is thereby destroyed, both as to himself and [14] his administratrix; that death must find him with a cause of action legally enforceable, or she has none. This is undoubtedly true where the cause of action never existed, or is defeated by contributory negligence, or it has been compromised or released; for in such cases there is a complete want of or destruction by satisfaction of the cause, not merely of the right of action or remedy. Dibble v. New York, etc. R. Co. 25 Barb. (N. Y.) 183; Whitford v. Panama R. Co. 23 N. Y. 495; Littlewood v. New York, 89 N. Y. 24; Fowlkes v. Nashville, etc. R. Co. 5 Baxt. (Tenn.) 663. In a certain class of cases the bar of the statute not only takes away the remedy, but destroys the cause of action. When the liability and the limitation is created by the same statute, the latter operates on the former, or liability, and not on the remedy alone. The Harrisburg, 119 U. S. 199, 7 S. Ct. 140; [30 U. S. (L. ed.) 358]. Generally speaking, however, the statute of limitations acts on the remedy, and takes away the right of action, and while it prevents relief, it does not destroy the cause of action, or the moral obligation on the negligent party to make good the injury caused by his default or neglect. . . . The first clause of the section, 'Whenever the death of a person shall be caused by wrongful act, neglect, or default, and the act, neglect, or default is such as would (if death had not ensued) have entitled the party injured to maintain an action to recover damages in respect thereof,' plainly relates to the character of the injury, without regard to the question of time of suit or death. In other words, if the character of injury is such that the injured party could have at any time maintained a suit in relation thereto, his administrator could sue after his death. His cause of action is the negligent injury, but the administrator can have no cause of action until such negligent injury results in death. If such were not the case, why not provide merely that the decedent's cause of action survive to his personal representative, without making the death, coupled with the negligence that occasioned it, a new cause of action? And why not give the damages recovered to his estate, instead of exempting them from his debts and liabilities? . . . It is possible for learned and able counsel to give the statute a different construction, but the Court adopts what appears to be [15] the more reasonable view, and this is, that an action lies, notwithstanding the death of the injured person did not occur until more than a year after the negligence which caused the injury occurred."

In German-American Trust Co. v. LaFayette Box Board, etc. Co. 52 Ind. App. 211, 98 N. E. 874, the appellate court of Indiana held that, "The foundation of the right given by Burns' Ann. St. 1908, sec. 285, providing that if one's death is caused by the wrongful act of another, his personal representative may sue therefor, if he, had he lived, might have sued for an injury for the same act, and the action shall be commenced in two years, in death; and the limitation for the action thereon is two years from the death, unaffected by decedent's action for his injuries being barred before his death.

In Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Simrall, 127 Ky. 55, 104 S. W. 1012, the Supreme Court of Kentucky said of this question: "It is strongly insisted for appellant that the court erred in sustaining appellee's demurrer to its pleas of the statute of limitations; it being the contention of counsel that no right of action exists for causing the death of a person where no right of action for the injury causing the death exists at the time the death occurs, and, further, that neither section 241 of the Constitution of Kentucky nor section 6 of the Kentucky Statutes of 1903 was intended to give a right of action for causing the death of a person, unless a right of action for the injury existed at the time of the death. The argument advanced by learned counsel for appellant is that, as section 2516, Ky. St. 1903, which provides, 'An action for an injury to the person of the plaintiff, or his wife, child, ward, apprentice, or servant, or for injuries to person, cattle or stock, by railroads or any company or corporation . . . shall be commenced within one year next after the cause of action accrued, and not thereafter,' applies to actions for injuries resulting in death, as well as those which do not result in death, the statute runs in each case from the time the injury was inflicted. It is further argued that the starting point is the same in each case, and that if, in the case of an injury subsequently resulting in the loss of a leg, [16] the statute runs from the date of the original injury, and not from the loss of the leg, so, in the case of any injury subsequently resulting in death, the statute runs from the date of the original injury, and not from the death. It is also urged that any other construction of the statute than that contended for by appellant would lead to injustice and oppression, for the reason that if an administrator may maintain an action for causing the death of his intestate, where the death did not result until the lapse of ten or fifteen years from the time the injury was inflicted, then he may recover, although his intestate could not do so, if living, for the injuries received, and that, too, very probably after many of the witnesses have died or disappeared, and after the circumstances surrounding the infliction of the injury have faded from the memories of those by whom it was witnessed. Though plausible, the foregoing argument is unsound. Hardships may result in exceptional cases from the application of any statute or legal principle, however salutary the operation of either in general. . . . In the first case, the cause of action is asserted by the person injured, or his administrator, and it arises out of and is for the injury received. It therefore accrues from and at the time of the infliction of the injury; hence the statute then begins to run. In the second case, the cause of action does not accrue until the death of the person injured occurs, because the action is not for the injury sustained by the intestate, but for the death resulting from the injury, which is an independent and distinct grievance, created by statute, for which the personal representative alone may sue. This being true, the statute of limitation begins to run at the death and with the accrual of the cause of action. It is an indisputable rule that the statute of limitation can never begin to run until the cause of action accrues."

In Nestelle v. Northern Pac. R. Co. 56 Fed. 261, the plea of the statute was denied, the Court holding: "The statute of limitations begins to run against the statutory right of action for an injury resulting in death only at the time the death occurs, although that event takes place long after the time of receiving the injury."

[17] In Western, etc. R. Co. v. Bass, 104 Ga. 390, 30 S. E. 874, the date of the injury was 21 February, 1891, and death ensued five years thereafter, and the Court says upon the question now before us: "Was the plaintiff's right of action barred by the statute of limitations because her suit was not filed within two years from the date her husband was injured? 'Actions for injuries done to the person shall be brought within two years after the right of action accrues.' Civil Code, sec. 3900. If the plaintiff's husband had sued for the injuries to his person, he must have brought his action within two years from the date such injuries were inflicted. The plaintiff's action, however, was not for injuries done to the person of her husband. She had no right under the law to sue for such injuries; no one except the husband himself could maintain an action for them. If, however, such injuries resulted in his death, then, under section 3828 of the Civil Code, a right of action accrued to her. That section provides that a widow may recover for the homicide of her husband, and plaintiff's suit is based upon the cause of action therein given her. This statute does not profess to revive the cause of action for the injury to the deceased in favor of his widow, nor is such its legal effect, but it creates a new cause of action, in favor of the widow, unknown to the common law. The right of action given by the statute is for the homicide of the husband in all cases where the death results from a crime, or from criminal or other negligence, and is founded on a new grievance, namely, his homicide; and is for the injury thereby sustained by the widow and children, to whose exclusive benefit the damages must ensue, as, under section 3829 of the Civil Code, 'in the event of a recovery by the widow, she shall hold the amount recovered subject to the law of descents, as if it had been personal property descending to the widow and children from the deceased, and no recovery had shall be subject to any debt or liability of any character of the deceased husband.' The widow's right of action for the wrongful homicide of her husband cannot exist at all until he is actually dead, and she cannot, as a matter of course, bring suit before her cause of action comes into life. The statute of limitation begins to run from [18] the time the right of action accrues, that is, as soon as the party is entitled to apply to the proper tribunal. Angell on Lim. (6 ed.) sec. 42. It is clear, therefore, that the statute of limitations which began to run against the husband from the date his right of action accrued, namely, the time the injuries were inflicted, could not be pleaded against the plaintiff in a suit for his homicide, alleged to have been caused by the same injuries; because she had no right of action until her husband died, and the statute could not run against a right of action before it came into existence."

In Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Clarke, 152 U. S. 230, 14 S. Ct. 579, 38 U. S. (L. ed.) 422, which was an action to recover damages for death, the railroad relied upon the rule of the common law, obtaining in prosecutions for murder, that death must ensue within a year and a day. The Court repudiated the defense, and the reasoning based upon a construction of the statute giving a right of action for death, strongly supports our view. The Court says: "The statute, in express words, gives the personal representative two years within which to sue. He cannot sue until the cause of action accrues, and the cause of action given by the statute for the exclusive benefit of the widow and children or next of kin cannot accrue until the person injured dies. Until the death of the person injured, the 'new grievance' upon which the action is founded does not exist. To say, therefore, that where the person injured dies within one year and two days after being injured, no action can be maintained by the personal representative, is to go in the face of the statute, which makes no distinction between cases where death occurs within less than a year and a day from the injury, and where it does not occur until after the expiration of one year and a day. Although the evidence may show, beyond all dispute, that the death was caused by the wrongful act or omission of the defendant, and although the action by the personal representative was brought within two years after the death, yet, according to the argument of learned counsel, the action cannot be maintained if the deceased happened to survive his injuries for a year and a day. We cannot assent to this view. Was the death, in fact, caused by the wrongful act [19] or omission of the defendant? That is the vital inquiry in each case. The statute imposes no other condition upon the right to sue. The court has no authority to impose an additional or different one. If death was so caused, then the personal representative may sue at any time within two years from such death."

The diligent and learned counsel for the defendant has collected all of the cases holding to the contrary.

Canadian Pac. R. Co. v. Robinson, 54 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 49, by the Supreme Court of Canada, was, as we have seen, reversed on appeal.

The two Alabama cases, Williams v. Alabama Great Southern R. Co. 158 Ala. 398, 17 Ann. Cas. 516, 48 So. 495, and Suell v. Derriott, 161 Ala. 259, 18 Ann. Cas. 636, 49 So. 895, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 996, and Seaboard Air Line R. Co. v. Allen, 192 Fed. 480, 112 C. C. A. 642, by the Circuit Court of Appeals, are based upon the construction of the Alabama statute conferring a right of action for death, which is different from ours in that the right there is not new and independent, but is a survival of the right of action of the intestate.

In the first of these cases the Court says: "The object of the statute (section 1751, Code 1896), as we understand it, was to continue the cause of action which the person injured had—and which he had not enforced, but might have enforced had not death intervened—for the benefit of the legal distributees of his estate; and to enable the distributees to obtain their damages, resulting from the same primary cause, and not to create an entirely new and additional right of action, although the mode of estimating the damages might be entirely different from that employed had the action been brought by the employee. In the view we take of the statute, the right to be enforced is not an original one, springing into existence from the death of the intestate, but is one having a previous existence; with the incident of survivorship, derived from the statute itself."

The Circuit Court of Appeals adopts this construction, the injury causing death in that case having occurred in Alabama.

Kelliher v. New York Cent. etc. R. Co. 153 App. Div. 617, 138 N. Y. S. 894, is in point, but it is [20] now pending on appeal in the Court of Appeals of New York.

We are, therefore, of opinion, on reason and authority, that the cause of action is not barred by the statute of limitations.

No error.

NOTE.

Commencement of Running of Statute of Limitations against Action for Death by Wrongful Act.

It is the purpose of this note to review the recent cases discussing the commencement of the running of the statute of limitations against an action for death by wrongful act. The earlier cases passing on this question are reviewed in the notes to Williams v. Alabama Great Southern R. Co. 17 Ann. Cas. 516, and Brown v. Electric Ry. Co. 70 Am. St. Rep. 686.

The statutes of a number of jurisdictions expressly require an action for death by wrongful act to be brought within a specified period after the death of the injured person. Chesapeake, etc. R. Co. v. Hawkins, 174 Fed. 597, 98 C. C. A. 443, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 809 (construing West Virginia statute); Devine v. Metropolitan West Side Elevated R. Co. 162 Ill. App. 629; Hammond v. Lewiston, etc. R. Co. 106 Me. 209, 76 Atl. 672, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 78; Bretthauer v. Jacobson, 79 N. J. L. 223, 75 Atl. 566; Martin v. Pittsburg Rys. Co. 227 Pa. St. 18, 19 Ann. Cas. 818, 75 Atl. 837, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1221; Carpenter v. Rhode Island Co. 36 R. I. 396, 90 Atl. 768; Zimmer v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 19 Ont. App. 693.

The Massachusetts statute provides that an action to recover damages for a death caused by the wrongful act or default of another must be commenced within two years after the injury which caused the death. Cristilly v. Warner, 87 Conn. 461, 88 Atl. 711, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 415.

In New York the rule is that the statute of limitations does not begin to run against an action for death by wrongful act until the appointment of the executor or administrator; but it seems that this rule is limited by a provision requiring the action to be brought within two years after the decedent's death. Conway v. New York, 139 App. Div. 446, 124 N. Y. S. 660; Boffee v. Consolidated Tel. etc. Co. 157 N. Y. S. 318. Compare Dodge v. North Hudson, 188 Fed. 489 (construing New York statute) criticised in American R. Co. v. Coronas, 230 Fed. 545; In Casey v. Auburn Telephone Co. 131 N. Y. S. 1, it was held that an action could be brought in behalf of the next of kin of a person whose death was caused by the wrongful act of the defendant, to recover damages which the next of kin had sustained by the death of the decedent, although the decedent before her death had brought an action to recover damages for personal injuries arising out of the same act that caused her death.

In a number of jurisdictions the rule obtains that the statute of limitations against an action for death by wrongful act does not begin to run until the death of the decedent, although the right of the decedent to recover damages for the injuries which caused his death was barred by limitations. The reason for this rule is that the right of action given by the statute to the persons entitled to sue for the death of the decedent is distinct from the right of the person injured to recover damages for the injuries. Robinson v. Canadian Pac. R. Co. [1892] A. C. (Eng.) 481 (construing Lower Canada statute), reversing 19 Can. Sup. Ct. 292; Donnelly v. Chicago City R. Co. 163 Ill. App. 7; Wilson v. Jackson Hill Coal, etc. Co. 48 Ind. App. 159, 95 N. E. 589; German-American Trust Co. v. Lafayette Box Board, etc. Co. 52 Ind. App. 211, 98 N. E. 874. And see the reported cases. Compare Seaboard Air Line Ry. v. Allen, 192 Fed. 480, 112 O. C. A. 642 (construing Alabama statute); Kelliher v. New York Cent. etc. R. Co. 212 N. Y. 207, 105 N. E. 824, L.R.A.1915E 1178, affirming 163 App. Div. 617, 138 N. Y. S. 894, which reversed 77 Misc. 330, 136 N. Y. S. 256, and answering certified question in Keller v. New York House Wrecking Co. 154 App. Div. 938, 139 N. Y. S. 1128; Casey v. Auburn Tel. Co. 155 App. Div. 66, 139 N. Y. S. 579. In Donnelly v. Chicago City R. Co. supra, it was contended that since death did not ensue for two years after the date of the accident, there could be no recovery by the personal representative of the deceased. The court in answering the contention said: "We do not so construe the statute. The language is, 'Whenever the death of a person shall be caused by the wrongful act, neglect or default, and the act, neglect or default is such as would, if death had not ensued, have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof, then,' etc. In our opinion, this language refers to the right of the injured person as it existed immediately after the accident and not to the situation as it would exist more than two years after the accident, when the right of the injured party had expired by the limitation. The action for the death is different from the action by the injured man himself, in this, that two things must exist; the injury must have been sustained because of the neglect or default of the defendant, and the person injured must have died. It is not until death occurs that the right of action in the widow and next of kin through the administrator exists. We hold, therefore, that the only limitation on the right of the personal representative of the injured person to sue is that contained in the act which gives the right to the personal representative to sue, namely two years (since July 1, 1903, one year) from the date of the death of the person injured. In other words . . . the right of action is statutory and not a survival of decedent's right of action for personal injury."

Where the statute provides that a right of action accruing to a person injured by the wrongful act of another does not abate by the death of the person from the injuries received, but survives to his widow, children, or personal representative, the statute of limitation begins to run from the initiation of the injury, the cause of action being not the death of the person injured, but the breach of duty that caused the injury. Larus v. C. G. Kershaw Contracting Co. 177 Ala. 441, 59 So. 155; Murphy v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 80 Ia. 26, 45 N. W. 392; Flynn v. Chicago Great Western R. Co. 159 Ia. 571, 141 N. W. 403, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1098.

Under the federal statute giving to the personal representative a right of action for the death of a railroad employee when caused by the negligence of the railroad, and providing that the suit must be commenced within two years from the day the cause of action accrues, the period of limitation does not begin to run until the appointment of the personal representative. American R. Co. v. Coronas, 230 Fed. 545 (explaining Bixler v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 201 Fed. 553). In that case the court said: "In view of the fact that Lord Campbell's Act, upon which the Employers' Liability Act was modeled, expressly provided that the limitation should run from the death of the injured party, and that, in the enactment of the present law, Congress declined to adopt such a limitation, and fixed the period from the time the action accrued, we are of the opinion that the proper construction of the statute is that the right of action did not accrue, so that the limitation attached, until the administrator was appointed, and that the demurrer was properly overruled."

The infancy of the plaintiff at the time when the right of action accrues does not postpone the running of the statute. Anthony v. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. 108 Ark. 219, 157 S. W. 394; Gulf, etc. R. Co. v. Bradley (Miss.) 69 So. 666. Compare Conway v. New York, 139 App. Div. 446; 124 N. Y. S. 660. "Section 6296 of Kirby's Digest, commonly known as Lord Campbell's Act, upon which the claim of the plaintiff is based, contains the proviso, 'that every such action shall be commenced within two years after the death of such person.' Inasmuch as the statute creates no saving clause for the benefit of persons under disability, the infancy of the plaintiffs at the time the cause of action accrued, does not postpone the running of the statute. . . . It follows that the bringing of the suit within two years from the death of the person whose death has been caused by the wrongful act is made an essential element of the right to sue. . . . But counsel for plaintiffs claim that the proviso of section 6290, above quoted, is repealed by section 5075 of Kirby's Digest, which reads as follows: 'If any person entitled to bring any action . . . be, at the time of the accrual of the cause of action, under twenty-one years of age, . . . such person shall be at liberty to bring such action within three years next after full age.' . . . The two statutes relate to different subjects, and there is no necessary repugnancy between their provisions." Anthony v. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. supra.

ARNOLD

HUSSEY ET AL.

Maine Supreme Judicial Court—November 5, 1913.

111 Me. 224; 88 Atl. 724.

Evidence — Admissibility of Private Diary.

When a deceased person, a stranger to the transaction, made entries in a book which are relevant to the case, the entries are admissible in evidence only when made in the regular course of business, which means in the way of business, and hence entries by a private person in a diary concerning the weather kept only as a matter of custom and not as a matter of business or duty are not admissible after his death.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

In an action for injuries caused by a fall on the ice in front of defendant's building, the erroneous admission of entries in a prirate weather record kept by one now deceased, tending to show that the temperature was such that ice could not have formed on the day in question, is prejudicial.

[See note at end of this case.]

Exceptions from Supreme Judicial Court, Piscataquis county.

Action for damages. Annie Crandall Arnold, plaintiff, and Marcellus L. Hussey et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff alleges exceptions. The facts are stated in the opinion. EXCEPTIONS SUSTAINED.

J. S. Williams and C. W. Hayes for plaintiff.

Hudson & Hudson for defendants.

[225] SPEAR, J.—This case comes to the Law Court upon exceptions, which are stated as follows: This is an action brought for the purpose of recovering against the defendants, as owners of the Braeburn Block in Guilford, for negligence in so constructing and maintaining said block that the water from the roof was precipitated upon the sidewalk, wholly on the private property of the defendants, so that a ridge of ice naturally would be formed, and the plaintiff alleges actually was formed on said walk in front of the postoffice which was in said building. Evidence was introduced which tended to show that a ridge of ice was formed in front of the said postoffice, and that the plaintiff in the exercise of due care and in the prosecution of lawful business, stepped upon said ridge of ice, and slipped, breaking her leg, which was the injury sued for.

The defendants introduced evidence which tended to deny the fact that there was any ice there at the time of the injury, and for the purpose of showing that the weather on the afternoon of the day on which the accident happened was too warm for the formation of ice, offered to be read to the jury extracts from the diary of one James Ham. Evidence in regard to said diary was adduced by the defendants from their witness, Ernest Ham, which is as follows: Q. What is your residence? A. Guilford. Q. Your father's name? A. James Ham. Q. When did he die? A. The 6th of November. Q. Have you in your possession a record of the weather in his handwriting? A. Yes, sir. Q. Do you know that he kept a record of the weather there in Guilford village? A. Yes, he always did. Q. Will you let me see his book? I show defendant's exhibit No. 1, and calling your attention to a page at the top of which are the words "Thermometer, Saturday, Jan. 21, 1911," and "weather," and to the handwriting directly thereunder, ask you if that is the handwriting of your father?

A: Yes, it is. [226] Mr. Hudson: We offer that. Mr. Hayes: We object. The Court: A private diary, was it? Mr. Hudson: Yes, your honor. The Court: Not kept as a part of any employment or duty. Mr. Hudson: Simply a matter of custom. The Court: Do you dare risk it? Mr. Hudson: Yes, your honor. The Court: Admitted. Mr. Hayes: Exceptions? The Court: Certainly. Q. Do you know how many times a day he took the temperature? A. Twice a day, at six in the morning and six at night. Mr. Hudson: "Saturday, Jan. 21, 1911, 10 above. Cloudy, S. W. P. M." S. W. means wind southwest. That was in the A. M. "P. M. 36 above."

The exceptions raise a question upon the competency of one class of hearsay evidence, upon which the authorities are not in full accord. When a deceased person, who is a stranger to the transaction has made entries in a book, which become relevant to the proof of some fact in issue in the case on trial, such entries with certain limitations may be admitted in evidence, and although not made in the presence of the parties, and not directly concerning their transactions, yet they may be pertinent and even conclusive proof of coeval facts.

But just what the limitations are is where the authorities divide. Yet there seems to be but one qualification that differentiates the decisions. All agree that such entries to become admissible must be made "in the ordinary course of business." Some hold that they must also be made against the interest of the parties making them; others, that this is not essential. Accordingly the result to be reached is not whether this kind of testimony is competent, but what are the limitations to its admissibility. As suggested, the important division of the courts upon the limitations is confined to the one question, whether the entries made must be against interest. But this limitation has been rejected by our court, as will appear below.

While no Maine cases are cited by plaintiff's counsel, yet the Maine reports, in several opinions, contain as comprehensive and satisfactory a solution of the question as we have been able to find. Augusta v. Windsor, 19 Me. 317, very early announced the rule on this subject, in harmony with the leading cases of that time, confirmed by the weight of authority since, and consistent with both reason and authority now. The principle here enunciated for the [227] government of the admission of this class of testimony is found in this language, adopted from Nichols v. Webb, 8 Wheat. 337, 5 U. S. (L. ed.) 628: "We think it a safe principle, that memoranda made by a person in the ordinary course of his business of acts or matters, which his duty in such business requires him to do for others, in case of his death, are admissible evidence of the acts and matters so done." In the next paragraph the opinion in terms rejects the limitation, found in some states, that the entry must appear to have been made against the interest of the party making it, saying: "This court is not satisfied with the reasoning upon which that limitation was introduced, and does not feel obliged to adopt it."

With the statement of this rule, which has not been modified or repealed, we might well sustain the exceptions without further citation, but as no recent opinion, that we are aware of, has had occasion to discuss this precise question, where it was directly raised, and became the pivot upon which the decision of the case turned, it may be well to collate the few decisions that are found, and note the different forms of expression in which the rule is announced. We have already referred to Augusta v. Windsor in the 19th Maine. The next case, in which the point is considered is Dow v. Sawyer, 29 Me. 117, which uses this language: "Contemporaneous entries made by third persons in their own books in the ordinary course of business, the matter being within the knowledge of the parties making the entry and there being no apparent motive to pervert the fact, are received as original evidence." This case also holds that such entries may be received without extraneous proof, if upon inspection of the books they appear to have been fairly kept and contain entries respecting the matter in issue. The next case is Oldtown v. Shapleigh, found in 33 Me. 278, which states: "A minute in writing made at the time when the fact it records took place, by a person since deceased, in the ordinary course of his business, corroborated by other circumstances, which render it probable that the fact occurred, is admissible in evidence. And such a minute is competent, where it is one of a chain or combination of facts, and the proof of one raises a presumption, that another has taken place." See also cases cited. In Lord v. Moore, 37 Me. 208, it is stated this way: "To make such entries in books of a private character admissible, the books in which they are made must have been fairly [228] and regularly kept, the entries must have been made by a deceased person whose duty it was to make them, or in the regular course of business, who had personal knowledge of the subject matter entered, and whose situation was such as to exclude all presumption of his having any interest to misrepresent the fact recorded." See also Pike v. Crehore, 40 Me. 503. In Wignore on Evidence, Vol. 2, sec. 1523, the author says relating to this class of testimony: "The first general requirement is that the entry must have been made in the regular course of business. The judicial phrasings of this requirement vary in terms. The entry must have been, therefore, in the way of business." In Leask v. Hoagland, 205 N. Y. 171, Ann. Cas. 1913D 1199, 98 N. E. 395, is found this expression: "The reason for receiving statements or entries made in the course of business as an exception to the rule (hearsay rule) is that they were made as a part of the regular course of ones livelihood or profession." In Kennedy v. Doyle, 10 Allen (Mass.) 161, we find this conclusion: "In the United States, the law is well settled that an entry made by a person in the ordinary course of his business or vocation, with no interest to misrepresent, before any controversy or question has arisen, and in a book produced from the proper custody, is competent evidence, after his death, of the facts thus recorded." From these varied expressions of the rule, it seems to be well established that the entries of deceased persons in books kept by them, but not connected with the suit in question and not made in the performance of any duty, nor in the course of their own business, are inadmissible; and we fail to find any cases in which a contrary rule is declared. On the other hand, the cases are numerous where entries not made in accordance with the rule herein stated have been rejected.

While public records, kept in the discharge of public duties, when produced by the proper custodian, tending to prove the facts therein contained, are admissible, such as entries made in books kept by the weather bureau, this question is not here involved and requires no discussion.

It very clearly appears from the exceptions that the diary offered and admitted was a book of private memoranda, whose entries were not made by the owner in the performance of any duty nor in the regular course of his own business and were therefore inadmissible.

It was argued that, even if the exceptions were sustainable, the [229] admission of the entries in the book were not prejudicial. We are not able to concur in this view. The very question at issue, was whether the weather conditions on the day in question, were such as to congeal the water flowing from the roof of the building, and thus form the ridge of ice complained of, or whether the weather was so warm as to avoid the conclusion that ice could thus form.

Exceptions sustained.

NOTE.

Private Diary as Evidence.

A private diary is not ordinarily admissible as evidence of the facts therein stated. Mair v. Bassett, 117 Mass. 356; Costello v.

Crowell, 130 Mass. 588, 2 N. E. 698; Stabler v. Clark, 155 Mich. 26, 118 N. W. 605; Elliott v. Sheppard, 179 Mo. 382, 78 S. W. 627; Burke v. Baker, 188 N. Y. 561, 80 N. E. 1033; Whitaker v. White, 69 Hun 258, 23 N. Y. S. 487; Covey v. Rogers, 84 Vt. 151, 78 Atl. 792. See also Barber's Appeal, 63 Conn. 393, 27 Atl. 973, 22 L.R.A. 90; Star Mills v. Bailey, 140 Ky. 194, 130 S. W. 1077, 140 Am. St. Rep. 370; Dorris v. Morrisdale Coal Co. 215 Pa. St. 638, 64 Atl. 855. And see the reported case. The reasons for excluding a private diary were well summarized in Elliott v. Sheppard, supra, wherein the court said: "This diary does not belong to that class of documentary evidence which is admissible. It is not in the nature of a book account, which, upon showing that it was correctly kept, would render it admissible. It is merely a statement purporting to be made by Hamilton, and is of no more force or effect than if he had made such statements to some witness the day before he died. Again it is inadmissible, because it falls within that class of testimony denominated self-serving statements. So in Mair v. Bassett, 117 Mass. 356, it was said: "To prove that the loan was made to the defendant, and the note given by him, the plaintiff offered in evidence certain entries in the diary of Dillaway in his handwriting, purporting to have been made April 14, 17 and 20, 1871. These entries are vague and incomplete, but giving them the most favorable construction, they are to the effect that he had made an agreement with the defendant to take his note, with certain mortgages and policies of insurance as collateral, and had paid $4000 to the defendant on the agreement. No evidence was offered that the defendant had ever seen the entries or had any knowledge of them, or that he had anything to do with the transaction therein recited, except that he did, on April 14, assign to Dillaway, a mortgage on land in New Hampshire. These entries were merely the declarations of Dillaway, and were properly excluded as not competent to prove that the defendant borrowed the money of Dillaway and gave his note therefor."

The holding of the reported case that entries, in a private diary, of daily weather observations are not admissible finds support in Monarch Mfg. Co. v. Omaha, etc. R. Co. 127 Ia. 511, 103 N. W. 493, wherein it was held that private records of weather observations, not, however, kept in the form of a diary, were inadmissible.

If a diary is kept as a book of account it is admissible as such. Remick v. Rumery, 69 N. H. 601, 45 Atl. 574; Gleason v. Kinney, 65 Vt. 560, 27 Atl. 208. In the case first cited it was said: "Exclusion of the diaries altogether was erroneous. They were the plaintiff's books of account, kept by himself as a daily and original record of his transactions and business, and as such they were competent evidence in his favor, in the absence of anything in their appearance or character, or in the circumstances of the case, indicating that they were not kept with honesty and accuracy. Nothing of this nature is found or suggested." So in Gleason v. Kinney, supra, it was said: "The entry is in the form of an original entry of a charge in book account, rather than a memorandum from which such a charge could be formulated. The subject matter of each was a proper matter for charge on book account. In subject matter and form there is no objection to treating these entries as original entries in a book account. The only objection to treating them as such is the fact that they are found entered under the proper dates in a diary, and not on the orator's regular books of account, which it is found that he kept. . . . We think these entries were, in substance and form, proper entries in book account, and as such admissible in evidence, and that these items should be allowed to the orator." But in Covey v. Rogers, 84 Vt. 151, 78 Atl. 792, it was said: "The first exhibit is contained in a diary, on pages having the printed heading 'cash account.' The other exhibits are in blank memorandum books. In all of them the amounts are entered in columns under the headings 'received' and 'paid.' The entries are not in the ordinary form of book account entries. The items are without the usual signs of debit and credit. There is nothing to connect the defendant with the transactions represented. For anything that appears the several items may represent transactions with as many different persons. Considered as anything more than a cash account, the entries are meaningless until explained by the testimony of the person who made them. They must be regarded as mere private memoranda, available in aid of the recollection and as confirmatory of the testimony given, but not entitled to use as direct evidence against the party sought to be charged."

An entry in a diary being in the nature of a declaration, if it was against interest when made, is admissible. Miller v. McLean, 31 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 64, wherein the court said: "The entry in his diary purporting to be the result of an examination of his account as shown by the books of Mills, Spellmire & Co., some of which had since been destroyed by fire, and being against interest when made, was admissible as evidence of payment or assumption of payment of his wife's debt."

In Barber's Appeal, 63 Conn. 393, 27 Atl. 973, 22 L.R.A. 90, entries in a diary kept by the testator were held to be admissible as tending to show his mental condition but not as proof of the facts therein stated.

A diary may be used by the person keeping it to refresh his recollection. Burson v. Vogel, 29 App. Cas. (D. C.) 388; Star Mills v. Bailey, 140 Ky. 194, 130 S. W. 1077, 140 Am. St. Rep. 370. And see Pierce v. Brady, 23 Beav. (Eng.) 64. In the case first cited it was said: "Burson is a man over seventy years of age, and appears to have kept a diary for fifty years, in which he made a daily record of events. There is nothing in the appearance of this diary to excite suspicion. The dates follow consecutively. It is true that the record is in shorthand, after the Pittman system; but it appears that the interpretation thereof could be made with sufficient certainty by one skilled in that method. Having testified in regard to his conception and the work done therein, he read a number of entries from the diary, showing dates and memoranda of work done. We see no substantial difference between this and the ordinary use of memoranda by a witness to refresh his memory." So it was said in Star Mills v. Bailey, supra: "Newton kept a diary. With it before him he was enabled to say that he was not in Owensboro the first of June, 1906, the day the note is dated, and when appellee says the transaction occurred. While the diary is not evidence, it may be referred to by the witness to refresh his recollection as to where he was on a certain day, and if when so refreshed he could remember and say that he was not at the place testified to by the adversary witness, the testimony is not only relevant, but the circumstance indicates a carefulness of habit, and a ready and generally reliable means of refreshing the recollection." In Smith v. Tebbitt, L. R. 1 P. & D. (Eng.) 398, the weight of such evidence was commented on as follows: "Considerable exception was taken to the evidence of Mrs. Cooke. She was a niece of Mrs. Thwaytes, and for many months was a visitor at her house. She occupied herself during this time in keeping notes in a diary of all the extravagant things her aunt said to her; and she did not deny that this diary was designed as a proof in future days of her aunt's incapacity to make a will. This diary was given in evidence, and records conversations with Mrs. Thwaytes still more remarkable than any here quoted. Such a document, if the honesty of its purpose could be relied upon, would form the best evidence in the case. But if there should have been an intention, as unquestionably there was a strong motive, to deceive, it would be the worst. I think it safer to set this portion of the evidence, for the present, aside, and recur to it, if need be, hereafter."

Death by Wrongful Act — Right to Sue — Mother of Illegitimate Child.

Under our statutes the mother of an illegitimate minor child, and the mother alone, has the right to sue for and recover damages for the death of such child by the wrongful act, negligence, carelessness, or default of another. [See note at end of this case.]

(Syllabus by court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Leon county: MALONE, Judge.

Action for death by wrongful act. Emma Hadley, plaintiff, and City of Tallahassee, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

W. J. Owen and S. H. Diamond for plaintiff in error.

F. T. Myers for defendant in error.

[436] TAYLOR, J.—The plaintiff in error as plaintiff below sued the defendant in error as defendant below in the Circuit Court of Leon County for damages for the alleged negligent killing by electricity of an illegitimate child of the plaintiff of the age of six years.

The defendant demurred to the declaration on the grounds, among others, that the statute giving the right of recovery for the negligent death of a minor child, contemplates only legitimate children, and that no recovery can be had under it by the mother of an illegitimate child negligently killed; and that if a right of action exists under the statute for the wrongful death of a bastard [437] child, it does not accrue to the mother unless the father be dead. This demurrer was sustained by the court below, and final judgment rendered thereon in favor of the defendant, and against the plaintiff, who brings it here for review by writ of error.

Our statute, Section 3147 General Statutes of 1906, enacted in 1899, provides as follows:

"Death of Minor Child by Wrongful Act.—Whenever the death of any minor child shall be caused by the wrongful act, negligence, carelessness or default of any private association of persons; or by the wrongful act, negligence, carelessness or default of any officer, agent or employee, or by the wrongful act, negligence, carelessness or default of any corporation, or by the wrongful act, negligence, carelessness or default of any officer, agent or employee of any corporation acting in his capacity as such officer, agent or employee, the father of such minor child, or if the father be not living, the mother, as the legal representative of such deceased minor child, may maintain an action against such individual, private association of persons or corporation, and may recover not only for the loss of service of such minor child, but in addition thereto such sum for the mental pain and suffering of the parent or parents as the jury may assess."

Long prior to the enactment of the foregoing statute our Legislature on November 17th, 1899, enacted the following provision, brought forward as Section 2292 of the General Statutes of 1906:

"Bastards shall be capable of inheriting or transmitting inheritance on the part of their mother in like manner as if they had been lawfully begotten of such mother."

Prior to the adoption of the last above quoted statute, [438] under the Common Law of England, then in force in this Territory, a bastard in the eye of the law had neither father or mother, nor any other kindred, but was regarded as nullius filius. But by the adoption of this statute a mother was assigned to him through whom and to whom he could receive and transmit inheritance of property just as though he had been of legitimate birth. This statute recognizes in the parentage of bastards their mother as such, but leaves the parentage so far as the father is concerned where it was before its adoption. On his father's part he is still nullius filius. In other words under this statute a bastard has a mother fully recognized by law as such, but no father. Our Legislature had this statute before them when in 1899 it enacted Section 3147 General Statutes above quoted, giving to the mothers of minor children, when the fathers of such children were not living, the right to recover for their death by wrongful act. Insofar as bastards are concerned, they have no fathers recognized as such by any law, but as to them and the right of their mothers to recover for their wrongful death under this statute, they occupy the same status before the law as a legitimate child whose legally recognized father was actually dead. This statute, being in derogation of the common law, we admit under the general rule, should receive a somewhat strict construction, but at the same time it should be borne in mind that it is a remedial statute also, and that it should not receive so narrow a construction as to defeat the intention of the lawmaking power in its enactment. What was that intention? In the broad language of the statute itself, it was to furnish a remedy for the death of "any minor child" by the wrongful act, negligence or careles-ness of another. Could it have been the intention of our lawmaking power in the enactment of this law, to exclude [439] from its remedial provisions the unfortunate illegitimate for whose misfortune of birth he has no sort of personal responsibility, thereby making him a double outcast, with no right to the protection of the law for his life, leaving him the unprotected target for the wilful, negligent and careless on every hand? We are not inclined to give the statute such a construction; but our better judgment leads us to hold with those courts, that in the construction of statutes similar in all material respects to ours, have held that the mother of an illegitimate minor child, and the mother alone, has the right to sue for and recover damages for the death of such child by the wrongful act, negligence, carelessness or default of another. Southern R. Co. v. Hawkins, 35 App. Cas. (D. C.) 313; Croft v. Southern Cotton Oil Co. 83 S. C. 232, 65 S. E. 216; Security Title, etc. Co. v. West Chicago St. R. Co. 21, Ill. App. 332; Muhl v. Michigan Southern R. Co. 10 Ohio St. 272; Galveston, etc. R. Co. v. Walker, 48 Tex. Civ. App. 52, 106 S. W. 705; Marshall v. Wabash R. Co. 120 Mo. 275, 25 S. W. 179; Dickason Coal Co. v. Liddil, 49 Ind. App. 40, 94 N. E. 411.

It follows from what has been said that the judgment of the court below must be, and is hereby, reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to overrule the demurrer of the defendant to the plaintiff's declaration, at the cost of the defendant in error.

NOTE.

Right of Parent to Recover for Death of Illegitimate Child.

Contrary to the holding in Lynch v. Knoop, 118 La. 611, 10 Ann. Cas. 807, the doctrine of the reported case that the mother of an illegitimate child has the right to recover for its death finds support in several late decisions, based on statutes giving to illegitimates the power to transmit inheritance. Dickason Coal Co. v. Liddil, 49 Ind. App. 40, 94 N. E. 411; Kenney v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 107 N. C. 14, 82 S. E. 968; Thompson v. Delaware, etc. R. Co. 41 Pa. Super. Ct. 617; Croft v. Southern Cotton Oil Co. 83 S. C. 232, 65 S. E. 216 (express statutory provision); Andrzejewski v. Northwestern Fuel Co. 168 Wis. 170, 148 N. W. 37. Thus Thompson v. Delaware, etc. R. Co. supra, was a case wherein the mother of an illegitimate child sought damages for her offspring's negligent killing. The action was brought under a statute entitled an act "to regulate and define the legal relation of an illegitimate child or children, its or their heirs, with each other, and the mother and her heirs." The first section thereof declared that "illegitimate children shall take and be known by the name of their mother and the common-law doctrine of nullius filius shall not apply as between the mother and her illegitimate child or children, but the mother and her heirs and her illegitimate child and its heirs, shall be mutually liable one to the other, and shall enjoy all the rights and privileges one to the other, in the same manner, and to the same extent, as if the said child or children had been born in lawful wedlock." The second section provided that "the mother of an illegitimate child, her heirs and legal representatives, and said illegitimate child or children, its or their heirs and legal representatives, shall have capacity to take or inherit from or through each other, personal estate, as next of kin, and real estate as heirs in fee simple or otherwise, under the intestate laws of this commonwealth, in the same manner and to the same extent, subject to the distinction of half-bloods, as if said child or children had been born in lawful wedlock." The fourth section was as follows: "The intent of this act is to legitimate an illegitimate child, and its heirs, as to its mother and her heirs; but it is not intended to change the existing laws with regard to the father of such children, or their respective heirs or legal representatives." The court, holding that the mother was entitled to recover, said: "In interpreting this statute, the question is not, Could the right of the mother of an illegitimate child to maintain the action have been more clearly expressed? but, Do the words used clearly convey the legislative intention of her right to maintain such an action? There is no ambiguity in its provisions; it is the last step taken in a long series of enactments and adjudications, involving the same subject matter, and each enactment is a step forward in the direction of relief and protection for the unfortunate mother of an illegitimate child, and of an increase of the rights of her offspring. By its very terms the old common law doctrine of nullius filius no longer applies; the mother and her heirs, and the child and its heirs, shall be mutually liable one to the other, and shall enjoy all the rights and privileges one to the other, in the same manner, and to the same extent as if the child had been born in lawful wedlock, and the special declaration of intent is stated in unequivocal words to be, to legitimate an illegitimate child as to its mother. With this declaration of intention, can it be questioned that the object and effect of this statute was to change the status and capacity of an illegitimate child to the status and capacity of a legitimate child, and create the relation of parent and child for all purposes as if the latter had been born in lawful wedlock. These are the words used, and to our mind they can be interpreted in but one way."

So in Kennedy v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 167 N. C. 14, 82 S. E. 968, an action brought under the federal Employers' Liability Act by the administrator of an illegitimate child to recover for its wrongful death, it was held that the suit could be rightfully maintained for the benefit of the minor dependant children of the mother, as the expression "next of kin" as used in section 1 of the Act should be construed in the light of the statute law of North Carolina where the suit was brought, which law provided as follows: "Illegitimate children, born of the same mother, shall be considered legitimate as between themselves and their representatives, and their personal estate shall be distributed in the same manner as if they had been born in lawful wedlock. And in the case of the death of any such child or his issue, without leaving issue, his estate shall be distributed among his mother and all such persons as would be his next of kin if all such children had been born in lawful wedlock."

Likewise Andrzejewski v. Northwestern Fuel Co. 158 Wis. 170, 148 N. W. 37, wherein it was held that a recovery could be had for the benefit of an illegitimate's mother in an action for the negligent killing of the bastard, the court said: "It is contended that the recovery for loss to the mother of the deceased is improper because the deceased was an illegitimate. It is useless to review the conflict of authority on this point. The policy of our written law is to give an illegitimate, as regards the mother, substantially the same status as a child born in lawful wedlock. That was the situation when the law as it now exists respecting recoveries for loss accruing to ancestors by the negligent killing of their children, was enacted. The legislature must have appreciated that in providing for a recovery for the benefit of the lineal ancestors in default of there being lineal descendants. Sec. 4256, Stats. The statute is general. It makes no discrimination between lineal ancestors of illegitimates and those of legitimates. The former have inheritable and descendible blood as to the mother. Secs. 2273, 2274. That is not so as to the father, especially in the absence of a statutory acknowledgment of paternity, or legitimization by marriage. So while there is reason for excluding the father of an illegitimate from the privileges of the statute there is none as to the mother."

In Dickason Coal Co. v. Liddel, 49 Ind. App. 40, 94 N. E. 411, the action was brought by the administrator of an illegitimate child for the benefit of the alleged next of kin (a mother, two half brothers, and a half sister) to recover damages for its wrongful death under a statute (sec. 285, Burns' Rev. Stat. 1908) which provided that "the damages cannot exceed ten thousand dollars; and must inure to the exclusive benefit of the widow, or widower (as the case may be), and children, if any, or next of kin, to be distributed in the same manner as personal property of the deceased." It was held that the mother was next of kin within the meaning of this statute. The court said: "The chief incapacity of a bastard consisted in his want of inheritable blood. This want has been supplied in this state by statute, and the harsh rule of the common law that forbade an illegitimate child from inheriting from its mother or she from it, has been thereby abrogated. The statute, conferring upon illegitimate children the right to inherit from the mother, is, as follows: 'Illegitimate children shall inherit from the mother as if they were legitimate, and through the mother, if dead, any property or estate which she would, if living have taken by gift, devise, or descent from any other person.' § 2998 Burns 1908, § 2474 R. S. 1881. The statute conferring upon the mother of an illegitimate child and her descendants the right to inherit from such illegitimate child is as follows: 'The mother of an illegitimate child dying intestate, without issue or other descendants, shall inherit his estate; and if such mother be dead, her descendants or collateral kindred shall take the inheritance in the order hereinbefore prescribed.' § 3002 Burns 1908, § 2477 R. S. 1881. . . . The phrase 'next of kin' includes such persons as are entitled to inherit the personal property of the deceased person. Under the statutes of our state the mother of an illegitimate child and her descendants and collateral and kindred are entitled to inherit the personal property of such deceased child, and are therefore its next of kin. We recognize the rule that a statute in derogation of the common law must be strictly construed, and we regard § 285, supra, as such a statute, but we do not think that a strict construction of this section will prevent the mother of an illegitimate child from being considered its next of kin within the meaning of this act."

A section of an act providing that "in event of the death of such illegitimate child or the mother of such illegitimate child, by the wrongful or negligent act of another, such illegitimate child or the mother of such illegitimate child, shall have the same rights and remedies, in regard to such wrongful or negligent act, as though such illegitimate child had been born in lawful wedlock," has been held to be constitutional as against the objection that it did not relate to the subject expressed in the title of the act which read as follows: "An act to provide for an illegitimate child, to inherit from its mother, and the mother from her illegitimate child." Croft v. Southern Cotton Oil Co. 83 S. C. 232, 85 S. E. 216.

Survival of Actions — Conspiracy to Restrain Trade.

A right of action for damages sustained from an unlawful conspiracy and combination between the defendants for the purpose of creating restrictions in trade and commerce, and of destroying the credit, reputation, and business of F., whereby F.'s business was ruined, and he was forced to sell its tangible assets for an inadequate price, does not survive the death of F. at common law, nor under Comp. Laws 1897, § 10117, which provides that actions for negligent injury to persons, for damages to real or personal estate, and actions to recover real estate, where persons have been induced to part therewith through fraudulent representations and deceit, shall survive.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Under Pub. Acts 1897, No. 195 (Comp. Laws 1897, §§ 10421, 10422), providing that where, by the fraudulent representations any injury shall be done to the person, property, or rights of another for which an action for fraud may be brought, assumpsit may be brought to recover damages for such injury, and that the cause of action shall, upon the death of the person injured, survive, held, by an equally divided court, that such cause of action did not survive the death of F., since defendant's acts, though illegal and oppressive, were neither deceptive nor fraudulent, and, while they would give a right of action on the case, the action was not one for fraud and deceit.

Error to Circuit Court, Wayne county:
HOSMER, Judge.

Action for damages. Edward Frohlich et al., plaintiffs, and John F. Deacon et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs bring error. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Lucking, Emmons & Helfman for plaintiffs in error.

James O. Murfin for defendant in error Miller Lumber Company.

Geor. Williams, Martin & Butler for defendant in error City Lumber Company.

[255] BROOKE, J.—The opinion of Chief Justice McAlvay proceeds upon the assumption, which I think is warranted in law, that the cause of action set up in plaintiffs' declaration does not survive at common law, nor under section 10117, 3 Comp. Laws (5 How. Stat. [2d ed.] § 12761). He holds, however, that said cause of action does survive under sections 10421, 10422, 3 Comp. Laws (5 How. Stat. [2d ed.] [256] §§ 13954, 13955). Under those sections it is apparent that only those causes of action survive where the injured party in his lifetime might have brought "an action on the case for fraud or deceit." The question, therefore, arises: Are the alleged illegal acts ascribed to defendants such acts as would have sustained an action on the case for fraud or deceit brought by plaintiffs' testator in his lifetime? Upon this point, Mr. Justice McAlvay says:

"The conduct charged in the declaration by plaintiffs against defendants may, without misnomer, be labeled fraudulent. It may further be said that this declaration was intended to state a cause of action for deceit brought about by fraud."

With this conclusion I find myself unable to agree. The essential elements of actionable fraud are said to be:

(1) That defendant made a material representation; (2) that it was false; (3) that when he made it he knew that it was false, or made it recklessly, without any knowledge of its truth, and as a positive assertion; (4) that he made it with the intention that it should be acted upon by plaintiff; (5) that plaintiff acted in reliance upon it; and (6) that he thereby suffered injury.

20 Cyc. p. 13.

In Parker v. Armstrong, 55 Mich. 176 (20 N. W. 892), it is said:

"The cause of action being the successful use of false pretenses to get plaintiff to pay for the notes passed off on him, the declaration must, in order to support such a judgment as was rendered, show—first, what pretenses were made; second, that they were made by the defendants in person, or by authority and design; third, that they were material; fourth, that they were false and fraudulent, and deceived complainant; and, fifth, what defendants obtained by them."

[257] The term "fraud and deceit" implies deception by means of fraudulent representations or otherwise, resulting in injury. While the adjective "fraudulent" is frequently used in the declaration to characterize the acts alleged to have been committed by the defendants, the use of that term alone is not sufficient to fix the quality of the acts, or to give them a legal significance which they do not intrinsically possess. It is nowhere averred in the declaration that the illegal acts alleged to have been committed by defendants misled or deceived plaintiffs' testator, nor that in consequence of those acts, being so misled, he acted to his injury. The acts described were illegal and oppressive. They were not deceptive nor fraudulent. The commission of those acts by the defendants gave to plaintiffs' testator in his lifetime a right of action on the case under the statute or at common law; but such an action cannot by any stretch of the imagination be considered one for fraud and deceit.

Without further considering the other objections raised by the demurrer to plaintiffs' declaration, I am of opinion that the foregoing conclusion is inevitable, and therefore fatal to plaintiffs' right to recover.

The order sustaining defendants' demurrer should be affirmed.

Stone, Ostrander, and Steere, JJ., concurred with Brooke, J.

MCALVAY, C. J.—In this case the trial court sustained the demurrers of defendants to an amended declaration. Plaintiffs have brought the case to this court for review upon a writ of error asking for a reversal of the judgment entered upon the order sustaining such demurrers.

The facts in the case set forth in the amended declaration, which if well pleaded are admitted by the demurrers, are as follows:

[258] Plaintiffs are executor and executrix of Simon Frohlich, deceased. The declaration, in three separate counts, charges a fraudulent conspiracy at common law on the part of defendants to ruin and destroy the credit, reputation, and business of the plaintiffs' testator, and also a violation of the anti-trust laws of this State.

Simon Frohlich, prior to January 1, 1906, owned and operated a factory in the city of Detroit. He was engaged in the manufacture and sale of sash, doors, and other building material. At this time he enlarged his business to include buying, manufacturing, wholesaling, retailing, and jobbing lumber and building materials, under the name and style of Frohlich Glass Company, investing in such enterprise a cash capital of $70,000. In two years he doubled the number of his employees and built up a business of $12,000 sales per month. He had prospects of continued expansion and success.

Defendants were competitors of Simon Frohlich and engaged in the lumber business, doing more than 90 per cent. of the whole-sale, retail, and jobbing business in lumber in Detroit, and comprising about 75 per cent. of the lumber dealers. They fraudulently and unlawfully entered into a conspiracy and combination on or about June 1, 1907, actionable at the common law, and for the purpose of creating and carrying out restrictions in trade and commerce, contrary to the laws of Michigan, and for the purpose of destroying the credit, reputation, and business of Simon Frohlich.

By this combination and fraudulent conspiracy and their subsequent illegal acts in carrying out the same, defendants succeeded in ruining the lumber business of Simon Frohlich, and forcing him to sell practically all its tangible assets to one of them at an inadequate price of $20,000 less than its value, and in driving him out of this business.

[259] Eighteen individuals, firms, and corporations are joined as defendants in this suit. Of these, 15 have demurred, and the grounds of these demurrers presented and relied upon in their briefs are as follows:

"(1) The declaration is not sufficiently specific, and does not set forth a cause of action.

"(2) Such action does not survive the death of Simon Frohlich.

"(3) Simon Frohlich was estopped by reason of the sale of the tangible assets of his business."

The second ground of demurrer relied upon by defendants raises in our opinion the most important question in the case. It requires the construction of the statute under which the action is brought in assumpsit, and upon which plaintiffs rely. The exact question is for the first time before this court. This is Act No. 195 of the Public Acts of 1897, entitled:

"An act to provide for bringing actions of assumpsit in certain cases, and to provide that in such cases the cause of action shall survive."

The entire act reads:

"Sec. 1. In all cases where, by the fraudulent representations or conduct of any person, an injury has been or shall be produced, either to the person, property or rights of another, for which an action on the case for fraud or deceit may by law be brought, an action of assumpsit may be brought to recover damages for such injury, and in all such cases a promise shall be implied by law to pay all just damages arising from such fraud or deceit and may be so declared.

"Sec. 2. The causes of action specified in section one of this act shall, upon the death of the person injured, survive to his personal representatives."

Sections 10421 and 10422, 3 Comp. Laws (5 How. Stat. [2d ed.] §§ 13954, 13955).

The act in question, as its title indicates, is to provide that certain actions sounding in tort may be brought in assumpsit, and also to provide that in all cases where this may be done the causes of action [260] shall survive. This presupposes the fact that before the enactment of this statute such actions could not have been brought in assumpsit, nor would the causes of action have survived. It will therefore be necessary, first, to determine the class of actions which may be brought under this statute in assumpsit, from which it will logically follow that all such causes of action will survive.

In this State provision is made for the survival of actions, as follows:

"In addition to the actions which survive by the common law, the following shall also survive: that is to say: actions of replevin, and trover, actions of assault and battery, false imprisonment, for goods taken and carried away, for negligent injury to persons, for damages done to real or personal estate, and actions to recover real estate where persons have been induced to part with the same through fraudulent representations and deceit." Section 10117, 3 Comp. Laws (5 How. Stat. [2d ed.] § 12761).

To this is added, by the act under consideration, the provisions as quoted in sections 10421, 10422, supra.

All such actions specifically mentioned survive by force of these statutes, whether or not they were assignable at the common law. Rights of action which survive are also assignable. Stebbins v. Dean, 82 Mich. 385-388, 46 N. W. 778.

Section 10117, supra, was adopted by this State verbatim (except the portions italicized) from the State of Massachusetts. In construing this statute, this court, in Stebbins v. Dean, supra, in an opinion written by Mr. Justice Grant, adopted and followed the construction placed upon it by the Massachusetts courts, holding that the statute "was intended to include only those cases where injury is occasioned to property by the direct wrongful act of a party upon the property," citing Cummings v. Bird, 115 Mass. 346. Wisconsin, following Michigan, adopted the same statute, and in a line of decisions has given to [261] it a like construction. The same is true of the courts of several of the States.

Upon the construction of this statute, where similar phraseology is used, there appears to be no disagreement among the better authorities.

The contention of the demurring defendants is that by the words of this new act under consideration no change has been made in this respect, and that the rule laid down in the case of Stebbins v. Dean, supra, controls in this case. They insist that the cause of action plaintiffs declare upon essentially sounds in tort, and is based upon an alleged conspiracy entered into by defendants to create and carry out a trust and monopoly, a restriction in trade and commerce in lumber and building material to injure plaintiffs' testator and drive him out of business, in violation of the common law, and of the Michigan anti-trust act, so called, as a result of which conspiracy plaintiffs' testator suffered damage to his business in his lifetime, and that under all the authorities such causes of action do not survive.

The dispute upon this question, then, is narrowed to a single proposition, and that is whether Act No. 195, Pub. Acts 1897, supra, by its express provisions, has made a change in the law by adding to the list of causes of action which survive.

This statute includes all cases arising from injuries produced by the false representations or conduct of any person for which an action on the case for fraud or deceit might be brought at law, and gives the person injured a right to bring an action in assumpsit for such injuries. The nature of the injuries are specified as injuries "either to the person, property or rights of another."

Dealing with the instant concrete case, we must determine whether, upon the facts stated in the declaration, plaintiffs' testator could have brought an action on the case at law for fraud or deceit against [262] defendants to recover damages for the injury received.

The conduct charged in the declaration by plaintiffs against defendants may, without misnomer, be labeled fraudulent. It may further be said that this declaration was intended to state a cause of action for deceit brought about by fraud. In a similar case the action has been so recognized by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin in Murray v. Buell, 76 Wis. 657, 45 N. W. 667, 20 Am. St. Rep. 92. This was an action for conspiracy to monopolize the coal business in Milwaukee to the injury of plaintiff's business, referring to which in a later case, Lane v. Frawley, 102 Wis. 373, 78 N. W. 593, that court said:

"That action is in all respects analogous to the action of deceit, resulting in loss and damage."

And of the case then under consideration it said:

"This, then, being a tort action for deceit to recover general damages caused by the fraud, and not to recover back specific property obtained by fraud, it is vigorously debated whether or not it survives."

In both these Wisconsin cases, supra, it was held that the actions did not survive by reason of the Wisconsin statutes which have at no time contained language indicative of the intention that they should survive.

The instant case is a tort action for deceit to recover general damages to the business of plaintiffs' testator caused by fraud during his lifetime, and not to recover damages for injuries to specific tangible property. If a recovery can be had, it will be because this court holds that the right of action survived under the statute in question.

This statute makes provision for a right of action in assumpsit for injuries done "either to the person, property or rights of another." By the addition of the words "or rights of another," it must be held that the clear intent of the legislature was to add to the [263] actions which survived in this State another class of actions which were not theretofore included, namely: all actions for damages for injuries caused by the fraudulent representations or conduct of any person to the "rights of another."

The damages for which the instant suit has been brought are included in that class, and, as already stated, are damages, not to the specific property of plaintiffs' testator, but to his business. Such injury to his business was an injury to his rights.

The statute of the State of New York provides for the survival of actions for "wrongs done to the property, rights or interests of another." This language has been frequently before the court of last resort of that State for construction. In Cregin v. Brooklyn Crosstown R. Co. 75 N. Y. 192, 31 Am. Rep. 459, Mr. Justice Rapallo, speaking for the court said:

"The rights and interests, for tortious injuries to which this statute preserves the right of action, have frequently been considered, and it is generally conceded that they must be pecuniary rights or interests, by injuries to the estate of the deceased is diminished. . . . Where an injury to pecuniary interests is shown, the intent of the statute seems plain that the cause of action shall survive, notwithstanding that such injury be caused by a tort, provided it be not one of the torts specifically mentioned and excepted."

That this New York statute declaring that causes of action for injuries to "property, rights and interests shall survive" is much broader than the statutes of Wisconsin, Massachusetts, and the former statute of Michigan is apparent, and is recognized and admitted by defendants in one of their briefs. It is also recognized by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin in John V. Farwell Co. v. Wolf, 96 Wis. 10-18, 70 N. W. 289, 290, 71 N. W. 109, 37 L.R.A. 138, 65 Am. St. Rep. 22, where the court said:

[264] "The New York statute provides that 'actions for all wrongs done to property, rights or interests of another shall survive.' It is held that this language is so broad and comprehensive as to cover all injuries to rights of property, and is not confined to injuries, . . . as such—that it includes actions for damages for conspiracies to defraud and damages for deceit. Bond v. Smith, 4 Hun 48; Haight v. Hayt, 19 N. Y. 464; Lyon v. Park, 111 N. Y. 350, 18 N. E. 863; Brackett v. Griswold, 103 N. Y. 425, 9 N. E. 438. These cases turn entirely on the meaning of the significant words 'property, rights and interests.'"

In our statute under construction the words "or rights of another" are of much broader significance than any of the language used in section 10117, 3 Comp. Laws, quoted supra, and are as comprehensive as the words quoted from the New York statute; and section 2 of the act provides that:

"The causes of action specified in section one of this act shall, upon the death of the person injured, survive."

Both upon reason and authority the conclusion cannot be avoided that the instant case is within the provisions of section 1 of this act, and that the cause of action by virtue of section 2 survived.

This same question was before the supreme court of the State of Wisconsin in Lane v. Frawley, supra, and upon the statute which contained words identical with those in the New York statute and those in the act of this State under consideration.

The contention was that the words were entitled to the same construction as given to them by the courts of the State of New York, and therefore the action in the case under consideration should be held to have survived. The section in the Wisconsin statute containing these words contained no words of survival as did the New York statute, and also our Act No. 195 under consideration. The court held the section was not intended to provide for the survival [265] of any action, but merely to regulate the proceedings in such actions as otherwise survived.

An examination of that opinion makes it clear that, had the section contained specific words of survival, the court would have held that the cause of action survived. Our legislature has declared that such case of action shall survive in words so clear that the intent cannot be mistaken.

The remaining grounds for demurrer do not require extended consideration. An examination of the amended declaration satisfies us that the pleader has stated a good cause of action both at the common law and under the Michigan anti-trust laws. The document is necessarily of great length, and must be considered as a whole. To make it more specific would, in our opinion, require that the evidence be pleaded. Similar declarations in actions in cases for damages for wrongful acts in interrupting and destroying plaintiff's business and injuring the reputation of his business which contained no more specific allegations than are set forth in the declaration under consideration have been held by this court to state a cause of action. Oliver v. Perkins, 92 Mich. 304-315, 52 N. W. 609; Church v. Anti-Kalsomine Co., 118 Mich. 219, 76 N. W. 383.

The Federal courts have sustained similar declarations in cases brought under the Sherman anti-trust law (Act July 2, 1890, chap. 647, 26 U. S. Stat. 209 [U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3200]). Wheeler-Stenzel Co. v. National Window Glass Jobbers' Assoc. 152 Fed. 864, 81 C. C. A. 658, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 972; Monarch Tobacco Works v. American Tobacco Co. 165 Fed. 774-779; People's Tobacco Co. v. American Tobacco Co. 170 Fed. 396, 95 C. C. A. 566; Hale v. O'Connor Coal, etc. Co. 181 Fed. 267.

The remaining ground for demurrer relied upon is that plaintiffs' testator was estopped from bringing this action by reason of having sold his business prior to his death. The declaration shows that, after [266] Simon Frohlich's business was ruined, the unlawful acts of defendants as charged and his factory ceased operations, he was forced to and did sell all the tangible personal property used by him in connection with his business to one of the defendants at a price $20,000 less than its value. This sale carried with it no rights of action or other intangible property or interests. If he had a cause of action against defendants, this sale in no way disposed of it. This ground for demurrer is therefore not meritorious. Our conclusion is that the demurrers should have been overruled.

The judgment of the circuit court should be reversed and set aside, with permission to the demurring defendants, after notice of this decision, to plead to the declaration within the usual time allowed by rule.

Kuhn, Bird, and Moore, JJ., concurred with McAlvay, C. J.

NOTE.

Survival of Right of Action for Conspiracy to Restrain Trade.

The reported case holds by an equally divided court that a right of action for the damages caused by an illegal conspiracy in restraint of trade is not an action for damages by fraud and does not survive the death of the injured person. A like result has been reached in what appears to be the only other case passing on the survival of such a cause of action. Murray v. Buell, 76 Wis. 657, 45 N. W. 667, 20 Am. St. Rep. 92. In that case the action was for damages for a conspiracy to control and monopolize the coal business in a certain city. After referring to the common law rule whereby personal actions die with the injured person, the court said: "It is claimed, however, that such cause of action would survive by virtue of ch. 280, Laws of 1887, amending that section by the introduction of the words, 'or other damage to the person,' so that the part here applicable now reads: 'Actions for assault and battery, or false imprisonment, or other damage to the person.' But it is very manifest that the conspiracy in question inflicted no injury or damage to the person of the plaintiff. The acts alleged were unlawful and injured his business, and gave him a right of action for damages, but such damages were in no sense 'damage to the person' of the plaintiff." In Jones v. Barmm, 217 Ill. 381, 75 N. E. 505, it was held that an action to recover for a malicious interference with business did not survive under a statute providing for the survival of actions "to recover damages for an injury to real or personal property." So in Young v. Aylesworth, 35 R. I. 259, 86 Atl. 555, it was held that an action for a conspiracy to deprive a person of the benefits of his membership in a fraternal order was not within a statute providing for the survival of "actions of trespass and trespass on the case for damages to the person or to real and personal estate." In Brackett v. Griswold, 103 N. Y. 425, 9 N. E. 438, under a statute discussed in the reported case it was said of an action brought inter alia for a conspiracy by a corporation and its officers to defraud a creditor by making a false report: "So far as the cause of action was for a conspiracy to cheat or defraud the intestate it was for an injury to a property right, and did not die with its owner."

v.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

South Carolina Supreme Court—April 23, 1914.

97 S. Car. 22; 80 S. E. 459.

Telegraphs and Telephones — Disclosing Contents of Message — Punitive Damages.

Proof of wilfulness is essential to the recovery of punitive damages against a telegraph company for the act of its agent in disclosing the contents of a message.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Ridgeland county: SHIPP, Judge.

Action for damages. H. Klugh Purdy, plaintiff, and Western Union Telegraph Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. New trial granted. Plaintiff appeals. AFFIRMED.

[22] This is an action brought by H. Klugh Purdy, plaintiff, against the defendant, Western Union Telegraph Co., for twenty-five hundred dollars punitive damages on account of an alleged wilful and wanton disclosure of the contents of a certain telegram sent plaintiff by the National Surety Co., with reference to its rates on the bond of certain public officers. The case went to the jury only on the question of punitive damages and the jury returned a verdict for eight hundred dollars.

A motion for new trial was made upon two grounds: first, because the verdict of the jury for eight hundred dollars is grossly excessive; and, second, because there was no evidence of wanton, wilful or intentional wrong on the part of defendant or its agents or any evidence which would warrant a verdict for punitive damages, and the evidence at most would support only a verdict for nominal damages.

The case was tried and the motion argued on May 16th, 1913, and on July 18th, 1913, Hon. S. W. G. Shipp, presiding Judge, filed an order granting the new trial upon the ground that there was no testimony warranting punitive damages.

From the order granting a new trial the plaintiff appeals.

L. A. Hutson for appellant.

Nelson, Nelson & Gettys for respondent.

[23] FRASER, J.—The appellant thus states his case:

"The testimony in this case shows that a telegram was sent from New York by the National Surety Company to H. Klugh Purdy, its agent at Ridgeland, S. C., reading as follows:

"Necessary to maintain manual rates on all public business." That H. Klugh Purdy was not in Ridgeland when the said message was received, but had instructed said agent at Ridgeland to forward said message to Verdery, S. C., which said agent did.

"That said agent delivered the above stated message to John P. Wise, who was agent for a competing bonding company, and to H. H. Porter without the consent of the sender or addressee and that the contents of said message was generally known in Ridgeland when the addressee was at Verdery, S. C., two hundred miles away.

"The only question in this appeal is whether his Honor erred in granting a new trial on the ground that there was a total absence of testimony to show wilfulness."

The Circuit Judge was right. There was a total absence of testimony to show wilfulness.

The appeal is dismissed.

NOTE.

Liability of Telegraph Company for Disclosure of Contents of Message.

A telegraph company acts at its peril if it divulges the contents of a message without the consent of either the sender or the addressee, as it is part of the company's undertaking, with respect to the transmission and subsequent handling of the message, that its contents shall not be disclosed to any unauthorized person. Barnes v. Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. 156 N. C. 150, 72 S. E. 78. A telegraph company incurs no liability for telephoning a message beyond the limits of its lines with the consent of the sendee. Barnes v. Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. supra; Hellams v. Western Union Tel. Co. 70 S. C. 83, 49 S. E. 12. But it was held in Barnes v. Western Union Tel. Co. 120 Fed. 550, that a case was made out for the jury where it appeared that a message was telephoned to an inn by the telegraph company's agent and was left in a place where people could see and read it, by reason of which publicity the sendee of the message lost a business opportunity.

The reported case holds that a new trial is properly granted to a telegraph company in a suit against it to recover for the disclosure of the contents of messages intrusted to it for transmission, where it appears that there was, in the trial court, an entire absence of testimony to show a wilful divulgence on the part of the company's agents.

It has been held that a person who must rely on his own acts of immorality to prove his damages in a suit to recover from a telegraph company for disclosing the contents of messages addressed to him is not entitled to any recovery. Western Union Tel. Co. v. McLaurin (Miss.) 66 So. 739, L.R.A. 1915C 487. The court in that case said: "The publication of the telegrams did not disclose the character of the sender. It was necessary for the plaintiff's case that he should disclose her business (if this is the proper word for this sort of traffic), in order that he might thereby show that he was injured. He could not 'open his case' without confessing his criminal intimacy with the courtesan, and it was his relations with the woman that brought about his shame—and it was this shame which produced the injury, or actual damages. It was wrong, of course, for the telegraph company to disclose the contents of the telegrams, but the disclosure would not and could not cause any actual injury to complainant, except for his own immoral practices. Leaving out of view the immorality of plaintiff, the wrongs of the company did not injure plaintiff. Without the aid of his immoral relations with the scarlet woman, he cannot show any injury to his self-respect. It thus appears that the courts will not entertain this action at all, although it may appear that the telegraph company has been guilty of a wanton disregard of its public duties. The state will not undertake to punish the wrong because the plaintiff who brings the controversy into court comes with unclean hands, and the court can enter no judgment except such judgment as will rid it of this entire litigation."

It has been held that where the disclosure was merely the thoughtless act of a telegraph operator, from the kindest of motives, in revealing a matter of public interest which would have become general property in a few hours after the divulgence complained of, the addressee was entitled to recover nominal damages only. Cocke v. Western Union Tel. Co. 84 Miss. 380, 36 So. 392.

In Matter of Renville, 46 App. Div. 37, 81 N. Y. S. 549, wherein a person sought to compel a telegraph company to connect a ticker in his office with its telegraph wires and to furnish him with quotations of transactions on the New York Stock Exchange the court in refusing to grant the petitioner's application said: "The information delivered to the respondents for transmission is a communication which the stock exchange wishes to transmit to the persons it designates and to no one else. I can see no reason why the stock exchange should be required to furnish the appellant with this information, which relates solely to its own business upon its own property, or why the respondents should be required to violate their agreement with the stock exchange and the law of this state, and furnish to the appellant information which had been communicated to the respondents by the stock exchange for a specific purpose and none other."

Western Union Tel. Co. v. Bierhaus, 8 Ind. App. 563, 36 N. E. 161, was an action to recover from a telegraph company a penalty of one hundred dollars for the disclosure of the contents of several telegraphic dispatches. The statute on which the suit was based provided, among other things, that the company should, on the usual terms, transmit the messages received "with impartiality and good faith, and in the order of time in which they are received, and shall in no manner discriminate in rates charged, or words or figures charged for, or manner or conditions of service between any of its patrons, but shall serve individuals, corporations and other telegraphic companies with impartiality." It was held that the action would not lie as there was no express provision in the statute which prohibited telegraph companies from divulging the contents of a message, and to disclose its contents had no necessary connection with its transmission, for transmission in good faith and with impartiality meant only the forwarding of the message, and the delivery thereof, accurately and without favor of preference. It should be noted in connection with that case that the suit was instituted under the statute quoted and not under another act which prohibited, in express terms, the disclosure of the contents of messages and which gave a remedy in damages to the party injured to the extent of the injury.

As to the effect of the obligation of secrecy imposed on telegraph companies as giving a privilege against the production of telegrams in evidence, see the note to Sotham v. Macomber, Ann. Cas. 1916C 694.

Defenses — Entrapment.

Accused, obtaining money by means of short weight of coke sold to prosecutor, was guilty of obtaining money by false pretenses, punishable by Revisal 1905, § 3432, though prosecutor testified that he had been suspecting that accused was selling short weight, and that he had to buy from him to find out whether that was true or not, and that he did not know positively that accused sold short weight until the coke had been weighed after paying the price.

Appeal from Superior Court, Rowan County. Long, Judge.

Criminal action. Salisbury Ice and Fuel Company convicted of false pretenses and appeals. Petition to review record and reconsider opinion. The facts are stated in the opinion. PETITION DISMISSED.

Linn & Linn for appellant.

Attorney-General Bickett, Assistant Attorney-General Calvert and A. H. Price for appellee.

[403] CLARK, C. J.—This is a petition to “review the record and reconsider the opinion filed in this case before certification to the lower court, on account of an alleged palpable oversight therein.” This is a criminal action in which the defendant is indicted for false pretense in obtaining money by means of short weight in coal. The petition to reconsider relies upon the evidence of the prosecutor, in that when he was asked, “Yet you [404] allowed the money to be paid the driver, thinking and feeling and knowing at the time that the ton of coke was at least 200 pounds short?” he answered, “To the best of my judgment.”

This Court has uniformly held that “a petition to rehear, or to grant a new trial for newly discovered testimony, cannot be entertained in this Court in criminal actions.” State v. Lilliston, 141 N. C. 864, 54 S. E. 427, which reviews and approves State v. Jones, 69 N. C. 16; State v. Starnes, 94 N. C. 982; State v. Gooch, 94 N. C. 1006; State v. Starnes, 97 N. C. 424, 2 S. E. 447; State v. Rowe, 98 N. C. 630, 4 S. E. 506; State v. Edwards, 126 N. C. 1055, 35 S. E. 540; State v. Council, 129 N. C. 511, 39 S. E. 814; State v. Register, 133 N. C. 746, 46 S. E. 21, and State v. Lilliston, has itself since been cited and followed in State v. Turner, 143 N. C. 643, 57 S. E. 158; State v. Arthur, 151 N. C. 654, 19 Ann. Cas. 505, 65 S. E. 758; Murdock v. Carolina, etc. R. Co. 159 N. C. 132, 74 S. E. 887.

But this differs from a petition to rehear in that it is a motion to reconsider the opinion before it is certified down. In the evidence cited by the petitioner the question is mistaken for the answer. The answer does not say that before the witness paid for the coal he knew that it was less than a ton, but merely that it was so “to the best of his judgment.” He further said in his evidence that he “had to buy from the defendant to find out whether it was or not (selling short weight).” He said he had been suspecting it all the time. Counsel for the defendant further asked the witness: “The very minute you looked at this coal that weighed 1,750 pounds, it was not necessary for you to take it to the scales?” To which the witness replied: “Yes, sir; to prove how many pounds; I had much rather have the weights than my judgment.” All this shows that while the witness strongly suspected the defendant of selling short, he did not know positively that this was so until he had tested the matter on the scales. In fact, it was impossible for him to know beforehand as to his own purchase. All he really knew was that he was offered a ton of coal by defendant for $5, that the coal was sent to him for a ton, and that he paid the $5, and on weighing it he found that it was 250 pounds short. He also testified to several other instances in which he had bought coal from defendant for other parties, and when it came it was short weight by the scales, and that he sent the coal on to his customers, adding enough of his own coal to make up the weight.

[405] The judge charged the jury: “A false pretense is a false representation of a subsisting fact, false within the knowledge of the person making the representation, calculated to deceive and intended to deceive, and which representation does deceive. . . . When this is made to appear—all these things are made to appear to the satisfaction of the jury and beyond a reasonable doubt—then the offense is what is called obtaining goods under false pretense.” There was evidence sufficient to submit the case on these points to the jury, and the charge was unexceptionable to the defendant in this respect.

While the charge included the expression “and did deceive,” the latter expression means only that the defendant, by means of the false representation, procured the article. Revised, 3432, requires merely that the person shall knowingly and designingly, by any false pretense whatsoever, obtain from any other person anything of value with intent to cheat. That section further provides that it is not necessary to allege an intent to defraud any particular person or any ownership of the thing of value obtained nor to prove an intent to defraud any particular person; “but it shall be sufficient to prove that the party accused did the act charged, with an intent to defraud,” and that amply appears in these sales made by defendant.

Nor was it different under the original English statute. In Rex v. Ady, 7 C. & P. 140, 32 E. C. L. 469, 32 E. C. L. 460, it was held: “If a party obtains money by false pretense, knowing it to be false at the time, it is no answer to show that the party from whom he obtained the money laid a plan to entrap him into the commission of the offense.”

This is followed by many cases in this country cited in the notes to State v. Littooy, 17 Ann. Cas. 292, which held: “It is no defense that the complaining witness solicited the defendant to perform the illegal operation charged in the bill with a view to having him prosecuted therefor." In the notes to that case, ib. 295-298, numerous decisions are cited as to different offenses, holding the above doctrine, among them Abortion, Counterfeiting, Disposing of bank notes with intent to defraud, False pretense, Selling obscene matter, and especially in Liquor Law violations, as to which it is held that "a person making an [406] unlawful sale of liquor is not excused from the consequences thereof because the sale was induced for the sole purpose of securing evidence to be used in prosecuting the seller," citing Borck v. State (Ala.) 39 So. 580; Evanston v. Myers, 172 Ill. 266, 50 N. E. 204; People v. Murphy, 93 Mich. 41, 52 N. W. 1042; People v. Rush, 113 Mich. 539, 71 N. W. 863; State v. Quinn, 94 Mo. App. 59, 67 S. W. 974, 170 Mo. 176, 70 S. W. 1117; State v. Lucas, 94 Mo. App. 117, 67 S. W. 971; Comrs. v. Backus, 29 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 33; State v. Smith, 152 N. C. 706, DeGraff v. State, 2 Okla. Crim 519, 103 Pac. 538; Tripp v. Flanigan, 10 R. I. 128.

Another offense as to which there have been many decisions to the above purport are prosecutions for using the mails illegally, in which it was held: "It is no defense that the mails were so used at the instance and solicitation of an officer of the Government." Grimm v. U. S. 156 U. S. 604, 15 S. Ct. 470, 39 U. S. (L. ed.) 550; Rosen v. U. S. 161 U. S. 29, 16 S. Ct. 434, 480, 40 U. S. (L. ed.) 606; Andrews v. U. S. 162, U. S. 420, 16 S. Ct. 798, 40 U. S. (L. ed.) 1023; Price v. U. S. 165 U. S. 311, 17 S. Ct. 366, 41 U. S. (L. ed.) 727; U. S. v. Duff, 6 Fed. 45; Bates v. U. S. 10 Fed. 99; U. S. v. Moore, 19 Fed. 39.

In Onondaga County v. Backus, 29 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 33, which was an action for a penalty for an unlawful sale of liquor, the Court said: "The mode adopted by the plaintiff to bring to light the malfeasance of the defendant had no necessary connection with his violation of law. He exercised his own volition independent of all outside influence or control. Even if inducements to commit crime could be assumed to exist in this case, the allegation of the defendant would be but the repetition of the plea as ancient as the world and first interposed in Paradise: 'The serpent beguiled me and I did eat.' That defense was overruled by the great Lawgiver, and whatever estimate we may form, or whatever judgment we may pass, upon the character or conduct of the tempter, this plea has never since availed to shield crime or give indemnity to the culprit, and it is safe to say that under any code of civilized, not to say Christian, ethics it never will."

There are some offenses, as, for instance, larceny and burglary, in which it is held that if the act is committed with the consent of the owner the perpetrator cannot be convicted; but that is because it is no offense unless the act is done against the [407] owner's consent. The difference between the cases like this and those cases in which the defense can be set up that the prosecuting witness was consenting to the act seems to be that where the owner of the property procures the offense to be committed and seduces or influences the perpetrator to do the act, then he cannot complain. But where the offender commits the act of his own volition, and an officer, or other party, suspecting that the crime is being committed, sets a trap, as furnishing money to buy whiskey that is being sold illegally, or, as in this case, bargains for an article which on being weighed proves to be short weight, or sends decoy letters through the mail to "trap" a person who is suspected of using the mails illegally, and in like cases, such conduct does not procure the offense to be committed, but the offender acts of his own volition, and is simply caught in his own devices.

In any aspect of the case, therefore, we see no reason to reverse our former decision.

Petition dismissed.

Introductory.

The present note discusses the recent cases treating of the question whether it is a defense to a criminal prosecution that the accused was induced to commit the offense by one intending to prosecute him therefor. The earlier cases on this point are collected in the notes to State v. Littoy, 17 Ann. Cas. 292, and State v. Hull, 72 Am. St. Rep. 694.

Bribery.

It has been held that an inducement to accept a bribe offered by a person seeking to estop the accused with a view to a prosec-cution is no defense to a person prosecuted for bribery. State v. Dougherty, 86 N. J. L. 525, 93 Atl. 98; Davis v. State, 70 Tex. Crim. 524, 158 S. W. 288. See also People v. Bock, 69 Misc. 543, 125 N. Y. S. 301. Thus in the case first cited, it was said: "The principle evolved from the cases appears to be that in a prosecution for an offense against the public welfare, such as accepting a bribe, the defense of entrapment cannot be successfully interposed." And in Com. v. Wasson, 42 Pa. Super. Ct. 38, wherein it appears that at the solicitation and inducement of a detective certain public officials conspired to accept a bribe, the court said: "If there is any ground upon which the facts as to the part the detectives took in the formation of the conspiracy can be held to be a defense, it is upon the ground of public policy, and it is strenuously contended that an acquittal should have been directed for that reason. In general, one who has committed a criminal act is not entitled to be shielded from its consequence merely because he was induced to do so by another. There has been much discussion in the courts of this country and by the text-writers as to the relation of detectives to crime, and many of their methods have been severely denounced. A few exceptional cases can be found where upon grounds of public policy the courts have refused to sustain convictions because of the abhorrent methods adopted to lure the accused into crime. Upon the other hand there are many cases wherein the courts, while in some instances condemning the methods employed by the detectives, have sustained the convictions, although the particular crime charged would not have been committed had it not been for the deceptions or subterfuges or the suppression of the truth resorted to by the detective." That case was decided on the ground that the defendants had been suspected of the commission of accepting bribes on various occasions prior to the entrapment.

Burglary.

The rule that a person who has been induced to commit a burglary by the owner or some one representing the owner of the premises, to the end that he may be entrapped and apprehended, may set up as a defense the entrapment has been affirmed in a recent case. Adams v. State (Ala.) 69 So. 357, wherein the court said: "This evidence clearly shows that the act here made the basis of this prosecution was conceived by Dr. Saunders, and by his agent and under his instructions suggested to the accused. The rule as to cases of entrapment as to offenses against property is thus stated: 'The fact that decoys were set, or traps laid, by means of which a person was detected in the perpetration of a crime, cannot be set up as a defense to the prosecution therefor, where the crime was conceived by the accused, and not suggested by the prosecuting witness or those acting for him duly authorized in the premises.' 1 Wharton, Criminal Law (11th ed.) § 389. Referring to the above-quoted section, this author further says: 'The law in relation to entrapment in crime has already been fully discussed, and the principles there stated apply in a prosecution for burglary the same as in prosecutions for other crime [against property]. The fact that the owner of a building having knowledge of a contemplated burglary therein, remains silent and presumably permitted entry into the building for the purpose of arresting the intruder does not constitute a consent to the act, and will not furnish a defense to the prosecution therefor, for the reason that it in no wise affects the guilt of the accused. . . . Owner persuading a person to enter building and take his property constitutes a consent to such entry and taking, and for that reason is a complete defense in a prosecution for the act charged as burglary.' . . . And the same rule applies if the occupant of the building suggests and induces the act, through his agent."

In State v. Goffney, 157 N. C. 624, 73 S. E. 162, wherein it appeared that an owner of a building, through a servant, induced the defendant to break into his store, and that the servant and the defendant entered the store together, it was held that the crime of breaking and entering was not committed because of the proprietor's consent. The court said: "There is no burglary where the occupant of a house, or his servant or agent by his direction, or a public officer or detective with his consent . . . takes active steps to aid the suspect or to induce him to enter, although this may be done for the purpose of apprehending and prosecuting him, and although he may intend to commit a felony in the house. . . . In the case at bar the owner himself gave permission for the defendant to enter, which destroyed the criminal feature and made the entry a lawful one."

False Pretenses.

The reported case announces the rule that an inducement to commit the crime of obtaining goods by false pretenses is no defense to a person accepting such inducement and engaging in the commission of the crime. That case, it may be pointed out, is not as far reaching as some others on this question. The crime was not initiated or proposed by the prosecuting officer, but he merely furnished the opportunity. In Missouri, etc. R. Co. v. McCrary, 182 Fed. 401, the fact that decoys were used to entrap ticket scalpers, long under suspicion, was declared to be no defense.

Immigration Offense.

In Woo Wai v. U. S. 223 Fed. 412, 137 C. A. 604, it appeared that certain government officers persuaded and induced the defendant to commit the crime of bringing Chinamen across the Mexican border, not for the purpose of punishing the defendant for the crime, but for the purpose of forcing the defendant to reveal certain information concerning other violations of the immigration laws. The entrapment was held to be a good defense, the court saying: "We are of the opinion that it is against public policy to sustain a conviction obtained in the manner which is disclosed by the evidence in this case, taking the testimony of the defendants to be true, and that a sound public policy can be upheld only by denying the criminality of those who are thus induced to commit acts which infringe the letter of the criminal statutes. Some of the courts have gone far in sustaining conviction of crimes induced by detectives and by state officers. This is notably so of the decision in People v. Mills, 178 N. Y. 274, 70 N. E. 786, 67 L.R.A. 131. But it is to be said, by way of distinguishing such cases from the case at bar, that in all of those cases the criminal intention to commit the offense had its origin in the mind of the defendant. Thus in People v. Mills, it was the defendant who made the first suggestion looking toward the commission of the criminal act, and for the commission of that act the district attorney furnished him opportunity and lent him aid. In the case at bar, the suggestion of the criminal act came from the officers of the government. The whole scheme originated with them."

Larceny.

For a discussion of the question whether an inducement to commit larceny is a defense to a prosecution therefor, see the notes to Rex v. Ryan, 4 Ann. Cas. 875, and Topolewski v. State, 10 Ann. Cas. 627.

Liquor Law Violation.

The general rule that a person making an unlawful sale of liquor is not excused from the consequences thereof because the sale is induced for the sole purpose of securing evidence to be used in prosecuting the seller has found support in the following recent cases. Swope v. State, 12 Ala. App. 297, 68 So. 562; State v. Spiker, 88 Kan. 644, 129 Pac. 195; State v. Feldman, 150 Mo. App. 120, 129 S. W. 998; State v. Richie (Mo.) 180 S. W. 2; State v. Hopkins, 154 N. C. 622, 79 S. E. 394; Caviness v. State, 3 Okla. Crim. 729,

109 Pac. 125; Stack v. State, 4 Okla. Crim. 1, 109 Pac. 128; Moss v. State, 4 Okla. Crim. 247, 111 Pac. 950; Cunningham v. State, 4 Okla. Crim. XIII, 111 Pac. 959. Compare Smith v. State, 61 Tex. Crim. 328, 135 S. W. 154; Scott v. State, 70 Tex. Crim. 57, 153 S. W. 871; Salt Lake City v. Robinson, 40 Utah 448, 125 Pac. 657. In Swope v. State, supra, it was said: "As to the second contention, we may say that we know of no rule of law, and are cited to none, which exempts a defendant in this kind of case from the consequences of his crime simply because another may have induced him to commit it, when that inducement does not amount to duress. Of course, in cases of larceny and the like, there can be no crime where the owner of the property taken consents to its taking or it is done by his procurement for ulterior purposes (18 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law [2d ed.] 471); but the principle upon which that doctrine is rested has no application to the character of crime here involved, which is not one against property rights."

But in Scott v. State, 70 Tex. Crim. 57, 153 S. W. 871, it was maintained that an inducement by an officer to commit such a crime was unjustifiable. The court said: "The writer has had occasion heretofore to criticize the character and manner of inducing men to commit crime as is evidenced by this record. This witness testifies, and is not uncontroverted, or contradicted, that the sheriff agreed to give him $10 for each case he would 'turn in' and additional money or compensation if a conviction should occur. The officers are not justified in inducing men to commit crime or in employing others to induce them to commit crime in order that prosecutions may be instituted. It is his duty as an officer, where he understands that parties are engaged in crime, to use every effort legitimate and permissible by law to detect and ferret out crimes and bring criminals to trial and justice. But this does not justify him in employing parties to go out and induce the citizens to commit crime that prosecutions may be instituted and carried on. We here call the attention of the legislature to such matters and would suggest that appropriate legislation be enacted to prevent matters of this sort occurring." And in U. S. v. Healy, 202 Fed. 349, it was held that a government officer, an Indian whose outward appearance gave no indication that he was an Indian, who induced the defendant to sell liquor to him, thereby violating the regulation prohibiting the selling of liquor to an Indian, was not justified in this ruse, and that the defendant was not bound to know that the government employee was an Indian. The court said: "Deceits are permissible to entrap criminals, but not to create them; to present opportunity to those having intent to or willing to commit crime, but not to ensnare the law-abiding in unconscious offending. Where a statute, as here, makes an act a crime regardless of the actor's intent or knowledge, ignorance of fact is no excuse if the act be done voluntarily; but when done upon solicitation by the government's instrument to that end ignorance of fact stamps the act as, involuntary, and excuses, or at least estops the government from a conviction. In the former case the actor is bound to know the facts, and acts at his peril. In the latter case he is relieved of the obligation by the government's invitation, which is of the nature of fraudulent concealment and deceit, and, if not consent, yet doth work an estoppel. Though the seller has violated the statute, he was the passive instrument of the government, and his is a blameless wrong for which he cannot be justly convicted." And in Smith v. State, 61 Tex. Crim. 328, 135 S. W. 154, the investigation of offenses against the liquor law for the purpose of prosecution was severely criticized. The court said: "This manner of instituting prosecutions against the citizenship of the state and inducing them to commit crime is to be deplored. While it is eminently proper that officers should be diligent in ferreting out crime and violations of the law, yet it does not occur to us that the theory of our law is predicated upon the idea that parties should be induced to violate the law in order that a prosecution may be brought about. The machinery of the state should be put into operation to detect and punish crime, but not to organize and institute it. The prevention of crime is one of the main purposes of our law, not its encouragement or propagation."

Malpractice of Medicine.

It has been held that a physician or druggist who at the solicitation of a person intending to commence a criminal prosecution, has sold or prescribed for that person in violation of the statute, cannot set up as a defense the fact that he was induced to violate the law for the very purpose of prosecution. Niswonger v. State, 179 Ind. 653, 102 N. E. 135, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1. So in Hyde v. State, 131 Tenn. 256, 174 S.W. 1127, wherein it appeared that a physician at the solicitation of a government officer gave a prescription for morphine in violation of the statute, the defense that the offense was induced by the government agent was declared to be unavailing. The court said: "May the physician successfully defend by proving that the prescription was caused to be issued and the sale to be made by means of the solicitation of an agent of a department of the state government, for the purposes of a criminal prosecution? Whatever may have been the trend of the earlier authorities, it is now a well-established rule that such acts of government agent do not absolve the defendant's act of criminality."

Manufacture of Explosives.

In Koscak v. State, 160 Wis. 255, 152 N. W. 181, wherein it appeared that the defendant was prosecuted for the violation of a statute regulating the manufacture and use of explosives it was held that the act of a detective or other person in originating and instigating the commission of the crime constituted a good defense for the accused. The court said: "The statement in State v. Currie, 18 N. D. 655, 102 N. W. 875, is a just rule to govern persons engaged in such transactions: 'The authorities almost unanimously hold that a detective may aid in the commission of an offense in conjunction with a criminal, and that the fact will not exonerate the guilty party. Mere deception by the detective will not shield the defendant, if the offense be committed by him free from the influence or instigation of the detective. The detective must not prompt or urge or lead in the commission of the offense.' This rule is approved in the adjudications of different courts as a proper one in the administration of the criminal law. The question was a proper one for the consideration of the jury under the evidentiary facts and circumstances adduced on the trial and the court's attention was directed thereto by the defendant's requested instruction. True the court informed the jury that they must be satisfied affirmatively that defendant intended to and did the acts required under the instructions given to constitute guilt, but the jury were not informed that if the detectives prompted, urged, or originated the perpetration of these offenses, or that they intimidated the defendant and thereby became the active parties to instigate and perpetrate the offense charged, and that defendant under the facts and circumstances of the case was only a passive participant in the crime charged, then he was not guilty."

Postal Law Violation.

Recent cases have sustained the general rule that in a prosecution for using the mails for the purpose of sending obscene matter or information concerning lotteries, it is no defense that the mails were so used at the instance and solicitation of an officer of the government. In Ackley v. U. S. 200 Fed. 217, 118 C. C. A. 403, it appeared that decoy letters were used by a government official for the purpose of catching a physician suspected of illegally using the mails. That fact was held to be no bar to the defendant's prosecution. And in Kemp v. U. S. 41 App. Cas. (D. C.) 539, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) 825, wherein it appeared that a decoy letter was sent to a physician, for the purpose of discovering whether he violated the postal regulations, the court held that the defense of inducement could not be set up, saying: "The motive, however, of the writer of the decoy letter is not important. The letter was admissible on its face, irrespective of the motive of the writer. It was not such an inducement to commit crime as the law condemns. It left the way open to defendant, either by ignoring it or by answering it, to disclose that he was not conducting the sort of unlawful business in which he was requested by its express terms to engage. It was optional with him either to act the part of an honest man or the part of a criminal. Without any influence from anyone he chose the latter course. He is estopped to complain when he is confronted with the trap into which he knowingly and voluntarily stepped. 'Even if inducements to commit crime could be assumed to exist in this case, the allegation of the defendant would be but the repetition of the plea as ancient as the world, and first interposed in Paradise: "The serpent beguiled me and I did eat." That defense was overruled by the great Lawgiver, and whatever estimate we may form, or whatever judgment pass upon the character or conduct of the tempter, this plea has never since availed to shield crime or give indemnity to the culprit, and it is safe to say that under any code of civilized, not to say Christian ethics, it never will.'" But in Goldman v. U. S. 220 Fed. 57, 135 C. C. A. 625, affirming 207 Fed. 1002, it appeared that a government inspector in order to detect the defendant who had been suspected of misusing the mail, answered an advertisement by the defendant and succeeded in getting sufficient evidence to support a prosecution against the defendant. The court sustained the conduct of the government agent, but intimated that if the agent's conduct had been to induce rather than to detect a crime already planned the conduct would not be justified, saying: "The evidence tends to justify the course taken by the post office officials; in other words, it seems to have been an effort to detect, and not to induce commission of, a crime."

Prostitution.

In People v. Moore, 142 App. Div. 402, 127 N. Y. S. 98, affirmed 201 N. Y. 570, 95 N. E. 1136, it was held that a person prosecuted for providing inmates for houses of prostitution could not set up in defense that the commission of the offense was induced by persons intending to prosecute.

Pure Food and Drug Act Offense.

In U. S. v. Morgan, 181 Fed. 587 (reversed 222 U. S. 274, 32 S. Ct. 81, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 198, on other grounds), a prosecution for a violation of the pure food and drug act, the fact that the defendant was induced to act by a person intending to prosecute him was declared to be immaterial.

Selling Obscene Matter.

It has been held to be no defense to a prosecution for selling obscene matter that the purchase which formed the basis for the prosecution was made by a person for the express purpose of prosecution. Hanish v. U. S. 227 Fed. 584. In that case it appeared that the defendant in response to decoy letters sent by a government inspector shipped certain obscene books in violation of the Interstate Commerce Act. The court said: "Another assignment of error raises the question whether the fact that the alleged offenses were committed at the instance of government officials, through decoy letters asking that the obscene book be sent to a fictitious person, excuses the offender. The system of detecting crime by the use of decoy letters, or decoy witnesses, is necessary to the proper administration of criminal justice, and is in quite general use. It does not of itself excuse the offender, unless a constituent element of the crime be thereby removed. In cases of larceny, if the owner of the property, through a decoy, consents to the taking of the property by the accused, the element of trespass or tortious taking, essential to the offense of larceny, is absent, as explained in Love v. People, 160 Ill. 501, 43 N. E. 710, 32 L.R.A. 139, and Topolewski v. State, 130 Wis. 244, 253, 109 N. W. 1037, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 756, 118 Am. St. Rep. 1019, 10 Ann. Cas. 627. In the case at bar, however, although defendant sent the books pursuant to the decoy letters, and sent them to a fictitious person, yet the gist of the offense still remained, which was the abuse of interstate commerce facilities to carry his obscene books."

v.

CITY OF PORTLAND.

Constitutional Law — Scope of Legislative Power.

Under Const. art. 4, pt. 3, § 1, giving the legislature full power to make and establish all reasonable laws and regulations for the defense and benefit of the people of the state not repugnant to the Constitution, the powers of the legislature are absolute, except as limited by the Constitution.

Presumption in Favor of Statute.

Unless an act is clearly and beyond all rational doubt in conflict with the constitution, it will not be so declared; all reasonable doubts will be resolved in favor of its constitutionality.

Municipal Corporations — Sale of Fuel to Inhabitants.

Rev. St. c. 4, § 87 (Laws 1903, c. 122), authorizing and empowering any city or town to establish and maintain a permanent wood, coal, and fuel yard, for the purpose of selling, at cost, wood, coal, and fuel to its inhabitants, is not unconstitutional, it being a public use for which taxation is permissible, since the furnishing of fuel to its citizens is a matter of public necessity, convenience, or welfare with which it is difficult for the citizens to provide themselves, due to the existence of monopolistic combinations.

[See note at end of this case.]

Courts — Opinions as Authority — Advisory Opinion.

An advisory opinion given by the justices of the Supreme Court to the legislature is not the exercise of a judicial function, and has not the quality of judicial authority.

Municipal Corporations — Encroachment on Private Enterprise.

The principle that municipalities can neither invade private liberty nor encroach upon the field of private enterprise should be strictly maintained, as it is one of the main foundations of our prosperity and success.

On report from Supreme Judicial Court, Cumberland county.

Action for injunction. Alexander T. Laughlin et al., plaintiffs, and City of Portland, defendant. Case reported to Law Court. The facts are stated in the opinion. DISMISSED.

Eben Winthrop Freeman for plaintiffs.

James H. McCann for defendant.

[487] CORNISH, J.—The Legislature of Maine in 1903 enacted the following law: "Any city or town is hereby authorized and empowered to establish and maintain within its limits, a permanent wood, coal and fuel yard, for the purpose of selling, at cost, wood, coal and [488] fuel to its inhabitants. The term 'at cost' as used herein, shall be construed as meaning without financial profit." Pub. L. 1903, c. 122, R. S. ch. 4, sec. 87.

At the municipal election held in the City of Portland on December 2, 1912, the question of establishing and maintaining a fuel yard under the terms of the above act was submitted to the voters and a majority vote was cast in favor of the proposition. On February 3, 1913, both branches of the city council passed a resolution in favor of the same proposition and on February 4, 1913, this resolution was duly approved by the mayor and became effective. At the same time a special committee was appointed, consisting of the mayor, two aldermen and three councilmen "to investigate and obtain full information as to the cost of plant, machinery, rolling stock, and things whatsoever necessary to the establishment and maintaining a Municipal Fuel Yard, and carrying on the business thereof, including sources from which fuel can be purchased, and prices to be paid therefor, with the duty of furnishing a full report of their findings to the City Council; and for the purpose of defraying the expense of said committee, the sum of $1,000 is hereby appropriated, the sum to be charged to special appropriation when made."

On February 4, 1913, this bill in equity was brought by fifteen taxable inhabitants of Portland, asking that the city and its officers and agents be restrained and enjoined from establishing a municipal fuel yard, from raising by taxation the money necessary for that purpose and from carrying into effect any of the votes before recited. The defendant demurred to the bill and the demurrer being joined, the case is before the Law Court on report.

The important question is therefore sharply raised, whether this court must declare unconstitutional this act of the Legislature of 1903. It is not a question whether under the general statutory powers a municipality has the right to take this step, a question that has arisen in many cases, but whether such municipality can exercise the right when conferred upon it by the Legislature in clear and unambiguous terms. In other words, is this court obliged to declare, as the plaintiffs ask us, that this act is so obviously beyond the realm of constitutional legislative action that it must be declared void.

[489] Before considering the main issue it is necessary to restate certain familiar and yet fundamental propositions that lie at the very basis of our inquiry.

First. The Legislature has, under the constitution, "full power to make and establish all reasonable laws and regulations for the defense and benefit of the people of this State, not repugnant to this Constitution, nor that of the United States." Const. of Maine, Art. IV, Part III, sec. 1. While, therefore, the executive and the judiciary, the other two coordinate departments of government, can exercise only the powers conferred upon them by the Constitution, the powers of the Legislature are, broadly speaking, absolute, except as limited or restricted by the Constitution.

"As to the executive and judiciary, the constitution measures the extent of their authority, as to the legislature it measures the limitations upon its authority." Sawyer v. Gilmore, 109 Me. 169, 93 Atl. 673.

Second. The court is bound to assume that, in the passage of any law, the Legislature acted with full knowledge of all constitutional restrictions and intelligently, honestly and discriminately decided that they were acting within their constitutional limits and powers. That determination is not to be lightly set aside. It is not enough that the court be of the opinion that had the question been originally submitted to it for decision it might have held the contrary view. The question has been submitted in the first instance to the tribunal designated by the Constitution, the Legislature, and its decision is not to be overturned by the court unless no room is left for rational doubt. All honest and reasonable doubts are to be solved in favor of the constitutionality of the act. This healthy doctrine is recognized as the settled policy of this court. State v. Doherty, 60 Me. 504; State v. Pooler, 105 Me. 224, 74 Atl. 119, 134 Am. St. Rep. 543, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 408. "The power of the judicial department of the government to prevent the enforcement of a legislative enactment by declaring it unconstitutional and void is attended with responsibilities so grave that its exercise is properly confined to statutes that are clearly and conclusively shown to be in conflict with the organic law. It is the duty of one department to presume that another has acted within its legitimate province until the contrary is made to appear by strong and convincing reasons." State v. Rogers, 95 Me. 94, 49 Atl. 564, 85 Am. St. Rep. 395.

[490] "In determining the constitutionality of any legislation, all reasonable presumptions are in favor of its validity and the courts will not declare an act of the legislature to be invalid because contrary to the provisions of the organic law unless clearly so. . . . And this is as true respecting legislative enactments by which the power to exercise the right of eminent domain is delegated as in regard to any other species of legislation. The determination by the legislature that the use for which property is authorized to be taken is a public one, is, undoubtedly, subject to review by the court, but all reasonable presumptions are in favor of the validity of such determinations by the legislature, and the act must be regarded as valid unless it can be clearly shown to be in conflict with the constitution." Ulmer v. Lime Rock R. Co. 98 Me. 579, 57 Atl. 1001, 66 L.R.A. 387.

With these principles conceded the precise question before the court is seen to be, whether the act in question, having been passed by the Legislature conformably with what it deemed to be an exercise of its constitutional power, can be set aside by this court as invalid on the ground that it palpably and unquestionably transcends that power. We are unable to go to that extent.

The main ground of attack is that the maintenance of what, in general terms, may be called a municipal fuel yard is not a public use, and as the power of taxation is confined to public purposes, the authority conferred by this act cannot be constitutionally exercised.

The Constitution of Maine, Art. II, sec. 21, provides that "private property shall not be taken for public uses without just compensation, nor unless the public exigencies require it." The power of taxation is akin to the right of eminent domain, because it rests upon the right of the sovereign power to appropriate the private property of its citizens to public purposes. Therefore the power of taxation must rest upon two elements in order to be permitted by the Constitution, first a public use and second a public exigency, the first to be determined, in the first instance, by the Legislature and finally by the court, if cases are brought before it raising the question, and with the limitations before referred to, and the second to be determined by the Legislature without judicial revision. Brown v. Gerald, 100 Me. 351, 61 Atl. 785, 109 Am. St. Rep. 526, 70 L.R.A. 472; Hayford v. Bangor, 102 Me. 340, 66 Atl. 731, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 940.

[491] Did then the Legislature transcend its constitutional powers when it authorized municipalities to make provision for supplying heat to its citizens? In so doing, was it clearly and unquestionably diverting the power of taxation from a public to a private purpose?

This leads us to consider what is meant by the term "public use," as employed in connection with the power to tax.

The exact line of cleavage between what is, and what is not, a public use, it is somewhat difficult to mark. Some purposes readily align themselves on one side of the line as being clearly public in their nature, while others as readily fall on the other side as being obviously private, and there is a debatable ground between the two. Thus the support of schools, the relief of paupers and the maintenance of highways are clearly public uses for which taxation is permissible and it has also been held that the maintenance of a public clock, Willard v. Newburyport, 12 Pick. (Mass.) 227; the purchase of a fire engine, Allen v. Taunton, 19 Pick. (Mass.) 485; the erection of a market house, Spaulding v. Lowell, 23 Pick. (Mass.) 71; the building of a memorial hall, Kingman v. Brockton, 153 Mass. 255, 26 N. E. 998, 11

L.R.A. 123; the aid of a railroad, Augusta Bank v. Augusta, 49 Me. 507; Dyar v. Farmington Village Corp. 70 Me. 515, all come within the scope of the same term.

On the other hand taxes cannot be imposed to aid a private enterprise, and a municipality cannot assist individuals or corporations to establish or carry on such business, either directly or indirectly, nor can it engage in such business itself. Opinion of Justices, 58 Me. 590; Allen v. Jay, 60 Me. 124, 11 Am. Rep. 185; Citizens' Sav. etc. Assoc. v. Topeka, 20 Wall 655, 22 U. S. (L. ed.) 455; Parkersburg v. Brown, 106 U. S. 487, 1 S. Ct. 442, 27 U. S. (L. ed.) 238; In re Opinion of Justices, 204 Mass. 607, 91 N. E. 405, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 483. If the direct object is private, the indirect benefits that may result to the public, even in a large measure, are unavailing to remedy the vital defect. Lowell v. Boston, 111 Mass. 454, 15 Am. Rep. 39; In re Opinion of Justices, 211 Mass. 626; Brown v. Gerald, 100 Me. 351, 109 Am. St. Rep. 526, 70 L.R.A. 472.

The courts have never attempted to lay down with minute detail an inexorable rule distinguishing public from private purposes because it would be impossible to do so. Times change. The wants and necessities of the people change. The opportunity to satisfy those wants and necessities by individual effort may vary. What was clearly a public use a century ago, may, because of changed conditions, have ceased to be such today. Thus the mill act which [492] came into being in the early days of our parent Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and was adopted by our own State, was upheld as constitutional because of the necessities of those primitive times. The court in later days have strongly intimated that were it an original question it might be difficult to sustain it in view of present industrial conditions, Murdock v. Stickney, 8 Cush. (Mass.) 113; Salisbury Mills v. Forsaith, 57 N. H. 124; Jordan v. Woodward, 40 Me. 317.

On the other hand, what could not be deemed a public use a century ago, may, because of changed economic and industrial conditions, be such today. Laws which were entirely adequate to secure public welfare then may be inadequate to accomplish the same results now. As was said in Sun Printing, etc. Assoc. v. New York, 8 App. Div. 230, 40 N. Y. S. 607, affirmed in 162 N. Y. 257, 46 N. E. 499, 37 L.R.A. 788: "The true test is that which requires that the work shall be essentially public and for the general good of all the inhabitants of the city. It must not be undertaken merely for gain or for private objects; gain or loss may incidentally follow but the purpose must be primarily to satisfy the need or contribute to the convenience of the city at large. Within that sphere of action novelty should impose no veto. Should some inventive genius by and by create a system for supplying us with pure air, will the representatives of the people be powerless to utilize it in the great cities of the state, however extreme the want or dangerous the delay? Will it then be said that pure air is not so important as pure water and clear light; we apprehend not."

Thus a class of public uses has grown up and been recognized within a comparatively recent time, due both to the growing needs of the community and to modern inventions calculated to meet those needs, that furnish in our judgment a logical precedent for the case at bar. These public uses or utilities, embrace water, light and heat. It is common knowledge that in the early days our citizens, even in the more populous towns and cities, obtained their water supply from private wells and cisterns. There was no public supply other than perhaps the town pump in the village square. But in course of time the private sources became both inadequate in quantity and hazardous in quality and private water companies were chartered to meet the changed demands, one of the earliest to do business on [493] a large scale being the Portland Water Company, chartered in 1866, Priv. and Spec. L. 1866, ch. 159. The purpose of these companies is admittedly public, Portland v. Portland Water Co. 67 Me. 136; Riche v. Bar Harbor Water Co. 75 Me. 91; Hamor v. Bar Harbor Water Co. 78 Me. 127, 3 Atl. 40. "The supply of a large number of inhabitants with pure water is a public purpose," says Shaw, C. J., in Lumbard v. Stearns, 4 Cush. (Mass.) 60.

Later the municipalities in which some of these water companies were established were given the right by the Legislature to take over and maintain these plants, or municipal water districts were formed to accomplish the same purpose. The compensation for those plants was raised by taxation or by loan, and again the purpose is obviously public, Auburn v. Union Water Power Co. 90 Me. 576, 38 Atl. 561, 38 L.R.A. 198; Mayo v. Dover, etc. Village F. Co. 96 Me. 539, 63 Atl. 62; Kennebec Water Dist. v. Waterville, 97 Me. 185, 54 Atl. 6, 60 L.R.A. 856; Brunswick, etc. Water Dist. v. Maine Water Co. 99 Maine 371, 59 Atl. 537; Augusta v. Augusta Water Dist. 101 Me. 143, 63 Atl. 663.

Conditions as to lighting met with similar changes. Candles, lamps, gas and electricity have followed each other in due course of time. As late as 1890, a doubt seems to have arisen in Massachusetts as to the constitutional power of municipalities in respect to public and private lighting and the House of Representatives of that year submitted to the Justices of the Supreme Judicial Court two questions, first, whether the Legislature had the power under the Constitution to authorize the cities and towns within the commonwealth to manufacture and distribute gas or electric light for use in their public streets and buildings and second for the purpose of selling the same to its own citizens. These questions were both answered unanimously in the affirmative. The justices in the course of their opinion say that "the extent of the right of taxation is not necessarily to be measured by that of the right of eminent domain, but the rights are analogous." So far as the lighting of the public buildings and streets are concerned the court held that it was an incident of their maintenance and tended both to common convenience and common necessity, and then these significant words are added "If the legislature can authorize cities and towns to light their streets and public buildings, it can authorize them to do this by any appropriate [494] means which it may think expedient." In holding the supply to individuals to also be a public purpose, after discussing the question of water companies the justices say: "Artificial light is not, perhaps, so absolutely necessary as water, but it is necessary for the comfortable living of every person. Although artificial light can be supplied in other ways than by the use of gas or electricity, yet the use of one or both for lighting cities and thickly settled towns is common, and has been found to be of great convenience and it is practically impossible for every individual to manufacture gas or electricity for himself. If gas or electricity is to be generally used in a city or town, it must be furnished by private companies or by the municipality, and it cannot be distributed without the use of the public streets or the exercise of the right of eminent domain. It is not necessarily an objection to a public work maintained by a city or town, that it incidentally benefits some individuals more than others, or that from the place of residence or for other reasons every inhabitant of the city or town cannot use it, if every inhabitant who is so situated that he can use it has the same right to use it as the other inhabitants. It must often be a question of kind and degree whether the promotion of the interests of many individuals in the same community constitutes a public service or not. But in general it may be said that matters which concern the welfare and convenience of all the inhabitants of a city or town, and cannot be successfully dealt with without the aid of powers derived from the Legislature, may be subjected to municipal control when the benefits received are such that each inhabitant needs them and may participate in them, and it is for the interest of each inhabitant that others as well as himself should possess and enjoy them. If the Legislature is of the opinion that the common convenience and welfare of the inhabitants of cities or towns will be promoted by conferring upon the municipalities the power of manufacturing and distributing gas or electricity for the purpose of furnishing light to their inhabitants, we think the Legislature can confer the power. We therefore answer the second question in the affirmative."

Following the reasoning of the Massachusetts court, if the lighting of private residences and buildings is a public purpose and one [495] which the municipality can legitimately carry on, the heating of the same buildings is equally public. It is even a greater necessity. Gas and electric lights are in the nature of luxuries, but heat is indispensable. In the regions supplied with natural gas, municipal heating from that source has been adopted, and has been held to be constitutional. State v. Toledo, 48 Ohio St. 112, 26 N. E. 1061, 11 L.R.A. 729.

The reasoning of the court is as follows: "Heat being an agent or principle indispensable to the health, comfort and convenience of every inhabitant of our cities, we do not see why, through the medium of natural gas, it may not be as much a public service to furnish it to the citizens as to furnish water. . . . It is sufficient 'if every inhabitant who is so situated that he can use it has the same right to use it as the other inhabitants.' . . . The establishment of natural gas works by municipal corporations, with the imposition of taxes to pay the cost thereof, may be a new object of municipal policy, but in deciding whether in a given case the object for which taxes are assessed is a public or private purpose, we cannot leave out of view the progress of society, the change of manners and customs, and the development and growth of new wants, natural and artificial, which may from time to time call for a new exercise of legislative power. And in deciding whether such taxes shall be levied for the new purposes that have arisen, we should not, we think, be bound by an inexorable rule that would embrace only those objects for which taxes have been customarily and by long course of legislation levied."

If, then, science had advanced so far that the heating as well as the lighting of houses by electricity, were now a practicable method, there would seem to be no doubt that this also would fall within the realm of public purposes. The heat would be conducted from the central power station by means of wires along or under the public streets, the same as light is now. Or suppose it were practicable to install a central heating plant and conduct the heat through pipes in the streets to the various buildings, much the same as water or gas is now conducted, we see no reason why this too should not be called a public use.

Just here, however, the petitioners contend for a distinction between all these illustrations and the case at bar. They say that in [496] the case of the distribution of water, and of light and heat by gas or electricity, the use of the public highways is required for the mains and the poles and wires, that the purpose is public because it is necessary to obtain permission from public authorities, either state or municipal in order to carry it out. We grant that in those cases this element of public permission exists, but it does not follow that the converse is true and that no purpose is public, where such permission does not exist. How can this criterion be applied to the erection of public buildings, the erection of a park, the building of a memorial hall, or of a market house, or the maintenance of a public clock? In other words under this rule, public service of this sort would be limited to one which can only be performed by a so-called public service corporation and not by an individual or corporation, independent of chartered rights. This is, in our judgment, too narrow. It makes an incident to some forms of public service an essential element. It transforms the method or means of rendering the service into the essence of the service itself. It makes the exercise of public rights in supplying the necessities of a community a prerequisite to the public use. But this exercise of public rights can itself be authorized only by the Legislature and if that branch of the government sees fit to bestow the public service in a manner that may obviate the use of the public right they certainly should have the right and the power so to do. It is a matter within their control.

Let us look at the question from a practical and concrete standpoint. Can it make any real and vital difference and convert a public into a private use if instead of burning the fuel at the power station to produce the electricity, or at the central heating plant to produce the heat and then conducting it in the one case by wires and in the other by pipes to the user's home, the coal itself is hauled over the same highway to the same point of distribution? We fail to see it. It is only a different and a simpler mode of distribution and, if the Legislature has the power to authorize municipalities to furnish heat to its inhabitants "it can do this by any appropriate means which it may think expedient." The vital and essential element is the character of the service rendered and not the means by which it is rendered. It seems illogical to hold that a [497] municipality may relieve its citizens from the rigor of cold if it can reach them by pipes or wires placed under or above the highways but not if it can reach them by teams traveling along the identically same highway. It will be something of a task to convince the ordinarily intelligent citizen that an act of the Legislature authorizing the former is constitutional but one authorizing the latter is unconstitutional beyond all rational doubt. For we must remember that we are considering the existence of the power in the Legislature which is the only question before the court and not the wisdom of its exercise which is for the Legislature alone.

Cases directly in point are lacking. We have been unable to find anywhere that the issue has been squarely decided.

The learned counsel for the plaintiffs confidently rely upon the opinions of the justices in 155 Mass. 598, 30 N. E. 1142, 15 L.R.A. 809, and 182 Mass. 605, 66 N. E. 25, 60 L.R.A. 592, rendered in answer to questions propounded by the House of Representatives as to the constitutionality of proposed acts for the establishment of municipal fuel yards. While such answers are entitled to great consideration they do not have the force of decision. Kent, J. 58 Me. 573, Tapley, J. 58 Me. 615, and Libbey, J. 72 Me. 562, 563. "The giving of advisory opinions is not the exercise of the judicial function at all, and the opinions thus given have not the quality of judicial authority." Prof. James B. Thayer, 7 Harv. L. Rev. 153.

In 155 Mass. 598, 30 N. E. 1142, 15 L.R.A. 809, the justices were divided, five advising that the proposed act would be unconstitutional, one, Justice Holmes, that it would be constitutional, and one, Justice Barker, giving a qualified assent to its validity. In 182 Mass. 605, the opinions of the majority in 155 Mass. were adopted without dissent, and these views have been reaffirmed by way of illustration in Opinion of Justices, 211 Mass. 624, 98 N. E. 611, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 221, the subject matter of that opinion being the power of municipalities to construct houses in the suburbs for wage earners, a power clearly not theirs. A careful study of these opinions shows that the general principles enunciated are in accord with our own views and that in only one particular are we at variance.

The conclusions reached by the majority in the Massachusetts cases seem to be:

[498] (1) That it is beyond the power of a municipal corporation to engage in the sale of commodities which are and can be easily conducted by private business concerns in competition with one another, and which can be sufficiently regulated thereby. In this we most heartily concur.

(2) That the sale of fuel falls within this class of commodities and there is no necessity why cities and towns should undertake this form of business any more than many others which have always been conducted by private enterprises. Here we differ.

(3) That in regard to "a condition in which the supply of fuel would be so small and the difficulty of obtaining it so great, that persons desiring to purchase it would be unable to supply themselves through private enterprises it is conceivable that agencies of government might be able to obtain fuel when citizens generally could not. Under such circumstances we are of opinion that the government might constitute itself an agent for the relief of the community, and that money expended for the purpose would be expended for a public use." Here again we concur.

The principle, therefore, seems to be conceded that if the difficulty of obtaining an adequate supply exists, the furnishing of such supply by municipalities would be a public use. And this is the construction placed upon the Massachusetts opinion by learned text writers. Dillon Mun. Corp. 5th ed. sec. 1292. McQuillan Mun. Corp. (1912) sec. 1809.

In the last analysis this differs but little from the definition of a public use laid down by Judge Cooley in his work on Constitutional Limitations, 6th ed. p. 655, viz: "That only can be considered a public use where the government is supplying its own needs or is furnishing facilities for its citizens in regard to those matters of public necessity, convenience or welfare which on account of their peculiar character and the difficulty—perhaps impossibility—of making provisions for them otherwise, is alike proper, useful and needful for the government to provide." This court in discussing the question of public uses with reference to the power of eminent domain adopted this definition in a very recent case, remarking "there is perhaps no general definition more satisfactory than this one." Brown v. Gerald, 100 Me. 351, 370, 109 Am. St. Rep. 494, 70 L.R.A. 472. And this [499] general definition we adhere to and seek to apply in the case at bar. Its two tests are: first, the subject matter, or commodity, must be one "of public necessity, convenience or welfare." Fuel clearly comes within this category. The second test is the difficulty which individuals have in providing it for themselves. The causes creating the difficulty may vary, but if the difficulty exists, the test is met. For instance, in the case of a water supply the difficulty arises from the fact that individual sources are inadequate or unsanitary and the conditions can be remedied only by the municipality itself providing or allowing some public service corporation to furnish the community at large from a single and common source. This is a matter of common knowledge and the court in passing upon the question of public use cannot ignore it.

In the case of fuel the practical difficulty is caused by the existence of monopolistic combinations. The mining, transportation and distribution of coal, has, in the process of industrial development, fallen into the hands of these combinations to such an extent that the greater part of the supply is in the absolute control of a few. The difficulty and practical impossibility of obtaining an adequate supply for private needs at times in the past, and the consequent suffering among the people, especially in the more populous cities, are matters of history, and this difficulty may as well be caused by unreasonable prices as by shortage in quantity. All this is a matter of common knowledge and cannot be overlooked by the court. The supply of water may be inadequate from one cause, that of fuel from another, but out of each arises the condition which renders the furnishing of it by the municipality a public use.

The majority of the Massachusetts justices conceded the right to create municipal fuel yards under certain conditions and exigencies, but say that in their opinion fuel is like all other commodities of ordinary purchase and sale in the open market and there is no necessity why cities and towns should undertake that form of business any more than many others which have always been conducted by private enterprise. This might seem to be invading the province of the Legislature, because the determination of the exigency is for that coördinate branch of the government alone, and by the passage of this act that branch has necessarily determined that the exigency exists. If, however, independent of their finding the court has a [500] right to consider all the conditions and circumstances connected with the subject matter, all the elements which, under the definition of Judge Cooley, make up the public use, then we cannot close our eyes to existing economic conditions and must admit that in determining the existence of the difficulty the finding of the Legislature is not wrong beyond all rational doubt, and therefore under the well settled rules of constitutional construction it should not be disturbed.

But it is urged, why, if a city can establish a municipal fuel yard, can it not enter upon any kind of commercial business, and carry on a grocery store, or a meat market or a bakery. The answer has been already indicated. Such kinds of business do not measure up to either of the accepted tests. When we speak of fuel, we are dealing not with ordinary articles of merchandise for which there may be many substitutes, but with an indispensable necessity of life, and more than this, the commodities mentioned are admittedly under present economic conditions regulated by competition in the ordinary channels of private business enterprise. The principle that municipalities can neither invade private liberty nor encroach upon the field of private enterprise should be strictly maintained as it is one of the main foundations of our prosperity and success. If the case at bar clearly violated that principle it would be our duty to pronounce the act unconstitutional, but in our opinion it does not. The element of commercial enterprise is entirely lacking. The purpose of the act is neither to embark in business for the sake of direct profits (the act provides that fuel shall be furnished at cost) nor for the sake of the indirect gains that may result to purchasers through reduction in price by governmental competition. It is simply to enable the citizens to be supplied with something which is a necessity in its absolute sense to the enjoyment of life and health, which could otherwise be obtained with great difficulty and at times perhaps not at all, and whose absence would endanger the community as a whole. In our opinion it is a proper and constitutional function of government either to itself provide such a necessity under these circumstances or to see to it that it is so provided as to bring it within the reach of the citizens.

[501] A similar inquiry based upon fears for the future was asked as to the limit of legislative power in Olmstead v. Camp, 33 Conn. 532, 89 Am. Dec. 221, and is there answered by the court in these words: "The question is asked with great pertinence and propriety, what then is the limit of legislative power under the clause which we have been considering and what is the exact line between public and private uses? Our reply is that which has heretofore been quoted. From the nature of the case there can be no precise line. The power requires a degree of elasticity to be capable of meeting new conditions and improvements and the ever increasing necessities of society. The sole dependence must be on the presumed wisdom of the sovereign authority, supervised, and in cases of gross error or extreme wrong, controlled, by the dispassionate judgment of the courts." This furnishes, we think, a safe and sufficient barrier between the Constitution and those who might attempt to break it down.

Nor is the fact that in operation the act may tend to lessen the profits of a few private dealers or even force them from business, a matter of consideration for the court. "It is for the legislature to determine from time to time what laws and regulations are necessary or expedient for the defence and benefit of the people, and however inconvenienced, restricted or even damaged, particular persons and corporations may be, such general laws and regulations are held valid unless there can be pointed out, some provision in the State or United States Constitution, which clearly prohibits them." Opinion of Justices, 103 Me. 506, 13 Ann. Cas. 745, 69 Atl. 627, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 422.

The brief opinion of Mr. Justice Holmes now of the Supreme Court of the United States, in 155 Mass. 607, supra, goes even farther than the rule which we have laid down. He says: "I am of opinion that when money is taken to enable a public body to offer to the public without discrimination an article of general necessity the purpose is no less public when that article is wood or coal than when it is water or gas or electricity or education, to say nothing of cases like the support of paupers or the taking of land for railroads or public markets. I see no ground for denying the power of the Legislature to enact the laws mentioned in the questions proposed. The need or expediency of such legislation is not for us to consider."

[502] Our attention is further called by the plaintiffs to Baker v. Grand Rapids, 142 Mich. 687, 106 N. W. 208, but that case has no bearing upon the question at issue. There, the city government without authority from the Legislature transferred $10,000 from the contingent fund to the poor fund for the purchase and distribution of coal when the price of coal was rapidly rising and a combination had been formed to exist among the local dealers. A bill in equity was brought by one of these dealers to prevent the action, and was held not to be maintainable, first because the plaintiff being engaged in the unlawful combination did not come into court with clean hands, second because the act had already been done and the city had ceased to carry on the business, and third because the plaintiff was not damaged. This case certainly furnishes no authority for the plaintiffs; and no others in point have been cited.

On the other hand the very recent case of Holton v. Camilla, 134 Ga. 560, 20 Ann. Cas. 199, 68 S. E. 472, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 116 (1910), cited by the defendant is an important precedent by analogy. In that case the court held constitutional a legislative act authorizing the city to establish and maintain a municipal ice plant in connection with its water works. In discussing the question of public use after referring to water, light and heat, the court says:

"If a city has the right to furnish heat to its inhabitants, because conducive to their health, comfort and convenience, we see no reason why they should not be permitted to furnish ice. . . . Is the difference between water in a liquid and in a frozen condition a radical one? Upon what principle could the doctrine rest that liquid water may be delivered by the city to its inhabitants by flowage through pipes, but that water in frozen blocks cannot be delivered by wagons or otherwise? If the city has the right to furnish its inhabitants with water in a liquid form, we fail to see any reason why it cannot furnish it to them in a frozen condition. . . . If the furnishing of ice to its inhabitants is conducive generally to their health, comfort and convenience it is certainly being furnished for a municipal or public purpose." It requires no argument to prove that coal is as conducive to the health, comfort and convenience of the inhabitants of this northern latitude as is ice to that of the inhabitants of Georgia.

Without discussing the question further it is sufficient to say that [503] we see in this act of the Legislature a sign neither of paternalism nor of socialism. We do not regard it as a departure from previous legislation but in line with it, although perhaps one step further. The direction however is the same and the advance is caused by the development of a new want which has called for a new exercise of legislative power, not an exercise of new legislative power, and such an advance is both legitimate and commendable.

Our conclusion, therefore, is that the acts threatened by the defendant are not an invasion of the constitutional rights of the plaintiffs and that the plaintiffs are not entitled to a perpetual injunction as prayed for.

Bill dismissed with costs.

NOTE.

Power of Municipality to Engage in Business of Furnishing Fuel to Inhabitants.

The holding of the reported case that a municipality may, on appropriate legislative authority, engage in the business of furnishing fuel to its inhabitants is contrary to the few decisions passing directly on the question. In Opinion of Justices, 155 Mass. 601, 30 N. E. 1142, 15 L.R.A. 809, it was said: "When the constitution was adopted the buying and selling of wood and coal for fuel was a well known form of private business, which was generally carried on as other kinds of business were carried on; and is now carried on in much the same manner as it was then. It was and is a kind of business which in its relations to the community did not and does not differ essentially from the business of buying and selling any other of the necessities of life. Although all kinds of business may be regulated by the legislature, yet to buy and sell coal and wood for fuel requires no authority from the legislature, and requires the exercise of no powers derived from the legislature, and every person who chooses can engage in it in the same manner as in the buying and selling of other merchandise. We are not aware of any necessity why cities and towns should undertake this form of business any more than many others which have always been conducted by private enterprise, and we are not called upon to consider what extraordinary powers the commonwealth may exercise, or may authorize cities and towns to exercise, in extraordinary agencies for the safety of the state or the welfare of the inhabitants. If there be any advantage to the inhabitants in buying and selling coal and wood for fuel at the risk of the community on a large scale, and on what has been called the co-operative plan, we are of the opinion that the constitution does not contemplate this as one of the ends for which the government was established, or as a public service for which cities and towns may be authorized to tax their inhabitants." That decision was followed in Opinion of Justices, 182 Mass. 605, 66 N. E. 25, 60 L.R.A. 592, wherein, answering a question of the legislature as to its powers in an emergency, the court said: "Looking to the possible consequences of the emergency for which a remedy is desired, they can be divided into four classes: First, an increase of the number of those who fall into distress and are in need of relief from the public authorities, because they have no means to buy fuel at a greatly increased price. Secondly, increased expenditure, to their serious detriment, by those who have the means to buy. Thirdly, a possibility of a famine in fuel, such as to make it impossible reasonably to supply the needs of the community for comfortable living. Fourthly, a scarcity falling short of a famine but so great as to create widespread and general distress in the community which cannot be met by private enterprise. The first of these possible consequences does not call for legislation. Cities and towns now have ample power to provide in any reasonable way for paupers, whether it be by furnishing out-of-door relief or by support in almshouses, and whether their need of relief is permanent or caused by a temporary condition. It is equally true that the second of these consequences does not justify taxation of those who do not have occasion to buy coal, for the benefit of those who do. The use of the money of taxpayers for such a purpose would not be a public use, but a use for the special pecuniary benefit of those who happen to be affected by the state of the coal market. The third possibility, that of an absolute famine in fuel because of the lack of a supply and the impossibility of obtaining a sufficient quantity reasonably to satisfy the needs of the community, would be a condition which would warrant the expenditure of the public money under appropriate legislation, if the legislature could discover a way through public agencies to supply the people. But it is difficult to see how the method referred to in the question could produce this result. If at any time there was an impossibility of obtaining supplies because the supplies were not here and could not be bought elsewhere, the opening of a city coal yard would furnish no relief. Such an establishment could not work a miracle of creation. In reference to an anticipated possible famine, the procurement and storage of a supply in time of plenty might be a remedy or an alleviation if the dread anticipation should become a reality, but the maintenance of a city fuel yard to conduct the business of buying and selling in a time of plenty, would have no tendency to avert a famine, or to relieve from its consequences if one should come. We are not called upon to consider whether the legislature would deem it advisable, if it has the power, to authorize cities and towns to build storehouses in which to keep large quantities of fuel in anticipation of a possible famine. In regard to the fourth of the possible consequences, a condition in which the supply of fuel would be so small, and the difficulty of obtaining it so great, that persons desiring to purchase it would be unable to supply themselves through private enterprise, it is conceivable that agencies of government might be able to obtain fuel when citizens generally could not. Under such circumstances we are of opinion that the government might constitute itself an agent for the relief of the community, and that money expended for the purpose would be expended for a public use. We do not think that we are expected to determine whether there might be any other conceivable emergency which would call for an affirmative answer to this question. Considering the question only in reference to the accompanying bills and the conditions to which we suppose it relates, our answer is in the negative, except in reference to the fourth of the above-mentioned possible consequences. As to that, we are of opinion that if the supposed conditions exist in any city or town, it may be authorized, under proper legislation, to sell fuel with the limitations above stated, so long as these conditions continue." In Baker v. Grand Rapids, 142 Mich. 687, 106 N. W. 208, it was held that a city has no power, even in a time of coal famine aggravated by the action of a combination of dealers, to divert money from its contingent fund to buy coal to sell to its citizens. The court said: "The city authorities had the right, through the board of poor commissioners, to provide fuel for needy citizens, and under the then existing emergency, where a coal famine appeared imminent, were authorized to purchase such amount of fuel in any market, as, in their opinion, would be necessary for that purpose. A municipality, however, cannot enter into a commercial enterprise, such as buying and selling coal to its citizens as a business, thereby entering into competition with dealers in coal. Such use of moneys is held not to be for a public purpose. . . . It appears that complainant at the time in question was in a combination with certain other coal dealers in the city of Grand Rapids, in violation of the provisions of sections 11377-11379, 3 Comp. Laws, the purpose and intent of which was to enhance, regulate, and control the price of coal in that market, and that by reason of such unlawful combination the municipality acted as it did relative to supplying coal to some of its citizens. Such unlawful conduct of complainant would not excuse unauthorized action by the city, but would bear upon the question as to whether complainant came into a court of chancery with clean hands."

However in State v. Toledo, 48 Ohio St. 112, 26 N. E. 1061, 11 L.R.A. 729, quoted at length in the reported case, it was held that a municipality has the power to furnish natural gas to its inhabitants.

As to analogous municipal powers, see Holton v. Camilla, 20 Ann. Cas. 199 (municipal ice plant); State v. Lynch, Ann. Cas. 1914D 949 (municipal moving picture theater); Egan v. San Francisco, Ann. Cas. 1915A 754 (municipal theater).

WEBER.

Arkansas Supreme Court—June 22, 1914.

113 Ark. 471; 169 S. W. 318.

Appeal — Review of Questions of Fact.

The court, in testing the legal sufficiency of the evidence of plaintiff to sustain a verdict in her favor, must give that evidence the highest probative value.

Husband and Wife — Alienation of Affections — Wife's Right of Action.

Under Kirby's Dig. § 6017, authorizing a wife to sue alone as to any separate property or for damages for any injury, a wife may maintain an action for damages for the alienation of the affections of her husband, whether the cause of action is denominated a personal or a property right.

A verdict of $2700 damages for alienation of the affections of the plaintiff's husband reviewed and held not to be excessive.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pulaski county: HENDRICKS, Judge.

Action for alienation of affections. Ida Weber, plaintiff, and Englebert Weber et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. AFFIRMED.

[471] This suit was instituted to recover damages against appellants, for the alleged alienation of the affections of the appellee's husband, Joe Weber. The appellee married Joe Weber, the only child of appellants, in the city of Little Rock, on the 22d day of November, 1910, and they lived and cohabited together as husband and wife, until the 30th day of August, 1911, when there was born to them a male child. Thereafter appellee was taken seriously ill, and to such an extent that she lost the control of her mental faculties, and, at the instance and recommendation of the family physician, was, by proper [472] order of the Pulaski County Court, adjudged insane and placed in the State Hospital for Nervous Diseases, for treatment.

Appellee and her husband, at the time of the birth of the child, and during their married life, lived immediately adjoining appellants, and her husband worked for them. Appellee was released from the hospital as cured, and soon thereafter disagreements arose between appellee and appellants, and the evidence is sharply conflicting as to the cause of these disagreements, and is especially so as to the extent to which appellants were responsible for the separation of appellee and her husband. According to appellee's version, appellants, without legal justification or excuse, brought about the separation, as a result of which appellee's husband took away their child, when it was only seven weeks old, since which time appellee had never been permitted to see the child. She recovered judgment in the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars, and, a motion for a new trial having been overruled, this appeal has been duly prosecuted.

Gus Fulk and E. B. Buchanan for appellants.

Henry C. Reigler and W. T. Tucker for appellee.

[474] SMITH, J., (after stating the facts).—A number of exceptions were saved at the trial both to the admission of evidence and the giving of instructions, and these exceptions have been considered by us; but we do not find any prejudicial error, or question of sufficient importance to require discussion. It is also earnestly insisted that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict, but when appellee's evidence is given its highest probative value, as we must give it, when testing its legal sufficiency to support the verdict, we can not say that the evidence is legally insufficient to sustain the verdict, nor can we say the amount recovered is excessive.

[475] A question is raised, however, which is one of first impression in this State, and which has received our earnest consideration. This question is the right of the wife to maintain an action for damages for the alienation of the affections of her husband.

There is conflict among the authorities as to whether this right of action existed in favor of the wife, or not, at common law, and although there are numerous cases which hold that she had no such right, the better view appears to be that she did. Common law causes of action for a personal injury to a married woman belonged to her; but the husband was required to sue with her to recover compensation because of her disability to sue. The husband's right of action abated at the death of the wife; but the cause of action survived to the wife and could be maintained by her after the death of her husband. Her right of action existed, but could not be set in motion unless her husband joined, and, by reason of the disability of coverture, it remained in abeyance, and could not be prosecuted in her own name. Bennett v. Bennett, 116 N. Y. 584, 23 N. E. 17, 6 L.R.A. 553; Smith v. Smith, 98 Tenn. 101, 38 S. W. 439, 60 Am. St. Rep. 838.

The case of Bennett v. Bennett, supra, is a leading authority on this subject, and the opinion in that case reviewed the authorities upon this question, and in upholding a judgment in favor of the wife, it was there said: "We think the judgment appealed from should be affirmed, upon the ground that the common law gave the plaintiff a right of action, and that the Code gave her an appropriate remedy."

In 1 Cooley on Torts (3 ed. p. 475) it was said: "At least twenty States now hold that such an action may be maintained, some basing their conclusion upon common law principles and some, more or less, upon the various enabling statutes in favor of married women, which have been passed in recent years."

A number of cases support the wife's right to recover for the alienation of the affection of her husband, as an invasion of her personal rights, while other cases regard the wife's right to the consortium of her husband [476] as a property right. One of the leading cases taking this latter view is that of Jaynes v. Jaynes, 39 Hun 40, in which case it is there said: "These reciprocal rights may be regarded as the property of the respective parties, in the broad sense of the word property, which includes things not tangible or visible, and applies to whatever is exclusively one's own." And it is there further said: "But as at common law, the husband and wife were regarded as one person, and her personal rights were suspended or incorporated with his, during coverture, so that if she were injured in her person or property, she could bring no action for redress without her husband's concurrence, and in his name as well as her own, she was practically precluded from suing for damages caused by alienating the affections of her husband and enticing him away. . . . Her disability in that respect, we think, has been removed in this State by legislation. A married woman may now, while married, sue and be sued in all matters having relation to her sole and separate property or for any injury to her person or character the same as if she were sole, and it is not necessary or proper to join her husband with her as a party in any action or special proceedings affecting her separate property. If we are correct in holding that the right which the plaintiff alleges was invaded by the defendant in this action was her separate property, the case is within the statutes referred to. If it be not property in the sense in which the word property is used in the statutes cited, it is a personal right, and, as the statutes extend to all injuries, whether to property, person or character, it seems sufficiently comprehensive to embrace an injury to the right in question."

In the case of Warren v. Warren, 89 Mich. 123, 50 N. W. 842, 14 L.R.A. 545, the wife's right to sue and recover damages for the alienation of the affections of her husband was said to exist under the statute which was set out in the opinion. It was there said: "Under the statutes of this State relative to the rights of married women, and the decisions of our own courts in relation thereto, the right of the [477] wife to bring this action, as well as all other suits to redress her personal wrongs, seems to me to be perfectly clear. The statutes provide: 'That the real and personal estate of every female, acquired before marriage, and all property, real and personal, to which she may afterward become entitled, by gift, grant, inheritance, devise, or in any other manner, shall be and remain the estate and property of such female, and shall not be liable for the debts, obligations, and engagements of her husband, and may be contracted, sold, transferred, mortgaged, conveyed, devised, or bequeathed by her, in the same manner and with the like effect as if she were unmarried.' How Stat. p. 6295.

"'Actions may be brought by and against a married woman in relation to her sole property, in the same manner as if she were unmarried; and in cases where the property of the husband cannot be sold, mortgaged, or otherwise incumbered without the consent of his wife, to be given in the manner prescribed by law, or when his property is exempted by law from sale on execution or other final process issued from any court against him, his wife may bring an action in her own name, with the like effect as in cases of actions in relation to her sole property as aforesaid.' How. Stat. 6297.

"Under these statutes it has been held that a wife is entitled to and may sue for and recover in her own name damages for her personal injuries and suffering from assault and battery (Berger v. Jacobs, 21 Mich. 215; Hyatt v. Adams, 16 Mich. 180-198), and for injuries to her person through the negligence of another (Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Coleman, 28 Mich. 440); also for slander (Leonard v. Pope, 27 Mich. 145). If the damages in such cases are her individual property, as expressly held in Berger v. Jacobs, I cannot see why, in reason and on principle, the damages arising from the loss of the society and support of her husband are not also her individual property. Surely, the support and maintenance which she is entitled to from her husband, and which she loses by his abandonment, is capable of ready and accurate [478] measurement in dollars and cents, and can be said to be a property right, which she has lost by the wrongful interference of the defendants. The loss of the society of her husband, and her mental anguish and suffering, are not easily ascertained when compensation is sought, and to be gauged by a money standard; but damages for such anguish and suffering are given, as best the jury can, and are permissible, in most actions of tort. . . .

"There has never been any reason urged against the right of the husband to sue for the loss of the consortium of his wife, and if, as shown, the wife is now, under either the liberal letter or spirit of our marriage laws, entitled, as of her own property, to the damages arising from her personal injuries—the injuries of her body or mind—there can be no good reason why she cannot sue for and recover damages for the loss of the consortium of her husband that does not equally and as well apply to the suit of the husband on account of the loss of her society. The wife is entitled to the society, protection and support of her husband as certainly, under the law, and by moral right, as he is to her society and services in his household. . . .

"It is an old maxim, and a good one, that the law will never 'suffer an injury and a damage without redress.' Will the law aid the husband, and not help the wife in a like case? Not under the present enlightened views of the marriage relation and its reciprocal rights and duties. The reasoning that deprives the wife of redress when her husband is taken away from her by the blandishments and unlawful influences of others is a relic of the barbarity of the common law, which, in effect, made the wife the mere servant of her husband, and deprived her of all right to redress her personal wrongs except by his will."

In the case of Bennett v. Bennett, supra, the court discussed the nature of this action and treated it as of the nature of a personal injury to the wife, and it was there said: "An injury to the person within the meaning [479] of the law includes certain acts which do not involve physical or personal injury. Thus, criminal conversation with the wife has long been held as personal injury to the husband, and the seduction of a daughter a like injury to the father." And it was there further said: "The basis of the action is the loss of consortium, or the right of the husband to the conjugal society of his wife. It is not necessary that there shall be proof of any pecuniary loss in order to sustain the action. Hermance v. James, 32 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 143; Rinehart v. Bills, 82 Mo. 534. Loss of service is not essential but is merely a matter of aggravation and need not be alleged or proven. Bigaouette v. Paulet, 134 Mass. 125." Cooley says that the gist of the action is the loss of consortium, which includes the husband's society, affections and aid. 1 Cooley on Torts, p. 478.

In the case of Nolin v. Pearson, 191 Mass. 283, 6 Ann. Cas. 658, 114 Am. St. Rep. 605, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 643, which was a suit by the wife for the alienation of the affections of her husband, the right of the wife to maintain the suit was upheld and many cases are cited in the opinion of the court and in the briefs of counsel; other cases are collected in the foot note, and after a review of the American cases, the following statement is made by the editor of the foot note: "In the United States, Wisconsin, Maine and New Jersey seem to stand alone in denying to the wife the right to sue for the alienation of her husband's affections and enticing him away from her, thus depriving her of his support, under statutes giving her the right to sue and be sued in her own name." But New Jersey can no longer be classed among the States which deny the right of the wife to maintain this cause of action.

In the case of Sims v. Sims, 79 N. J. L. 577, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 842, 76 Atl. 1063, an appeal was taken from the order of the trial court sustaining a demurrer which was interposed upon the general ground that a suit would not lie, which was instituted to recover damages for maliciously enticing away the plaintiff's husband and thereby alienating his affections. The opinion in that case recited that [480] plaintiff based her right to sue upon an act entitled "An Act for the Protection and Enforcement of the Rights of Married Women." This act provided that any married woman may maintain an action in her own name and without joining her husband therein, for all torts committed against her or her separate property, in the same manner as she lawfully might if a feme sole; provided, however, that this act shall not be so construed as to interfere with or take away any right of action at law or in equity now provided for the torts above mentioned. The second section provided that "Any action brought in accordance with the provisions of this act may be prosecuted by such married woman separately in her own name, and the nonjoinder of her husband shall not be pleaded in any such action." The Court of Appeals of New Jersey reversed the action of the trial court in sustaining the demurrer, and in doing so used the following language in construing the act above quoted: "The question, therefore, presented in this case, in the light of the act of 1906, is res nova, and the conclusion we have reached is supported by the great weight of authority. That this act was intended to confer the power upon a married woman to protect and enforce her rights is the specific announcement contained in its title. The body of the act declares that she may maintain an action, as a feme sole might lawfully do, and without joining her husband therein, for all torts committed against her or her property. Keeping in mind the old law and the existing mischief, it becomes manifest that the legislative intent which inspired this remedial measure could have been only a desire to confer upon the married woman that equality of remedy as an independent suitor, which would enable her to vindicate her right in person for a tort committed against her, and thus remedy the inequality to which she was subjected by the common law."

It will be seen that our statute giving married women the right to sue, which will later be set out, is broader and more comprehensive than the New Jersey [481] statute, which the Court of Appeals of that State said was sufficient to authorize the maintenance of a suit by the wife such as we have here.

In the case of Gerner v. Gerner, 185 Pa. St. 236, 39 Atl. 884, 64 Am. St. Rep. 646, 40 L.R.A. 549, involving the question here under consideration, the Supreme Court of that State said: "When the wife has been freed from her common law disabilities and may sue in her own name and right for torts done her, we see no reason to doubt her right to maintain an action against one who has wrongfully induced her husband to leave her. Generally, this right has been recognized and sustained in jurisdictions where she has the capacity to sue." One of the earliest American cases holding the wife has the right to sue for the loss of consortium of her husband, is the case of Westlake v. Westlake, 34 Ohio St. 627-633, 32 Am. Rep. 397, and this has become one of the leading cases, and is cited in many of the subsequent cases on this subject. It was there said: "If, in this State, the common law dominion of the husband over the property and personal rights of the wife has been taken away from him and conferred upon her, and remedies in accordance with the spirit of the civil law have been expressly given to the wife for the redress of injuries to her person, property, and personal rights, all of which I hope to show has been done, then it must follow that she may maintain an action in her own name for the loss of the consortium of her husband against one who wrongfully deprives her of it, unless the consortium of her husband is not one of her personal rights.

"Is the right of the wife to the consortium of the husband one of her personal rights? If it is, then the statute makes the right of action growing out of an injury to the right, the separate property of the wife, for which the Code gives her a right to sue in her own name. Before marriage the man and woman are endowed with the same personal rights. If under no disability, each is competent to contract. When the agreement to marry is entered into, but, before its consummation, each has the same interest in it, and either may sue for a breach [482] of it by the other. In this State, neither the husband nor wife unconditionally surrenders their personal rights by consummating the contract of marriage. On the contrary, each acquires a personal as well as legal right to the conjugal society of the other, for the loss of which either may sue separately."

In the third edition of Cooley on Torts, volume 1, page 477, the case of Foot v. Card, 58 Conn. 1, 18 Atl. 1027, 18 Am. St. Rep. 258, 6 L.R.A. 829, is quoted from at length with approval, and we find there the following quotation from that case: "Whatever inequalities of right as to property may result from the marriage contract, husband and wife are equal in rights in one respect, namely, each owes to the other the fullest possible measure of conjugal affection and society; the husband to the wife all that the wife owes to him. Upon principle this right in the wife is equally valuable to her as property, as is that of the husband to him. Her right being the same as his in kind, degree and value, there would seem to be no valid reason why the law should deny to her the redress which it affords to him. But from time to time courts, not denying the right of the wife in this regard, not denying that it could be injured, have nevertheless declared that the law neither would nor could devise and enforce any form of action by which she might obtain damages. In 3 Blackstone's Commentaries, 143, the reason for such denial is thus stated: 'The inferior hath no kind of property in the company, care or assistance of the superior, as the superior is held to have in those of the inferior; therefore, the inferior can suffer no loss or injury.' Inasmuch as by universal consent it is of the essence of every marriage contract that the parties thereto shall, in regard to this particular matter of conjugal society and affection, stand upon an equality, we are unable to find any support for the denial in this reason, and the right, the injury, and the consequent damage, being admitted, there comes into operation another rule, namely, that the law will permit no one to obtain redress for wrong except by its instrumentality, and it will furnish a mode for obtaining adequate redress for [483] every wrong. This rule, lying at the foundation of all law, is more potent than, and takes precedence of, the reason that the wife is in this regard without the pale of the law, because of her inferiority."

In this case of Foot v. Card, supra, a recovery was permitted without reference to any enabling act authorizing the wife to sue alone. The complaint had been demurred to upon the ground that the wife could not alone maintain this action but that her husband was a necessary party to the action, if any cause of action existed. That contention was disposed of in the following language: "Wherever there is a valuable right, and an injury to it, with consequent damage, the obligation is upon the law to devise and enforce such form and mode of redress as will make the most complete reparation. A technicality must not be permitted to work a denial of justice. The defendant has no possible interest in requiring the husband to be co-plaintiff, other than that she should have security for her costs in the suit, and be protected from a second judgment upon the same cause of action in his name. As she is in no danger of a second judgment, and can compel the plaintiff to give security for costs, it is simply an empty technicality which she here interposes. There are good reasons for the rule that the husband should join in a complaint for damages resulting from an injury to the person, property, reputation or feelings of the wife in every case other than before us. Whenever in any of these she suffers, presumably he suffers. He has a direct pecuniary interest in the result and the defendant is entitled to protection from a second judgment. But in the case before us it is the pith and marrow of the complaint that in alienating the husband's conjugal affection from the wife, in inducing him to deny his conjugal society, in persuading him to give his adulterous affections and society to the defendant, the latter has inflicted upon the plaintiff an injury by which from the nature of the case it is impossible for the husband to suffer injury; for which it is impossible for him to ask redress either for himself [484] or his wife. . . . In a case of this kind, the wife can only ask for damages by and for herself. The law cannot make redress otherwise than to her solely, apart from all others, especially apart from her husband; for no theory of the law as to the merger of the rights of the wife in those of the husband could include her rights to his conjugal affection and society. Although all other debts and rights to her might go to him, there yet remained this particular debt from him to her absolutely alone, and beyond the reach of the law of merger."

We are not called upon to approve all that we have here quoted from this Connecticut case; but the significance of that opinion is that a recovery was permitted without reference to any enabling act permitting the wife to sue alone.

Many other cases are cited in the cases we have quoted from; but those quoted from show upon what theories and under what circumstances recoveries have been permitted. The absurdity and cruel injustice of the common law fiction of the identity of husband and wife has long been recognized, and the tendency of all modern legislation has been toward the emancipation of the wife. But this amelioration of the wife's condition must come through the legislative function, and her disabilities at the common law exist, except in so far as they have been removed by constitutional conventions, or legislative enactments. Some of the disabilities under which the wife still labors, as the result of the common law fiction of the legal unity of the husband and wife, are pointed out in the opinion in the case of Kies v. Young, 64 Ark. 381, 42 S. W. 669, 62 Am. St. Rep. 198. But while she still labors under the disabilities there recited, we think the Legislature has clearly manifested its purpose to manumit her, so far as maintaining an action to enforce any legal right she may have, or to secure redress for any actionable wrong inflicted upon her, where the recovery would inure to her benefit. "Where a married woman is a party, her husband must be joined with her except in the following cases:

[495] "First. She may be sued alone upon contracts made by her in respect to her sole and separate property, or in respect to any trade or business carried on by her under any statute of this State.

"Second. She may maintain an action in her own name for or on account of her sole or separate estate or property, or for damages against any person or body corporate for any injury to her person, character or property.

"Third. Where the action is between herself and her husband, she may sue and be sued alone." Kirby's Digest, § 6017.

These words, person, character or property, are of the broadest signification and import, and would appear to include any cause of action which could arise in favor of a married woman, out of any relation which she can legally occupy. Although she still labors under some disabilities, she is given by this statute the power to enforce in her own name any right which she legally possesses. While it appears from a study of the cases, which hold that a wife may sue for the alienation of the affections of her husband, that in some of the States, where the courts so hold, the statutes have entirely manumitted the wife from her common law disability with reference to suing in her own name, it will also appear, from cases which we have cited, and from other cases therein cited, that the right of action has been upheld in the wife's favor where the enabling acts were not as broad as that of this State.

So that, whether this cause of action be denominated a personal right or a property right, the wife, under the laws of this State, may sue if it is either, and the judgment of the court below is therefore affirmed.

Action by Wife for Alienation of Affections or for Criminal Conversation.

I. Introductory.

The earlier cases discussing the right of action by a wife for the alienation of her husband's affections or for criminal conversation are collected in the notes to Nolin v. Pearson, 6 Ann. Cas. 658; Keen v. Keen, 14 Ann. Cas. 45; Burch v. Goodson, Ann. Cas. 1912C 1177; and Clow v. Chapman, 46 Am. St. Rep. 468. The present note reviews the recent cases on that subject.

II. Alienation of Affections.

1. RIGHT OF ACTION.

The holding of the reported case that a wife may maintain an action for damages for the alienation of her husband's affections follows the reasoning of the earlier decisions, in jurisdictions wherein by statute the common law disabilities of coverture have been removed, and is sustained in the following recent cases: Work v. Campbell, 164 Cal. 343, 123 Pac. 943, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 581; Lupton v. Underwood, 3 Boyce (Del.) 519, 85 Atl. 965; Golden v. Gartleman, 159 Ill. App. 338; Claxton v. Pool, 182 Mo. App. 13, 167 S. W. 623; Hall v. Smith, 80 Misc. 85, 140 N. Y. S. 796; Rott v. Goehring (N. D.) 157 N. W. 294; Nieberg v. Cohen, 88 Vt. 281, Ann. Cas. 1916C 476, 92 Atl. 214, L.R.A.1915C 433. Compare Ney v. Ney (No. 1) 21 Ont. W. Rep. 523, 3 Ont. W. N. 896. In Work v. Campbell, supra, the court said: "Under our statutes, a wife may maintain an action for damages suffered by her by reason of the abduction or enticement from her of her husband, as may a husband for the damages suffered by him for the abduction or enticement from him of his wife, and in such an action by the wife her husband is not a necessary party plaintiff. (See Civ. Code, sec. 49, subds. 1 and 2.)" In Lupton v. Underwood, 3 Boyce (Del.) 519; 85 Atl. 965, it was said: "Under the statutes of this state removing the disability, at common law, of a married woman to sue in respect to her property in her own name alone, a married woman may maintain an action for alienation of her husband's affections. Marriage gives to the wife the same right of conjugal society as it does to the husband. Each is entitled to the comfort, companionship and affection of the other. The rights of the one and the obligations of the other spring from the marriage relation. Any interference with these rights, whether of the one or the other—particularly by a stranger—is a violation, not only of natural right, but also of a legal right arising out of the marriage relation. . . . Whoever, therefore, by the alienation of the affections of a wife's husband, deprives her of his affections, commits a wrong against her property rights for which such wrongdoer is liable to respond in damages." In Claxton v. Pool, 182 Mo. App. 13, 167 S. W. 623, the court said: "In this state, since the decision of the case of Clow v. Chapman, 125 Mo. 101; 28 S. W. 328, the wife may maintain an action against third persons for enticing away her husband and alienating his affections for her, just as the husband could maintain such an action at common law. . . . It is also good law in this state and elsewhere that to sustain the action there must be evidence that the party charged is the enticer, and this requires more than a mere showing of the abandonment and improper relations." In Hall v. Smith, 80 Misc. 95, 140 N. Y. S. 796, it was said: "Although at common law it was said that the wife could not maintain an action for the alienation of her husband's affections, or for the consequent loss of consortium, because, among other things, of the wife's lack of any property right in the affections and companionship of her husband, and her incapacity to sue without joining her husband with her, . . . yet the principles of the common law have been, in this as well as in other respects affecting the marital relations and the relative rights of husband and wife, abrogated by the innovating spirit of modern legislation, . . . and it has become settled law by competent authority in the courts of this and of many other states that a wife may sue for the alienation of the affections of her husband and the consequent loss of consortium." In Williamson v. Osenton, 220 Fed. 653, 136 C. A. 261, the court said: "We decline to make any distinction between the character of the wrong of alienating the affections of the wife from the husband by alluring with habitual criminal intercourse and that of alienating the affections of the husband from the wife by like means."

In a number of the recent actions instituted by a wife to recover damages for the alienation of her husband's affections her right to maintain the suit has not been questioned.

Washington.—Phillips v. Thomas, 70 Wash. 533, Ann. Cas. 1914B 800, 127 Pac. 97, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 582.

In an action instituted against a parent of the husband for the alienation of the latter's affections it is generally held that the parent may honestly advise the son and is liable only where the advice is actuated by malice. Thus in Lanigan v. Lanigan, 222 Mass. 198, 110 N. E. 285, the court said: "A father from parental affection may advise his son to discontinue the marital relation, and no action lies if such advice, honestly given, results in a separation. But if because of hostility and ill-will to his son's wife he procures the separation, her conjugal rights are invaded, justification fails, malice is proved, and damages may be recovered." And in Knapp v. Knapp (Mo.) 183 S. W. 576, the court held, in an action against the husband's mother and sister for alienation of affections, that proof of malice was part of the plaintiff's case as the parent was clothed with the presumption that the advice which he gave his child was given in good faith. In Greuneich v. Greuneich, 23 N. D. 368, 137 N. W. 415, the court said: "The law recognizes the natural solicitude of a parent for the happiness and welfare of a child, even after the child has married and left the parental home; and it is well settled in the authorities that, if a wife leave her husband, or a husband his wife, and he or she is induced so to do by the advice or counsel of a parent, the parent will not be held liable in an action for alienation of affections, unless it is made to appear that in giving such advice or counsel he acted in bad faith, and not honestly to promote the interest and welfare of his child. This is the case, even though the advice was not wisely given." See to the same effect Brison v. McKellop, 41 Okla. 374, 138 Pac. 154. In Ickes v. Ickes, 237 Pa. St. 582, 85 Atl. 885, 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1118, the court said: "While the law would not permit him maliciously to break up the marriage, yet, since the defendant was the father of the plaintiff's husband, the measure of proof required was greater than it would have been had he been a mere intermeddling stranger." And in Walter v. Walter, 172 Mich. 351, 137 N. W. 677, it was held to be error to charge the jury that it was the duty of the parents to advise their son to live with his wife.

It has been held that it is not necessary to prove malice in an action instituted against a stranger. Thus in Warren v. Graham (Ia.) 156 N. W. 323, which was an action instituted by a wife against a stranger for the alienation of her husband's affections, the court said: "As this action is against a stranger, a person having no interest in either of the parties to the suit and under no duty to shield or protect either, it is not, as we understand it, necessary to show actual malice in order to justify a recovery from one who alienates the affections of either husband or wife. . . . It may be true that malice is the gist of the action, but it is not necessary that express malice must be shown. It may be implied, and, as a rule, all that plaintiff need show in an action against a stranger who was under no duty and who was not called upon to give advice is that such person intentionally, unjustifiably, and wrongfully induced the husband to leave his wife. This establishes all the malice that is necessary to make out a case for plaintiff." However, in Geromini v. Buenelle, 214 Mass. 492, 102 N. E. 67, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) 465, it was held that in order to render the defendant liable to the plaintiff for alienating the affections of her husband it must appear that his advice was not given honestly or was given from malevolent motives; that it was necessary to prove malice on the part of the defendant.

It has been held that in an action against a female defendant for the alienation of the affections of the plaintiff's husband it must appear that the defendant was the pursuer and the inducing cause of the separation. Thus in Stewart v. Hagerty (Pa.) 96 Atl. 1099, it was held that in order to sustain an action for the alienation of the affections of the plaintiff's husband there must be some evidence from which the conclusion could be drawn that the defendant, a woman, was the pursuer, and not merely the pursued. And it was further held that there must be clear proof that the defendant was the inducing cause of the separation. Evidence that the defendant was seen walking on the streets with the plaintiff's husband was held not to be sufficient to sustain a verdict. See to the same effect Claxton v. Pool, 182 Mo. App. 13, 16 S. W. 623. However, in Miller v. Pearce, 86 Vt. 322, 85 Atl. 620, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 332, the court held that in an action by a wife for the alienation of her husband's affections, proof of an act of adultery between the husband and the defendant perfected the cause of action and established the right of recovery regardless of which party was the seducer. The court said that one of the consequences which the law attaches to the act of adultery, in such a case, is that the loss of consortium necessarily results from it. And in Rott v. Goehring (N. D.) 157 N. W. 294, the court said: "The fact, if it be a fact, that the husband was more to be blamed than the defendant does not exonerate the latter from liability; nor will plaintiff's action be defeated because plaintiff was estranged from her husband prior to his illicit relations with defendant."

2. PARTIES.

To warrant a recovery against two persons as joint tortfeasors there must be a showing of co-operation in the perpetration of the wrong complained of. Thus in Claxton v. Pool, 182 Mo. App. 13, 167 S. W. 623, which was an action brought by a wife for the alienation of her husband's affections against a husband and a wife as defendants, there was evidence sufficient to show that the defendant wife by her relations with the plaintiff's husband was responsible for the alienation of his affections but there was no evidence to show that the husband was a joint tortfeasor. The court said: "In considering the liability of the husband . . . it will be well to observe that the petition does not charge him as a joint tortfeasor with his wife, alleging only that what his wife did he had knowledge of and gave his consent to. To charge that he was a joint tortfeasor would require that he not only had knowledge and gave consent, but that he encouraged, aided or abetted his wife in her wrong or that he obtained some benefit from her acts which he ratified. . . . If he is liable at all, it can only be on the common-law liability of a husband for his wife's torts. . . . We . . . hold, on principle, that a husband is not liable and has never been held liable at common law, for the wrongs of his wife to a third person by reason of her conduct where such conduct is also a violation of her marital duties to him." In Knapp v. Knapp (Mo.) 183 S. W. 576, the action was instituted against the husband's mother and sister for alienation of affections. The court said: "Co-operation of tortfeasors is essential to support a joint judgment against them for a wilful and intentional tort, like that forming the basis of the charge in this case."

3. EVIDENCE.

In Frederick v. Morse, 88 Vt. 126, 92 Atl. 16, the court said: "Reputation and cohabitation are not competent proof of a marriage in actions for criminal conversation; . . . and . . . a marriage certificate, however complete and formal, does not prove itself. . . . But the plaintiff's testimony to the performance of a marriage ceremony and subsequent cohabitation was admissible in connection with the production of a marriage certificate with proof of the official signature, if there was competent evidence of the authority of the person signing. . . . Evidence that one is reputed to be and has acted as a justice of the peace is prima facie proof that he was regularly appointed to that office." It was further said, however: "The only evidence of qualification was the statement of the witness that he knew that marriages were performed in New York by justices of the peace. If the exercise of an official function can be accepted as proof of a statutory authority, it must be something more than its exercise in a single instance or by a single person."

In Walter v. Walter, 172 Mich. 351, 137 N. W. 677, an action by a wife against her father-in-law for the alienation of her husband's affections, it appeared that the plaintiff had previously instituted and withdrawn a divorce proceeding against her husband. It was held that the defendant should have been permitted to cross-examine the wife on the subject of her divorce proceeding.

In Hendrick v. Biggar, 181 App. Div. 522, 136 N. Y. S. 306, modifying judgment 66 Misc. 576, 122 N. Y. S. 162, an action by a wife for the alienation of her husband's affections, the plaintiff offered in evidence a decision and judgment in a divorce action brought by her against her husband wherein the defendant in the case at bar was named as co-respondent and appeared in the action by attorney. The court said: "It should be the rule, and we think it is, that where one comes into a divorce action by voluntary appearance as a corespondent, a decision and judgment in that action are admissible in evidence thereafter against him as to any material facts affecting his conduct which were decided in the action, as basis for the entry of a judgment.

In Brison v. McKellop, 41 Okla. 374, 138 Pac. 154, it appeared that the plaintiff was permitted, over the objection of the defendants, to state what her husband had told her that his mother had said to him, the statements having been made some three months after the separation between the plaintiff and her husband, and in the absence of either of the defendants. The court held the admission of that evidence to be reversible error.

In Ickes v. Ickes, 237 Pa. St. 582, 85 Atl. 885, 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1118, it was held that the testimony of a witness who had seen the plaintiff and her husband on the street and overheard a conversation between them in which the wife had confessed to her husband that the child about to be born to her was not his, should have been admitted as proof of the motives which caused the husband to leave his wife. The court said: "When evidence of this character is produced, sufficient to show a then present intention, or state of mind; it may be assumed to have continued and formed the motive which controlled the doing of a subsequent act following closely thereafter, if under all the surrounding circumstances one would naturally associate the two together; and it is for the jury to draw the conclusion."

It is generally held that evidence of an estrangement between the plaintiff and her husband prior to any act on the part of the defendant, is admissible in mitigation of damages but not as a bar to the action itself. Thus in Williamson v. Osenton, 220 Fed. 653, 186 C. O. A. 261, the court said: "The bearing of the evidence as to estrangement was properly limited in the charge to the subject of mitigation of damages. Estrangement is obviously not a bar to the recovery of either compensatory or punitive damages." And in Lupton v. Underwood, 3 Boyce (Del.) 519, 85 Atl. 965, the court in charging the jury on the question of evidence offered and received in mitigation of damages, said: "The extent of the actual injury to the plaintiff will of course depend upon the prior relations between the plaintiff and her husband. Evidence in mitigation or reduction of damages will, therefore, be received, which tends to show that the plaintiff has in fact suffered less injury than would otherwise be a probable inference from the act complained of. It is proper therefore, for you to consider, in mitigation of damages, but not in bar of the action, evidence, if any, which shows any unhappy relations between the wife and husband, not caused by the defendant, any want of affection for each other, and the fact that they are living apart, together with the circumstances under which the separation occurred. These and like matters are proper for your consideration, in mitigation of damages, to determine whether on account of such relation, the wife lost much or little by reason of the alleged acts and conduct of the defendant, if you find the defendant committed them and that they induced the injury complained of." In Cripe v. Cripe, 170 Cal. 91, 148 Pac. 520, it was held that evidence tending to show the feeling of the husband toward the plaintiff before the defendant acted at all was admissible, as the charge of alienating the affections of the husband would not be sustained if it appeared that before the defendant acted, the husband entertained no affection for his wife. It was also held that such evidence would be admissible on the question whether the defendant had acted maliciously or in good faith. For a discussion of the lack of affection between a husband and wife as a defense to an action for alienation of affections, see the note to Morris v. Warwick, 7 Ann. Cas. 687.

In Taylor v. Wilcox, 188 Ill. App. 18, the court held that evidence of the financial condition of the parties was admissible for the purpose of increasing damages. For a general discussion of the admissibility of evidence of the defendant's financial circumstances in an action for alienation of affection, see the note to Phillips v. Thomas, Ann. Cas. 1914B 800.

4. DAMAGES.

In Lupton v. Underwood, 3 Boyce (Del.) 519, 85 Atl. 965, the court in charging the jury on the question of damages said: "If you find from the evidence that the defendant wrongfully and unjustly, by any, or all of the acts complained of, had a controlling influence in alienating the affections of the plaintiff's husband, your verdict should be for the plaintiff; and the measure of damages would be such as you believe would reasonably compensate the plaintiff for the injury to her feelings; for the loss of her husband's comfort and society; and for the loss of his support. If you find from the evidence that the defendant's conduct was effective in causing the alienation of the affections of plaintiff's husband and was wanton and malicious toward the plaintiff, you may, in such event, in your discretion, award exemplary or punitive damages, in addition to compensatory damages. But in order to warrant the awarding of exemplary damages, you must be clearly satisfied by the evidence that the defendant's conduct was wanton and malicious. If you find from the evidence that plaintiff's husband alienated his affections from plaintiff without the influence of the alleged misconduct and interference on the part of the defendant, or that the alienation of his affections was the result of some other cause, over which the defendant did not exercise an effective influence, your verdict should be for the defendant."

In Taylor v. Wilcox, 188 Ill. App. 18, it was said: "The cause of action is such that if plaintiff is entitled to recover damages then the jury may, because of the wilful and wanton nature of the cause of action, give exemplary or punitive damages." The court further held that the plaintiff could recover damages for the support of the children over twelve years of age, which had been imposed on her. She was also entitled to recover for the value of her support and loss of consortium, and for mental anguish and injuries to her feelings but she was not entitled to recover for any injury to the good name and character or dishonor of her family.

In Phillips v. Thomas, 70 Wash. 533, Ann. Cas. 1914B 800, 127 Pac. 97, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 582, it was held that exemplary or punitive damages cannot be recovered except when expressly allowed by statute. It was also held that a verdict of $35,000 was so excessive as to raise a presumption of passion and prejudice and although reduced to $10,000 by the trial court it was still considered grossly excessive. In Hendrick v. Biggar, 151 App. Div. 522, 136 N. Y. S. 306, modifying judgment 66 Misc. 576, 122 N. Y. S. 162, it appeared that the plaintiff had recovered a verdict of $75,000 in an action for the alienation of her husband's affections. The defendant appealed from an order denying a motion for a new trial and reducing the verdict to $50,000. The court said: "The judgment in this action is a large one, even as it stands, and, under the facts shown in the record, apparently excessive. In cases of this class, there is a large measure of discretion in the jury as to the amount of damages, and a verdict is not to be interfered with lightly on the claim that it is excessive. At the same time it is the duty of the trial court and of this court to consider such question wherever it arises properly. Every case of this character is somewhat a rule unto itself. We think that the judgment and order should be reversed and a new trial granted, costs to abide the event, on the ground that the verdict was excessive, unless the plaintiff stipulate within twenty days to reduce the damages to the sum of $30,000 with interest, exclusive of the costs taxed on the entry of the judgment." In Warren v. Graham (Ia.) 150 N. W. 323, it appeared that the husband of the plaintiff was not a thrifty man and with the help of his family his only savings were a house and lot which he had deeded to the plaintiff. A verdict of $4875 was held to be excessive and she was given an election to accept a verdict for $2000 or to take a new trial. In Porter v. Heishman (Ia.) 154 N. W. 503, a verdict for $10,000 in favor of the plaintiff was held to be excessive where it appeared that the husband had been the aggressor in his relations with the defendant and that he had been unfaithful to his wife before meeting the defendant. There was also evidence of the fact that the plaintiff's husband had nothing except what he earned each day. In Diedrich v. Swift, 178 Mich. 593, 146 N. W. 170, a verdict for $3,000 was held not to be excessive. In Williamson v. Osenton, 220 Fed. 653, 136 C. C. A. 261, it appeared that on the trial of an action for the alienation of the affections of her husband, the plaintiff recovered a verdict for $35,000, and a motion for a new trial was refused by the district court. On appeal the court said: "Careful examination of the law of the case leads to the conclusion that all the rulings of the district court were sound. In such an action for damages this court cannot review the action of the district court in refusing to grant a new trial for excess in the verdict. . . . There is no more salutary judicial power than that of relieving against excessive verdicts. With the changes which modern life has brought, the importance of the exercise of the power with moderation and firmness becomes more and more important, especially when it is considered that the refusal of the trial court to give relief cannot be reviewed. Large as this verdict is, the motion to reduce by granting a new trial nisi was in the discretion of the district court and beyond the consideration of this court." For a general discussion of what is an excessive verdict in an action for alienation of affections, see the note to Fuller v. Robinson, Ann. Cas. 1912A 938.

5. STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

In Hall v. Smith, 80 Misc. 85, 140 N. Y. S. 796, an action by a wife for the alienation of her husband's affections, the plaintiff moved for a temporary injunction to restrain the further alienation by the defendant of the affections of her husband. Holding that the action was barred the court said: "The motion which has been made in this action requires the determination of the question whether in such an action an injunction order may and should be made to restrain the defendant pendente lite from the continuance of those acts which lie at the foundation of the cause of action. While the question is most unusual in respect of the power of the court to grant such relief, I have no doubt whatever that in a proper case the right to grant such an injunction resides in the court of equity and that it is not unduly extending the jurisdiction or cognizance of the court to restrain the impending, threatened or continued commission of such acts as are violative of the rights of a plaintiff in a suit of this character. . . . Rules of general application in cases of injunctions of a temporary character are applicable to this case. The plaintiff must show not only the existence of a legal right but must affirmatively show that the acts sought to be restrained will be a violation of it. Injunctions do not issue to prevent acts merely because they are immoral or illegal or criminal, but only in case the plaintiff's civil rights are being invaded. In this case the gravamen of the charge made by the plaintiff is an act which occurred in or about July, 1906. It is alleged as being at that time a completed act of alienation 'since which date her husband has not lived with or shown any love or affection to the plaintiff herein but has lived with and continues to live with the said defendant; that he has refused to come back to the plaintiff,' etc. The present suit was not begun, according to the affidavits submitted on this motion, until the 17th day of February, 1913, more than six years subsequent to the act of alienation charged against the defendant. This fact raises a question not presented by counsel, to wit: Is the action maintainable after the lapse of six years from the date of the alleged alienation? It was held in Hogan v. Wolf, 32 N. Y. St. Repr. 550, that the cause of action in a suit of this nature was barred at the expiration of six years. . . . But even if the cause of action itself were to be considered as not being barred in the present case, the plaintiff by failing for so long a period to seek the peculiar relief which she now asks has, I think, waived her right to the intervention of this court on her behalf pending the suit. Her laches are wholly unexplained, no excuse of any sort is offered to the court for this long delay; and, while no arbitrary rule exists for determining what constitutes laches, the peculiar circumstances in this case lead me to hesitate to employ the equitable powers of this court at the present stage, or unless or until the plaintiff's prospect of final success in the action seems more assured than it now does."

III. Criminal Conversation.

In Ney v. Ney (No. 1) 21 Ont. W. Rep. 523, 3 Ont. W. N. 896, it was held, following the previous judgments of the court in Hellis v. Lambert, 24 Ont. App. 683, and Weston v. Perry, 14 Ont. W. Rep. 956, that no action will lie by a married woman for the loss of the consortium of her husband. In Frederick v. Morse, 88 Vt. 126, 92 Atl. 16, it appeared that the case was tried on two counts, alleging alienation of affection as the first count, and criminal conversation as a second count. After discussing several exceptions taken to the instructions of the court regarding the proof of marriage the court said: "The court charged in substance that if the jury found the fact of an adulterous disposition, and the opportunities to commit adultery which the evidence tended to establish, and were satisfied from these facts that sexual intercourse was had on any of these occasions, the plaintiff could recover under the second count, unless the jury found that she was willing that her husband should have criminal conversation with the defendant and consented to the act of intercourse. This instruction was excepted to, but we think it was correct and adequate."

CARPENTER

v.

BUFFALO GENERAL ELECTRIC COMPANY.

New York Court of Appeals—November 10, 1914.

213 N. Y. 101; 106 N. E. 1026.

Adoption of Children — Inheritance from Adopted Child.

Decedent was duly adopted by his mother's sister, after his father had abandoned his family, under Laws 1873, c. 830, providing that the adopted child should sustain the legal relation of a child, and which as amended by Laws 1887, c. 703, gave the right of inheritance, previously denied, and declared his "next of kin" to be the same as if he was the "legitimate child" of the person adopting him. After the death of his foster mother, leaving a brother and two sisters, decedent, while in defendant's employ, was killed, dying intestate and unmarried. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1902-1905, provides a recovery for wrongful death for the benefit of decedent's "next of kin," defined by reference to include all those entitled under the law relating to the distribution of personal property. Domestic Relations Law (Consol. Laws, c. 14) § 114, provides that a foster parent and an adopted minor child sustain the legal relation of parent and child, with rights of inheritance from each other, extending to the child's heirs and "next of kin," as if he were the "legitimate child" of the person adopting him. Decedent Estate Law (Consol. Laws, c. 13) § 98, subd. 7, provides that the father of an adopted child, dying intestate, unmarried, and without children, takes all the unbequeathed assets. Held, that the law in force at decedent's death controlled; that the right of inheritance which passed to decedent's next of kin was not merely the right to inherit from his foster parent; that the term "legitimate child," used in the established meaning of a child born in lawful wedlock, made decedent the next of kin, as though the adopted parent were his natural parent; and hence that the brother and sisters of his deceased adopted mother, and not his natural father, were the "next of kin" entitled to substantial damages.

Carpenter v. Buffalo General Electric Co.
155 N. Y. App. Div. 655, affirmed.

Appeal from Appellate Division of Supreme Court, Fourth Judicial Department.

Action for death by wrongful act. Margaret E. Carpenter, administratrix, plaintiff, and Buffalo General Electric Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff in trial court. Judgment affirmed by Appellate Division of Supreme Court. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFIRMED.

Alfred L. Becker for appellant.

Carleton H. White and Hamilton Ward for respondent.

[103] HOGAN, J.—In March, 1884, plaintiff's intestate, then about five years of age, was duly adopted by a sister of the natural mother of the intestate, under an order of adoption made pursuant to the provisions of chapter 830 of the Laws of 1873. The relation of mother and son thereby created between the adoptive parent and the intestate continued to the time of the death of the foster parent, November 3, 1906. The evidence justifies the assumption that the natural father of the intestate, though still alive, abandoned his family prior to the adoption proceedings, and that the intestate during his lifetime did not contribute to his support.

Subsequent to the adoption of the child, the natural mother and foster mother lived together down to the time of the death of the latter in 1906. The foster mother died intestate leaving her surviving the intestate, the adopted son, one brother and two sisters, one of whom is the plaintiff. The decedent, the adopted child, never married and never had a brother or sister.

April 13th, 1911, the intestate, then about 31 years of age, was an employee in the service of the defendant. On that day he died as a result of injuries received by him alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant. The plaintiff was appointed administratrix of his estate, and sought in this action, under the provisions of sections 1902-1905 inclusive, Code of Civil Procedure, to recover damages for the death of the intestate.

and recovered a verdict for a substantial amount.

The appellant does not complain of the amount of the recovery in this action provided that the plaintiff, her brother and her sister are the next of kin of the deceased, but contends that if deceased left any next of kin, the foster parent having predeceased the plaintiff's intestate, the natural father would be the sole next of kin interested [104] in any recovery, and that under the facts in this case such a recovery would be nominal rather than substantial as awarded by the jury.

The appeal, therefore, presents questions raised by exceptions to the rulings and charge of the trial justice.

The right of recovery in an action of this character is regulated by section 1902, and sections following, of the Code of Civil Procedure. By section 1903 of the Code, the decedent having died unmarried, the damages recovered, if any, would be exclusively for the benefit of the decedent's next of kin.

By section 1905 of the Code, the term "next of kin" is defined by reference to section 1870 of the Code, and includes all those entitled under the provisions of law relating to the distribution of personal property to share in the unbequeathed assets of a decedent, after payment of the debts and expenses, other than the surviving husband and wife.

The intestate having died unmarried, leaving no child, the father would take the whole of the unbequeathed assets of the decedent (Decedent Estate Law, section 98, subdivision 7) unless the statute relating to adoption has otherwise provided. The question is presented: Is the natural father the next of kin of the decedent? If the natural father is not next of kin of the decedent, then are the brother and two sisters of the decedent's foster mother to be regarded as next of kin of decedent?

The right of adoption was recognized and practiced among a number of the continental nations, though it was not embodied in the common law of England. It exists in this state by enactment of the legislature wherein is defined the legal rights and relations of the foster parent or parents and the adopted child, and such statute must be read in connection with the provisions of the Decedent Estate Law. As no right of inheritance or succession could arise prior to the death of the intestate, and the legislature was empowered at any time to repeal or [105] amend the statute, the law in force at the time of the death of the intestate (1911) is controlling upon the question presented in this case. (Dodin v. Dodin, 16 App. Div. 42, 44 N. Y. S. 800, affirmed 162 N. Y. 635, 57 N. E. 1108; Gilliam v. Guaranty Trust Co. 186 N. Y. 127, 78 N. E. 697, 116 Am. St. Rep. 536.)

The original statute relating to the subject of adoption, chapter 830 of the Laws of 1873, was in effect at the time the intestate was adopted. That law provided, so far as material to be considered, that the adopted child should take the name of the person adopting and the two thenceforth should sustain towards each other the legal relation of parent and child, but the statute by express terms expressly inhibited the right of inheritance. Chapter 703, Laws of 1887, amended the law of 1873. The amendatory law continued the legal relation of parent and child between the adoptive parent and the adopted child, and, whereas, under the statute of 1873 a right of inheritance was denied, the law of 1887 included such right of inheritance, and in addition defined who should be the next of kin of the child in the following words: "and the heirs and next of kin of the child so adopted shall be the same as if the said child was the legitimate child of the person so adopting."

By chapter 272 of the Laws of 1896, the Domestic Relations Law (Cons. Laws, ch. 14) was enacted as a compilation, with certain changes and additions, of the preceding laws. Section 64 of that law, now embodied in section 114 of the same law, is as follows:
